Corn has had another stiff advance and a return to last week's closing prices. After passing 70 cents profit-taking developed and became quite strong Friday, but the buying was renewed, only to give way to a rush of unloading when the stock and cotton markets showed extreme weakness. The demand for corn in the past two weeks has been urgent with large shipments out of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. The gradual advance of competitive cash buying made the market in futures. The market has returned to another good buying level and the country will again stimulate the options, as the farmers in the surplus States will not dispose of much corn at a recession in prices. The corn raiser is watching the hog market, not the options, and with his product worth from 80 cents to 90 cents for hog-feeding he will not reduce his holdings at price concessions.

Cotton—As Southern spot markets have been and are now, and will be, the guide to the course of the contract markets, both American and Liverpool, the recent heavy break should not in any way shake confidence, but should be regarded as an incident peculiar to high prices and a very broad market. In other words, after the holidays there seemed to be many who wanted to liquidate their holdings. This selling was materially increased by forced liquidation on the part of Wall street interests to protect their stock accounts which were also declining. The bull leader, Mr. E. G. Scales, threw himself in the breach and tried to hold prices by continuous buying day after day, but the volume of selling increased with each point decline until it became something terrific and Mr. Scales finally was driven to the extremity of liquidating his entire holdings on a rapidly declining market which culminated Friday with a panic. Around 13.70 for May a powerful Philadelphia spot house took over all of Mr. Scales' unsold contracts by private agreement. It is unfortunate that it is human nature to "follow" the crowd and many threw out their holdings at low prices when they should have been buying. It is said on unquestionable authority now that the big spot people who are now in control of the situation are friendly to the market and will work for higher prices. Cotton should now be bought on all soft spots.

Copper—The value and importance of the production of copper is only beginning to be fully realized. Copper is one of the most staple and widely used metals and as we have heretofore predicted, the price of copper metals is gradually rising and this must necessarily affect for the better the good copper stocks. The demand for copper for export is better today than ever before. Europe has apparently believed for some time that copper could not advance, making their calculations on the fact that the United States is producing more copper than ever before in its history. This is true but the consumption of copper has overtaken and passed production and in consequence the foreigners find themselves very short of the metal. The expansion of electrical lines of all kinds has greatly increased the demand. Copper as a conductor is bound to have an enormous consumption; eventually all our railways will be operated by electricity. While during the last thirty days the stocks in the copper market have sought a higher average range of prices, there has been quite a drop in some and we would again advise caution in the selection of investments. We have spoken and still continue to think well of Nevada Consolidated. There seems to be no doubt that this mine is one of the finest copper propositions in the country. The president of the Nevada Consolidated has come out with a letter to the stockholders asking them not to agree to the Utah's proposition to surrender their stock at 2¼ to one in the proposed merger and from the showing and the reports on these respective mines the exchange seems out of all just proportion. In regard to this proposed copper merger, it is not a merger in the popular sense of a trust; it does not contemplate discrimination and will not effect the northern Michigan mines, nor Arizona. There is a world wide production of copper that will have to be worked off, but the new uses to which the metal is being put are increasing. To bring a reasonable profit copper should sell at 15 or over. It has now reached 14 cents and our prediction of 15 cents before April 1 will probably be fulfilled at even an earlier date. We would advise going slow just now in regard to copper stock investments.

Discounts

There is a curious bias in the human mind in favor of discounts, of getting a reduction from the announced price, which is not confined to the feminine sex. This crops out frequently in conversation. A friend tells us something as a fact—it may be a fishing story, a financial deal, or a trip to Yosemite in Winter, and, almost instinctively, we make our own mental reservation. Did the fish weigh four pounds? Maybe it was only three. He made three thousand dollars? Well, let us say twenty-five hundred and be safe. That trip to El Portal and Yosemite, was it really as fine as he enthusiastically painted it? The service at the Hotel del Portal, the dining hall, the lounging room, the club room and all the appointments, were they actually first-class? And then the stage ride up the Merced Canyon, three hours of wonderful scenery with a good stage-driver; and the great valley itself covered with snow—Montagu and Capulet unite, for once, in saying that it was magnificent beyond mere words and that they did not suffer in any way from the cold. Well, perhaps it is true, but here old habit creeps in again. Was the sleighing so fine, and the skating and snowshoeing? Can you go up the trail in winter to Vernal Falls?

Emerson said that Yosemite was "the one great place which came up to the brag." He saw the valley in Summer. There is no discount in Winter, and the splendid hotel at El Portal has made the trip not only possible but pleasurable and comfortable.

Social Prattle

The Fearless Mrs. Darling

If there is one woman in society who does not hesitate to speak her mind vigorously when occasion seems to demand it, it is Mrs. John A. Darling. Mrs. Darling belongs to the only set in San Francisco which can rightly boast aristocratic bearing and there are times when her scorn for the pretense of upstarts causes her to administer a stinging rebuke which is not soon forgotten by the luckless person upon whom it descends. In an unguarded moment the wife of a wealthy man who is more or less of a leader in one section of the social herd, criticized a member of Mrs. Darling's family. Mrs. Darling met this lady at a recent tea and corrected her misstatement, adding, in a tone the reverse of confidential:

MISS GERTRUDE BYRNES

Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William M. Byrnes of San Rafael who will give a piano recital at the Dominican College tonight. Miss Byrnes will graduate in the musical department of the college next June, having already finished her classical studies. Her program includes numbers from Chopin, Liszt, Rachmaninoff and MacDowell and a large gathering of prominent people from both sides of the bay will hear her interpretation of these masters.

"When you are giving family histories, don't forget to mention that your father in early days kept a cheap grocery store and afterwards became a shoemaker." Mrs. Darling gave a tea a short time ago and invited only the members of her own exclusive set. A certain wealthy climber was chagrined at being overlooked and later, within earshot of Mrs. Darling, airily remarked that only the riffraff had been present. "You are mistaken," retorted Mrs. Darling; "if I had invited the riffraff you would certainly have received an invitation."

Patrician Beauties of Burlingame

Mrs. Walter Martin is earning the distinction of being one of the best gowned women in society. There is an individuality in her costumes which makes them noticeable although she never strikes the bizarre that Mrs. Frank Carolan affects. At the St. Francis ball last week Mrs. Martin wore a robe of royal blue panne velvet, the bodice studded with sapphires that represented a small fortune. One of the Burlingame contingent recently returned from abroad has noted the resemblance of Mrs. Martin and Mrs. George Keppel. The London beauty is Mrs. Martin's senior by years, but she has still the fresh wild-rose complexion of the English woman which is also the heritage of Mrs. Martin whose mother, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, belongs to an English county family.

MISS HAZEL HOLM

The clever and attractive daughter of Mr. and Mrs. T. N. Holm who recently returned from a tour of the world and has entertained extensively this winter.

Mrs. Martin is not the only woman in society distinguished by resemblance to an English beauty. Several years ago when Mrs. Charles McIntosh was Aileen Goad, a touring Britisher at Del Monte was so struck by her likeness to the then Princess of Wales that he said she might be the Princess herself in her beautiful youth. Then there is Mrs. Carolan, the double of Mrs. Pat Campbell and Mrs. Laurence Scott who looks like the

One of the most beautiful women at a recent ball wore a gown which was cut so daringly low that it prompted a gay young blade to remark: "That costume is evidently held up by the grace of God."

Society People in the Dairy Business

Mr. Henry P. Bowie, having recovered his stolen Holsteins, considers the incident closed, and is indignant that the newspapers should mention it. It all happened months ago, and now Frank Soares who was formerly associated with the San Mateo millionaire in the Severn Lodge Dairy is suing a man named Levy for false possession of the cows. As for Mr. Bowie, he has his Holsteins and does not care what is done to Mr. Levy. The Bowie dairy is a special fad of its owner and is conducted on aesthetic principles with all modern appliances and from it is furnished milk to Bowie's Burlingame friends, at so much a quart. Dairies are much in vogue as investments among our social exclusives and the Brewers have made a great success of theirs at San Mateo. Miss Nora Brewer who is engaged to Edward Cudahy, the Chicago millionaire, lives with her brother Frank Brewer, and her sister, Miss Amy Brewer, in an old-fashioned home near San Mateo which has been occupied by the family for many years. Mr. and Mrs. Brewer were Bostonians who first came to California for the benefit of Mrs. Brewer's health. Both died a number of years ago. The children established a dairy on the San Mateo property which has been very ably managed by Frank Brewer. Richard Hotaling also conducts a dairy on his Marin county estate. Several years ago George De Long startled society by peddling milk and soliciting the patronage of his friends. The popular young club man contributed an additional sensation by himself delivering the commodity during a temporary crisis with drivers.

Profanity in Polite Society

The Examiner asks solemnly, "Is a woman who swears really a lady?" In the Brokaw divorce which has diverted New York for a season, Mrs. Gould Brokaw is quoted as calling her husband "a damn liar." The Examiner dipped into history and compiled statistics. It found that Queen Elizabeth "swore powerfully" and that Catherine of Russia had an assortment of curses which delivered in Russian must have been remarkable and terrifying. Of modern instances there is Mrs. Howard Gould who is alleged to have used "damn" in addressing an architect, and the late Mrs. Paran Stevens whose epithets were always delightfully to the point. But the Examiner is not satisfied and proceeds heavily to analyze the ordinary "damn" of conversation which it finds is not properly profanity unless intended as such, although "women of wealth, position and refinement" would never damn anything. And yet they do. Half the maids and matrons of the smart set who are "women of wealth, position and refinement" damn anything they please as lightly as they praise, and still remain "women of wealth, position and refinement" in spite of yellow journalism. Let it not be understood that all society women are profane. Fully half of them are not. Not long ago at a ball one of the first division, a prominent young Burlingame matron, inquired the whereabouts of her husband. The person questioned knew it not and the young matron turned away with a sweet "Damn ————, I never know where he is," which remark so shocked a matron of the unprofane class that she has ventured to quote it, in all its bald horror, to equally dismayed friends.

The Husband of Mrs. Keppel

Of all the men who have attained vicarious distinction through the renown of their wives the Honorable George Keppel is not the least conspicuous. This remarkable Englishman is now in New York where he was well known several years ago as the agent of Sir Thomas Lipton, tea merchant and cup-hunter. To say that Keppel is remarkable is no exaggeration, for only a remarkable man could have maintained the difficult position of husbanding Mrs. George Keppel with the tactful self-effacement which he has displayed through many years. Ever since an eventful yachting party on the Riviera in 1893 Mrs. George Keppel has been the chum of King Edward. Naturally when royalty selects a feminine chum it is the part of discretion for the chum's husband to obliterate himself. That is one of the sacrifices necessary in such cases under a monarchical regime, so George Keppel promptly accepted the situation and performed the sacrifice. For sixteen years little was heard of George Keppel, but recently the king, touched no doubt by his silent withdrawl from the brilliant circle of society in which Mrs. Keppel disported, conferred on him a titulary distinction which gave him footroom near the lowest step to the throne. Keppel is Orderly Officer to the king but the title is insignificant beside that which he has worn for many years—Husband of the King's Chum.

A Remarkable Woman

King Edward, in his long and frolicsome career, has had many feminine chums, among them the Jersey Lily and Mrs. Cornwallis West, but none has ever engaged the royal intimacy as long or as exclusively as Mrs. Keppel. This is not surprising, for the king is a known connoisseur of femininity and Mrs. Keppel has a beautiful face, a voluptuous figure, a splendid carriage and an active and merry mind. Physically and mentally she is endowed with just those qualities aptest to amuse a monarch wearied with the cares of a constitutional government. If there exists any curiosity as to just what excellence in Mrs. Keppel the king most admires, it may easily be satisfied for King Edward himself is authority for the statement that it is her wit and tact which most appeal to him. That the particular degree of wit and tact most acceptable to royalty should dwell in a woman of Mrs. Keppel's external loveliness is one of those happy coincidences which sometimes make kings the envy of ordinary mortals. But it would perhaps be too much to expect that King Edward would have made Mrs. Keppel his chum if she had boasted wit and tact without physical pulchritude, for King Edward is intensely human and has never pretended that the divinity which hedges a king exempts him from the ordinary weakness. All of his chums have possessed wit and tact and have been beautiful women of voluptuous proportions as well.

Mrs. Keppel's Good Luck

That there are golden advantages attached to the rare honor of chumming with King Edward might be inferred by the uninitiate, even if the many marks of royal favor conferred upon Mrs. Keppel had not been heralded in the press of two continents. Only recently, in one of their frequent tete-a-tetes, King Edward confided to Mrs. Keppel a tip on American steel which netted this daughter of good fortune a cool million in American dollars. King Edward had the tip from Sir Ernest Cassell, his private banker, who in turn had received it from Pierpont Morgan; so it will be seen that Mrs. Keppel is not allowed by her royal chum to go far wrong in the investment of her money. It would be a tedious process to catalogue the other marks of distinguished favor which have been conferred upon this lucky woman by her sovereign and chum. Christmas before last, it will be remembered, he presented her with a magnificent mansion in Grosvenor street. Mrs. Keppel's old house in gloomy Portman Square had grown distasteful to her and the king, in finding for her a new dwelling, was careful that it should be within easy access of the palace. Upon receipt of a telephone message Mrs. Keppel is always ready to entertain the king, either alone or in one of those jolly parties which Edward so often affects. Much comment has been lavished on a particular feature of this new home—a private entrance at the rear on a narrow dismal street given over to mews and stables. Royalty entering or leaving by that entrance may be certain of preserving a strict incognito, which is as it should be in these days of prying plebeian curiosity.

An Instance of Her Tact

I am sorry that I cannot quote any sayings of Mrs. Keppel which would illustrate that wit of which King Edward is so enamored, but I am able to relate a recent instance of her tactful care for the king's comfort. The late Duchess of Manchester had one of the most famous chefs in Europe and esteemed him so highly that she left him an annuity of $750. King Edward always gave him the palm as the prime cuisiniere of the capital and endeavored to secure his services for Buckingham Palace. He was greatly chagrined to find that another had been beforehand with him, but his chagrin gave way to perfect satisfaction when he found that that other was the charming Mrs. Keppel. As the king dines at Mrs. Keppel's much more frequently than at Buckingham Palace, the arrangement not only suited but delighted him. It may be imagined that Queen Alexandra does not like Mrs. Keppel and that she resents her nickname of "Queen George." Once that was true but the queen, with an heroic self-effacement only paralleled by that of Mrs. Keppel's husband, has come to tolerate her royal consort's chum and is content that she should make one in the regal entourage wherever it goes. Society in Great Britain has followed the queen's example. It is understood nowadays that wherever the king is invited his chum must also be invited and if any hostess tries to make an exception to this rule, she always finds that the king is indisposed and cannot accept her hospitality. Speculation has been rife at times over the possibility of the king's outliving his fondness for Mrs. Keppel and choosing another chum. Much comment was excited, for instance, when the king was photographed with Miss Maxine Elliott. But King Edward is an old man now and it seems quite beyond the range of probability that he should forego the delights he finds in the company of Mrs. Keppel in favor of a younger chum. It is true that King David set a precedent for such a course but that was on medical advice and of course medicine has made tremendous strides since those old biblical days.

Guests at a fashionable hotel were highly amused during a recent dinner when a wealthy bachelor maid appeared in the dining room in splendid costume but with only a thin covering of hair tightly knotted. She had forgotten her coronet braid and was in blissful ignorance of her appearance.

The De Young Cotillon

The only cotillon which society has enjoyed this winter was that given on Tuesday evening by Mrs. M. H. De Young for her daughter Miss Kathleen. The guest list included nearly two hundred, half of whom were the friends of Miss De Young in the younger set. It was really for the young persons that the cotillon was arranged and to say that they enjoyed themselves thoroughly in the beautiful ballroom of the family home in California street is putting it quite mildly. The rest of the guests were family friends from the older married contingent of society and they were entertained during the dance in a manner equally satisfactory.

The Mardi Gras Bal Masque

To say that the fashionable dancing crowd is on the tiptoe of excitement over the plans for the masked ball which will be given on Shrove Tuesday night for the benefit of the Children's Hospital is to state an obvious fact in very conservative terms. A bal masque has such endless possibilities of excitement and appeals to the imagination so much more strongly than the ordinary dignified hop that even the staider maids and matrons talk of the affair with eyes asparkle. The Portola masquerade was the first diversion of this sort at which society assisted for a long time and it was such an enjoyable affair that the Mardi Gras ball will be sure of generous patronage. The fact that it is to be given for charity will commend it to many who might be dubious about attending otherwise; charity, you know, banishes a multitude of scruples. The ball will be given at Pavilion Rink, corner of Sutter and Pierce streets, on the evening of February 8, for Lent is following very closely on the heels of Advent this year. There will be a brass band and a string orchestra to discourse music for the dancers and that irrepressible king of the revels, Edward the first and last of the House of Greenway and Mumm, will lead the grand march at half after nine. Prizes will be given for the best costumes, both for men and women and it is announced that the judges will be prominent men warranted experts in the appraisement of pulchritude of face, figure and dress. Tickets including supper will cost $5.00 and boxes $50.00. The proceeds will go to the Children's Hospital which is sadly in need of funds. The tickets may be obtained at any time from the following patronesses: Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. Worthington Ames, Mrs. George Cameron, Mrs. Walter Martin, Mrs. Fred McNear, Mrs. Latham McMullin, Mrs. Sam Boardman, Mrs. Silas Palmer and Miss Jennie Crocker. After February 4 they may also be purchased at Sherman, Clay & Company.

One of the Three Marys

In speaking of Mrs. Mary Scott Castle from whom Neville Castle has just secured a divorce, as a "former society belle of San Francisco" the newspapers are in error. Mary Scott was socially prominent in San Jose and first burst upon this city in all her effulgence when she joined the ranks of T. Daniel Frawley's stock company. Theatregoers cannot have forgotten the war of the Three Marys which was something of a nine-days' wonder at that time, the Three Marys being Mary Scott, Mary Hampton and Mary Van Buren. When Mrs. Castle invaded the New York theatrical rialto her success was not overpowering and she ended by playing an engagement at Keith's music hall. Afterwards she barnstormed in Canada, playing among other parts that of Polly in "Caste." It is reported that Mrs. Neville is visiting with friends in Canada at the present time. No doubt she was glad to leave New York after the notoriety of her shooting affray in the Waldorf-Astoria.

Miss Harriet Alexander left California with great reluctance. As Miss Alexander wore fresh orchids every day and was constantly in the company of Melville Bowman, her girl friends think they know the reason.

THE BEAUTIFUL HOTEL GREEN, PASADENA

The Case-Maclean Musicale

The musicale given by Miss Mary Adele Case and Mr. Donald Maclean at the latter's studio, 1613 Green street, on January 16 was enjoyed by a large and appreciative audience. Miss Case was in excellent voice and sang a group of the plaintive Hungarian songs which she renders so charmingly. Mr. Maclean's program contained several novelties, the interest of the evening being centered in his presentation of "La Premiere Parole" from Fevrier's Monna Vanna, the opera which caused so much discussion on its production in Paris a few months ago. It was splendidly sung by Mr. Maclean who did full justice both to the beauty and to the dramatic intensity of the music. Mr. Maclean also gave a number of modern German songs ending with Wotan's Abschied from Die Walkure.

Billy Burke presented to his fiancee, Miss Genevieve Walker, an engagement ring of rare beauty. It contains a marquise diamond and is a replica of that which Joe Tobin gave Miss Constance De Young when their engagement was announced.

Society will receive a surprise when a wealthy widow of seventy announces her engagement to a distinguished professor of languages who has passed the fifty mark.

It is expected that before Miss Florence Hopkins leaves with her father for a tour abroad she will announce her engagement to Duval Moore. They have been very frequently together of late and at the Patroness' Ball the young chap's devotion was particularly noted.

In the Social Spotlight

Madame Nellie Widmann-Blow, mezzo-soprano, assisted by Miss Mildred Turner, pianiste, will give a concert on Friday evening, January 21, at Kohler and Chase Hall, corner of O'Farrell street and Grant avenue.

There will be a musicale in the ballroom of the St. Francis on Friday evening, January 21, at which Miss Georgiana Strauss, assisted by a number of well-known artists will render an attractive program.

Miss Blanche Lillian Kaplan, the twelve year old daughter of Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Bernard M. Kaplan, will give a piano recital at the Van Ness Theatre on January 23.

The talented Pasmore Trio of this city have made a very successful appearance in Chicago where they won the applause of their audience and the critics as well. After playing at a number of concerts in and around Chicago they will start home, arriving before the end of January.

One of the delightful affairs of the week at Los Angeles was the informal bridge party given Wednesday afternoon by Mrs. E. Avery McCarthy of the Hershey Arms, in honor of Mrs. William Averell and her daughter, Miss Averell, who have just returned from an extended trip abroad and are guests at the Hershey Arms for the winter; and also in compliment to Mrs. Roy B. Lindsay of San Francisco, who has been visiting here for a fortnight at the Van Nuys. The affair was prettily appointed, and violets and Enchantress carnations were used in the decorations. Four tables were filled for the afternoon's playing.

Mrs. N. A. Dorn will be the hostess at a large tea on February 5 at her home in Pacific avenue.

Mrs. Russell Wilson will leave on Sunday for New York where she will meet Mrs. Gertrude Miller and later these two ladies will sail for a tour abroad. Mrs. Wilson will be away until next fall.

Miss Bertha I. Hall, accompanied by her sister, Hazel H. Hall of Tacoma, arrived at Del Monte recently, intending to stay a week or ten days.

Major C. C. Bennett of Victoria, B. C., who has been at Del Monte for the last week, is an enthusiastic golfer and has not missed a day so far on the links.

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Raoul-DuVal arrived at Del Monte recently for a week's stay, and it was expected that Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Clark of San Mateo would join them. Business, however, prevented Mr. Clark from going.

Mrs. Charles J. Stovel and her sister, Miss Adele Martel, will give an elaborate bridge party followed by a tea at their home, 2613 Buchanan street, on Friday afternoon, February 4.

Dr. and Mrs. Kasper Pischel have issued cards for an at home at their residence, 1817 California street, on Saturday evening, January 29.

Mrs. William Mayo Newhall, Mrs. Ira Pierce, Mrs. Henry T. Scott and Mrs. James Robinson formed a congenial party playing bridge recently at the Francisca Club.

Mrs. M. Matson and her daughter, Miss Lurline, were hostesses at an elaborate tea during the week at their home, 1918 Jackson street.

The Nethersole in "Sapho"

By Edward F. O'Day

More than two years have gone by since last we had an opportunity to see Miss Nethersole in the role of the Daudet hetaira and the lapse of time has wrought many changes, not only in the production but in Miss Nethersole as well. What was once a splendiferous scenic apparatus has been worn and dirtied by the hard usage of the road; the former capable cast has been supplanted by mediocrities; and as though to keep a backward step with the deterioration of the production, the star, except in one act, plays with every evidence of a blasted enthusiasm. As I remember the opening scene in the studio it was a riot of artistically clashing colors and the merrymakers reveled with the abandon of finely simulated enjoyment. But now the scene seems to cry aloud for the assistance of a capable stage manager and the mummers go through the motions of gaiety with a pretense of hilarity that is downright depressing. That opening scene struck the keynote of the whole piece; it was depressing, but in a different way from that intended by Daudet and the late Mr. Fitch. The sense of cross-purpose between the drama and the players and the players and their environment was so persistently borne in upon the spectator that one noted without surprise that a statuette of Venus at the Bath did duty for Sapho. As a matter of fact, there was little of the old-time Sapho in Miss Nethersole's earlier scenes. The burning kisses that aroused the indignation of all the easterners whose ancestors had landed at Plymouth Rock, have gone the way of all flesh. They belong to the Nethersolian days that are no more—the days when Miss Nethersole never dreamed of seeking out juvenile courts and discoursing on the suffrage question. Sapho's kisses nowadays are mere domestic pecks, warranted not to stir the blood of the co-ed or to evoke the anger of the pulpit. Half a hundred of them would not endanger the consular career of the silliest, most impressionable Jean that ever went to a studio ball. They are not even as effusive as those our country cousins exchange in Market street. Perhaps the Nethersole has become too serious to linger over the osculatory passages in the play; perhaps, who knows? she has come to weary a good deal of the play itself. After all, it is rather a ridiculous play and should survive only as a terrible example of what Clyde Fitch could do, when he chose, in the way of misinterpreting a great book. Despite, however, that the Nethersole shows evidences of growing tired of this well-worn part, she still plays the great emotional climax of the third act with splendid intensity. That of course is the one bright spot in the dreary picture and the actress attacks it with a spirit in striking contrast to her nonchalance throughout the other scenes. Miss Nethersole is endowed with wonderful capacity for the depiction of passion and while she has eliminated many of the daring indications of sexual fury, there is enough left in that scene to make it a vital depiction. Of the company that is supporting Miss Nethersole it is needless to speak. The leading man is a husky youth who mounts the staircase with Miss Nethersole in his arms without any appearance of effort. Miss Nethersole is a stout and heavy woman nowadays and it must be a problem to find a Jean who can carry her gracefully up that winding ascent. When the leading man appeared with Miss Nethersole to share in the applause which always follows that scene he was not even "breathed"; so no doubt his connection with the company is amply justified.

Marie Cahill at the Columbia

"The most successful season in her career as a star" is what the press-agents say about Marie Cahill who comes in her new musical play "The Boys and Betty" to the Columbia Theatre for two weeks commencing Monday night, January 24. There will be Saturday matinees only. "The Boys and Betty" is an adaptation of "La Papillon" which had a great vogue in Paris, and was made by George V. Hobart who provided the books and lyrics with music by Silvio Hein. We are told that while the adaptation is thoroughly American, enough of the French flavor has been retained to make it attractive. Silvio Hein, the composer, it is said, has supplied the star with a number of taking song hits. Miss Cahill is surrounded by a good cast and particular stress is laid upon the beauty of the chorus and the costumes.

The Sunday "Pop" Concerts

Manager Greenbaum announces four Sunday "Pop" concerts. The prices will be as low as in the big music centers of Germany. It is possible for the sum of $1.00 to secure a season ticket for the entire course. These will be ready Monday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co's. The first concert will be given Sunday afternoon, January 30 at the new Kohler and Chase Hall. The new Lyric Quartette, composed of Misses Pasmore and Ehrman, violins; Miss Furth, viola and Miss Dorothy Pasmore, violincello, will play Mozart's charming "Quartette," Op. 15, the "Presto" from Beethoven's Op. 18 and Schubert's "Quartette" (posthumous). The soloist will be Mrs. B. M. Stich. Miss Lydia Reinstein will be the accompanist.

Louis James at the Van Ness

The engagements of that sterling actor, Louis James, have come to be quite an event in local theatricals, the mere announcement of the date of his coming being sufficient to awaken great interest in the lovers of Shakespeare and the classic drama. For many years Mr. James has been an exponent of such roles as Shylock and Cardinal Wolsey, both of which he will enact during the coming week at the Van Ness. In "King Henry VIII," with which drama he will open his engagement Monday night, Mr. James is using the version prepared for the late Edwin Booth by William Winter, and it is said to call for sumptuous scenic surroundings, which have been provided liberally. Queen Catherine, the unfortunate spouse of Henry, will be portrayed by Aphie James. The balance of the cast has been selected with special care. Mr. James will appear in "King Henry VIII" on Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday nights of next week. The bill for Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights, and for the Saturday matinee will be "The Merchant of Venice," with Mr. James as Shylock and Aphie James as Portia.

Burt Wesner Back at Alcazar

Leo Ditrichstein's mirthful comedy, "All On Account of Eliza," will be the Alcazar's offering throughout the coming week. It will reintroduce Burt Wesner to the patrons with whom he was a prime favorite for two years prior to the close of the last season. He will play a funny German character created by Louis Mann. "All On Account of Eliza" deals with the fortunes of a city school-marm in a rural community where the narrow-mindedness of the womenfolk is deep-rooted. They are shocked by the liberal ideas and easy, though innocent, behavior of the pretty young woman, and when all the men and children in the village fall in love with her the wives and mothers combine to have her dismissed. She is arraigned before the school board on charges of immorality, but triumphantly clears her good name, much to the dismay of her accusers, and is retained in her position. She does not pique the ladies very long, however, for the son of the school board's president makes her his wife. It is a simple plot, but bright from start to finish. Evelyn Vaughan will play the fair cause of all the trouble, and John Ince will be seen as her young lover.

Teresa Carreno Concerts

That wonderful pianist and beautiful woman Mme. Teresa Carreno will give two concerts in this city at the Garrick Theatre on Thursday night, February 3 and Sunday afternoon, February 4, under the direction of Will Greenbaum. At the first of these Chopin's rarely played "Sonata," Op. 58 and Edward MacDowell's Sonata "Keltic" will be the special features and at the Sunday afternoon event the great artist will play Schumann's beautiful "Quintette" for piano and strings in which she will have the assistance of the Lyric Quartette. Beethoven's "Sonata," Op. 109 is also on this

Max Figman at the Savoy

Max Figman and "Mary Jane's Pa" are two delightful names to conjure with in comedy and will probably bring big audiences to the Savoy Theatre for two weeks commencing Sunday matinee. Mr. Figman in Edith Ellis' story of Indiana has a vehicle that will bring out his best efforts and demostrate his remarkable versatility. He will be supported by a strong company, including Miss Helen Lackaye and Messrs. Edwin Chapman, Franklin Searight, Tony West, Charles Merriwell, Thomas C. King, Ernest Wards, David Marlowe, G. H. Stewart, the Misses Dorothy Phillips, Nina Ainscoe, Helen Hartley, and last but by no means least, the clever child actress, Gretchen Hartman. The usual Thursday, Saturday and Sunday matinees will be given during the Max Figman engagement.

Hungarian Pianist at Orpheum

Vilmos Westony, the Hungarian pianist will be heard for the first time in this city at the Orpheum next week. Westony has selected some of his most spectacular features, including an imitation on the piano of a complete orchestra and a medley of French, German, English and American anthems, which he plays simultaneously. The return of Claude and Fannie Usher in their slangy sketch, "Fagan's Decision," is sure to be welcomed. The Four Readings, acrobats, will be a special feature of the coming bill. Cook and Stevens, two colored comedians, are also newcomers. Next week will be the last of Jean Clermont's "Burleske" Circus, Brown, Harris and Brown, the Doherty Sisters and the Eight Geisha Girls.

"Brewster's Millions" at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing next Monday evening the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will present for the first time on any stage at popular prices, "Brewster's Millions," the celebrated comedy success made from George Barr McCutcheon's story of the same title. The piece is one of the most widely known successes of recent years. Three different seasons it has been played on the coast by traveling organizations, and always to capacity business, and when offered next week at the moderate prices charged by Ye Liberty management its appeal should be stronger than ever. Elaborate preparations have been made for its production across the bay next week, especially the scenic end of it—and the famous yacht scene should be most realistically depicted on Ye Liberty's big revolving stage. George Friend will appear as "Monty" Brewster and Blanche Hall as "Peggy" Grey, and the other favorites will all be happily cast. "St. Elmo" follows.

LOUIS JAMES

Who will play "Henry VIII" and "The Merchant of Venice" at the Van Ness Theatre.

MARIE CAHILL

In "The Boys and Betty" at the Columbia Theatre.

In the Limelight

Robert Mantell will follow Marie Cahill at the Columbia Theatre, playing an engagement of three weeks. The great actor will have the most extensive repertoire ever attempted in one season by any American player. His plays number fourteen and extend from the heaviest tragedies to the lightest comedy. Among the plays to be staged are "King John," "King Lear," "King Richard III," "Richelieu," "The Lady of Lyons," "Louis XI," "The Merchant of Venice," "Macbeth," "The Marble Heart," "Romeo and Juliet," "Hamlet," "Othello," "Julius Caesar," and "As You Like It."

Blanche Walsh, the noted emotional actress, recently declined an offer of $25,000 for an auxiliary season of four weeks in Australia in her latest success "The Test." Her reason for the refusal was that, after her coast tour which has already been inaugurated, she would return to Europe to resume her grand opera studies under the tutelage of Jean De Reszke.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

EVENING DRESS—FORMAL

Evening Wedding, Reception, Formal Dinner, Dance and Theatre After 6 O'clock Where Ladies Are in Evening Dress

imparts to them fresh interest. The author deals with the Cardinal with an unsparing hand, as, indeed, he deals with all the delinquents of the Catholic Church hierarchy, a fact to which I desire to give emphasis for the reason that some reviewers have accused him of the betrayal of a bigoted spirit in this volume. Belloc is an ardent, enthusiastic Catholic, but it is rather a deep religious feeling than a spirit of bigotry that is to be found in these pages. It certainly does not savor of the spirit that is to be found in the works of Motley and Froude with whom no fault is found though they never could conceive it possible that God who sends his rain and sunshine on the just and unjust may have some fatherly and merciful purpose in his toleration of the Papacy.

But to return to our biography, the discussion of which has almost consumed all that remains of available space. It carries us along through the dark days of the States-General, showing us the Queen "divorced from joy," and the "public hatred of her immensely grown," for she had manifestly become the chief adviser of her husband and the creator of a scheme of government. She became known in the streets of Paris as "Madame Deficit." Insults were offered her in public. All the phases of doom were showing themselves. The Revolution was organized, the storm was whirling about her. We are given impressive pictures of her as slowly she realizes the imminence of the crisis. A graphic description is given of the attempt that was made to escape from Paris, of the attack of the Jacobin insurrection on the Tuilleries and of the last days of the French monarchy. We are taken into the Temple, we hear the roar of the mob, our emotions are quickened by the agonies of the royal families in captivity, and finally we come to the Queen alone in her cell and we accompany her with feverish interest through the gloom and horror of her trial and to the guillotine.

It is all powerful narrative; dramatic, soul-stirring. In the writing of this book Mr. Belloc did not detach himself from his imagination, for which we are all the more grateful. He has given us a beautiful, sympathetic study of one of the most romantic figures in modern history, and at the same time he enables us to examine and ponder many of the salient features of the Revolution from a new viewpoint. With his theories and conclusions all may not agree; his craftsmanship all must admire.

In the Social Spotlight

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Doyle have closed their home at San Mateo and taken permanent quarters at the St. Francis.

Mrs. James R. Pourie, wife of Captain Pourie, returned on the transport Sheridan from Honolulu, much to the surprise of her friends, few of whom were aware of her plans. Captain Pourie will return by the next transport, having been given sick leave. They will reside at the St. Francis.

An enjoyable tea of the week was the one given on Monday by the Directors of the Telegraph Hill Neighbor Association at the Neighborhood House, 1734 Stockton street.

San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado, Coronado Beach, Cal., were D. F. Murphy, Miss Theresa Murphy, J. C. Bell, N. L. Walter, S. B. Tobey, L. Barkhauser, Miss Natalie Hunt, Miss Marion Marvin, Mrs. J. H. Polhamus and Miss Doris Wilshire.

Among the recent arrivals at the Fairmont are Mr. and Mrs. William E. Bird Jr. of New York, who are making a lenghty tour of the coast. Mr. Bird was formerly vice-president and traffic director of the New York and Cuba Mail Steamship Co. but has retired from active business.

A large card party was given by Mrs. F. A. Sumers in the Green Room of the Fairmont on Tuesday, January 18. Thirteen tables were filled and after the play refreshments were served on the south side of the Laurel Court.

Mrs. J. Perry was hostess at a delightful reception in the Grey Room of the Fairmont on Tuesday the 18th, at which she received some sixty of her friends.

Mrs. F. F. Low and her daughter, Miss Flora Low, were hostesses of a luncheon party Thursday at the St. Francis. Walter Hobart also entertained there a group of congenial friends, including Messrs. Russel Bogue, George Parsons, Clement Tobin and Dr. McEnnery.

Carroll Hutchins who has just been appointed vice-president and traffic director on the Pacific Coast for the Raymond and Whitcomb Co. with offices in this city, has taken apartments at the Fairmont Hotel. Mr. Hutchins succeeded Charles Alden Cooks who left Raymond Whitcomb Co. to take the management of the Fairmont Hotel.

Mrs. James McNab and Miss Christene McNab have issued cards for a tea at their home, 2320 Broadway, on Thursday, January 27. The affair will be given in honor of Miss Reid, an Eastern girl who is visiting here.

A DAINTY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the Theatre, attending Receptions, when shopping, while traveling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes.

It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool, delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receipt of Five Cents in stamps or coin. F. T. Hopkins, 37 Great Jones St., New York.

tached chords and snatches. Ellen turned her back on the window, and a furrow appeared on her smooth forehead between the dark eyebrows. A very smooth forehead is like an unwritten page, waiting for a hand to give it contents. The first line had here been written—but no more.

II.

It was not Ellen's habit to lie upon the lounge. She abhorred all self-indulgence and abandon. But today she had to defend herself against the noise and racket, the whirr of rattles, the cracking of whips, the deafening din of tin horns, the turmoil of humanity at large, an entire population with the irresistible desire of making fools of themselves at least once a year. Ellen had lowered the blinds as early as four o'clock, and the gas had been lit under the soft red silken shade. Now she pressed her ears into the cushions, and reflected upon the number of fools in the world—seekers of happiness!

She had missed a very gentle ring of the electric entrance bell, but the screams of her French maid, Ninette, could not fail to awaken any one who was not as deaf as a post. She sat up and glanced toward the door. What had made Ninette scream like that? The maid's blushing face, under the dainty white lace cap, appeared for a second—but then the gloved hand of a man unceremoniously pushed the minion of Ellen's home back into the twilight of the corridor. A stranger stood in the room—one of those detestable masqueraders.

He was a Pierrot dressed in purple velvet. Bouquets of fresh violets were fastened to his peaked cap, to his belt, his shoulders, his sleeves—the entire room was fragrant with the perfume of fresh violets. He put his hand into his deep pockets and began to throw one bouquet of violets after another at the feet of Ellen, who was absolutely petrified. She stood ankle deep in violets before she succeeded in recovering her voice.

"Leave the room at once!"

The Pierrot ceased his bombardment. "Do you mean to drive Spring away from you?" He approached her, and with him came the fresh fragrance that brought a whole forest, with its graceful mosses and its flickering lights, into the pale of the four narrow walls.

"I beg of you, go!" whispered Ellen confusedly. One of the bouquets in Pierrot's cap had touched her cheek like cool, soft fingers.

"I am—" he murmured close to her ear.

"I do not care to know who you are," said Ellen quickly, glancing at the door.

"And I'm not going to tell you. But I implore you to remain. As you see, I have with my own hands erected a rampart between you and myself—a wall of violets!"

"This is too much!" Ellen walked around the table to the window. The Pierrot leaned against the mantelpiece and did not follow her.

"What do you fear? In your own house? From a guest? Dismiss me—and I shall say: 'The proud woman was afraid!'"

"Remain then," said Ellen promptly. She was seeking some treacherous feature behind the white silk mask. Many of her friends possessed the same supple figure.

"Your hair looks very pretty today. Don't blush—the sofa pillows have arranged it for you the way it should be. Put a tuft of violets into that loose strand. You have no idea how wonderfully fragrant your hair is. I have noticed it, but you did not feel it."

Ellen started. "Ridiculous! You do not mean it!"

"Indeed, I do! But there are women who do not feel that sort of thing."

Ellen sank back in her easy chair, languid and resigned. But this languor was somewhat enervating. "Let us speak of something else."

"By all means. The weather, for instance." Pierrot sat down opposite her. They did not discuss the weather, however, they did not speak at all. After a little while, Ellen began to feel the silence like the pressure of a hand closing around her throat, gently and suffocatingly at once. Was it possible that she, a woman of the world, could not rise above this situation—or any situation whatsoever?

"Pierrot," she said with playful dignity, "how about my accepting the distressing facts, and offering you a cup of tea?"

"Then I would say that you are a very clever woman."

Ellen pressed the thick head of a bronze tortoise, and a shrill ring caused Ninette to appear. Tea was ordered, Ninette vanished noiselessly, and the Pierrot chattered on in his unpleasant falsetto whisper. It was impossible to discover any familiar and suggestive sound in this hoarse utterance.

"Delightful!" he whispered. "The call for tea is so characteristic of a lovely woman in your predicament; and the singing kettle is an excellent chaperone. Alas! you have your tea prepared in the kitchen? I beg of you—what a crime against the poetry of the samovar—I begin to fear that you will not be able to appreciate my violets!"

He took one of the steaming cups which Ninette presented, with a silly smile, on a silver tray. Ellen dismissed the maid, and herself offered sugar and cream. As he was placing the cup to his lips she rapidly tried to discover the shape of his mouth and cheeks, but he cleverly managed to conceal his features.

"Whether or not you may see my mouth today, I do not know," he said meaningly, "but I hope so!"

Ellen blushed. "I had given such strict orders to admit no callers," she sighed. "Ninette is growing careless."

"But I am not an ordinary caller. I am Summer, who is overtaking you with his flowers, his fragrance, his mysteries, his caresses." He gently took her hand. "Summer, against whom you cannot guard yourself; Summer, who has never yet touched your heart; Summer, whom you will yet call upon with outstretched arms!"

Ellen leaned back with closed eyes. Was it the odor of the violets, or the soft whispering voice, that paralyzed her will power?

"You are mistaken," she murmured. "I am of a prosaic, matter-of-fact nature. Summer does not visit such as I—"

"You are ready now," he said, rising and stepping behind her chair. "All your frigidity is buried in flowers. We shall celebrate the summer solstice!"

Ellen jumped up and went to the window. He followed her. "Do you hear the turmoil outside? Listen to the merry-makers taking hold of life! How safe you are here, behind your closed shutters! Both heart and home locked with iron bolts and bars!"

"Who are you," asked Ellen excitedly, "that you speak to me like this?"

"A member of your circle of acquaintances," he said in a changed voice.

She started. In fear and trembling, she felt a delicate web of shining threads enshrouding her clear consciousness. She was no longer able to think as she pleased, but had to feel as she must.

"Pierrot, speak louder. What does this masquerade mean?" she whispered.

He laid his hand upon hers, which was clinging to the casement. "What does it mean? Lay it aside, and a gray everyday individual stands before you, no longer at liberty to hold your hand—"

"Go!" cried Ellen savagely.

"Very well. I am going. You remain—with the violets, and with the memories—and tomorrow you will say: 'What a pity!'"

"How conceited you are!"

The Pierrot made a low obeisance. "The hour flies, whose sweetness we have not known how to enjoy. Farewell!"

"Pierrot!" Ellen involuntarily took a step forward.

He turned. "Well?"

"Well?" repeated Ellen, pressing one of the violet bouquets against her eyes.

He suddenly stood beside her. "You must know that I love you? Perhaps since today only! And you love me—since the last few minutes!"

Ellen trembled. "Ridiculous! A Pierrot?"

"No—it is I you love!"

She tried to laugh, but he talked on rapidly, as if he feared her laughter. "Now you are beautiful—now that you have learned to be afraid—"

"Afraid? I? Of a Pierrot?"

He bent down over her. "Not of me—but of the new feeling, that you have denied—the wonderful intoxication of summer."

Ellen held her hands over her ears. "Go away! Go! Nobody has ever dared to speak to me like that!"

"I know I am the first to do so. I am proud to be the first who teaches you to stammer like a baby, to stammer and blush."

His lips burned on her hand, and she let it pass with a strange, absent smile. A warm wave was rushing through her veins. It was as if his mouth was seeking hers—

But the Pierrot rapidly turned away. "I believe I shall still love you tomorrow, and the day after tomorrow, and always. But now I shall go of my own accord—do you hear me? Of my own accord, without your command. Farewell!"

The door slammed. Ellen breathed deeply. She rubbed her eyes. The bell clanged loudly. Ninette rushed in and asked for her orders.

"Tomorrow!" she smiled absently, as if helpless. "Nothing, Ninette, I want nothing."

III.

Ash-Wednesday! Ten o'clock in the forenoon. Half faded violets in all the jardinieres, vases, and tumblers. Ellen sat before her breakfast tray; she was cold and chilly.

"Ninette, bring me my furs. What are you waiting for?"

"Not the knitted shawl?"

Ellen stamped her foot. It was incredible how nervous she felt today. "Do as you are told."

It was some time before Ninette reappeared, dragging the fur boa and holding in her hand a tray with a dainty package.

"This has just been left at the door. The man is waiting for an answer."

"Thank you." Blushing deeply, Ellen unraveled the gilt cord with which the pasteboard box was tied. The lid dropped, and she cautiously lifted from its moist bed of green mosses a most beautiful rose—one of those marvelous black roses, with their golden hearts and their wonderful noonday fragrance. A visiting card had been carefully attached with gilt wire to the firm stem, which still carried all its thorns. The card held a few words only:

"The Rose of Virtue. For Ellen, from Pierrot. May he return?"

"Harry! exclaimed Ellen. Her small hands clinched, and her delicate nostrils quivered. "I never want to see him again—never—never—never!"

"The man is waiting for an answer," the French maid reminded her timidly. "It is to be only yes or no."

"Very well," said Ellen hastily. "Open the windows! It is frightfully warm in her! Tell him to say—"

"I beg your pardon?"

"Yes!"

Auto Notes

The catalogue of the new Rambler, just issued by Thomas B. Jeffery & Company, contains among other striking illustrations a beautiful color frontispiece of the new Rambler Fifty-Five, the leader of the Rambler line for 1910. The new Rambler is built in what is now considered the largest automobile factory in the world. Every part of this car is made in this plant which has been in operation every single working day for nearly ten years. The new Ramblers are said to be superior in point of quality to all previous Ramblers and now rank among the highest priced cars, although the new forty-five horsepower Rambler sells for $2,500.

F. W. Conrad, a Franklin owner in Montesano, Wn., writes that by actual speedometer reading and not guess work, the Diamond Tires on his cars gave the following mileage: left front, 9,420 miles; right front, 9,348 miles; right rear, 9,188 miles and left rear, 9,178 miles.

Mr. Ed. Waterman of the firm of Waterman Brothers Company, agents for the Buick and Oldsmobile in Fresno, was in town recently to drive home a 1910 40 horsepower Buick Roadster. Mr. Waterman placed an order with the Howard Automible Company for a carload of 1910 Buick white streaks, to be shipped direct from the factory as soon as possible. Mr. Waterman says the outlook for the automobile business in his territory is remarkable at this time of the year, and that they expect to double last year's business at least.

The Howard Automobile Company delivered an Oldsmobile recently to Mr. T. I. Fitzpatrick who is a prominent member of the Olympic Club.

A good talking point on the Hudson car is the fact that the crank is removable, and this advantage has been responsible for several sales. In one instance Mr. Dawson, Manager of the Pioneer Automobile Company in Oakland, was endeavoring to sell a Hudson car to a physician whose car, of another make, had recently been stolen and not returned for several days. Upon being convinced that the crank could be removed by the driver and taken with him wherever he went, the doctor placed his order. The point might be raised that there was danger of losing the crank, but this is practically impossible as it is held by a ball thrust and spring that keep the car absolutely in position.

At the headquarters of the Rambler Automobile Company of New York during the Automobile Show there was shown a stock of duplicates of every part of every Rambler car manufactured in the Rambler factory since the factory was started ten years ago. The importance of being able to purchase an extra part with ease and dispatch has never been fully realized by new purchasers of automobiles but has always been considered of great importance by people who have owned cars. The New York exhibit by the Rambler representatives illustrates what has been accomplished by Thomas B. Jeffery & Company in this respect within the last ten years. The growth of this factory has been entirely in the direction of making every single part of every Rambler car in the best possible way. Today every important part of the car is made in the Rambler factory and every Rambler dealer is in a position to carry all necessary extra parts.

Among the recent sales reported by the Standard Motor Car Company are: Arthur Sharman of Sultana, Smith & Sweet of Modesto, Lawrence Waters of St. Helena, Don L. Brundage of Bakersfield.

Recent purchasers of Velie cars are: P. A. Callaghan of Watsonville and C. A. Crowe of Mountain View.

The Los Angeles Licensed Dealers' Association has decided to hold the Pasadena-Altadena Hill Climb this year on February 22. In talking about this Hill Climb, Charles Howard, the head of the Howard Automobile Company, says that the Buick line will be represented in every class. The little White Streak will be sent in on the Small Car Class. The new Buick "30" will be in the Intermediate Class, and Howard himself will go down to drive one of the "40" Roadsters, a duplicate of the car driven by Chevrolet in the East which has won during this season, in open competition, 204 firsts, 64 seconds and 33 thirds; one of the most remarkable records in the history of the automobile. Mr. Howard is confident that the Buicks will, as usual, give a good account of themselves in the three different classes in which they will be entered.

The very newest thing at the A. L. A. M. Automobile Show was the rotating chassis displayed by the E. R. Thomas Motor Company of Buffalo, maker of the Thomas Flyer. During previous shows attempts have been made to show the under parts of a car by means of a large mirror placed on the floor under the chassis. This arrangement gave but an imperfect view. The Thomas company has mounted the whole chassis so that it turns over and over, making a complete revolution once each minute. All that the observer has to do is to stand still and in one minute he is shown the top view, side view and bottom view of the machine. To still further improve, and to further attract, a series of 16 boxes with glass sides have been arranged to light up, one immediately after another. These signs call attention to the new Thomas features, notably the new long stroke motor used in the 1910 Model "M," the new six-cylinder machine. As the electric lamps flash, first in one sign box, and then in another, the special features of the car are silently and quickly set forth. The whole arrangement gives in one minute top, bottom and side views of the car, and calls attention in a "silent sales talk" to 16 of the principal features.

Mr. R. K. Roberts of the Howard Automobile Company who is making a trip through the Northwest in the interest of the Buick and Oldsmobile, writes that the dealers throughout the Northwest territory are anticipating a phenomenal business on both of these cars for the season of 1910. Owing to weather conditions, the automobile business in the Northwest has always been at a standstill during the winter months. This winter, in spite of the bad weather, cars are being delivered about as fast as they can be gotten in. The Portland dealers are holding an Automobile Show during the week of January 24 to 29. The Portland agents for the Buick line are so short of cars that it will be necessary for the Howard Automobile Company to help out by lending them some cars from their San Francisco stock.

Among the many prominent purchasers of the Diamond Grip Tires this week were P. C. Huntington, Dr. Burnham, Kimball-Upson Co., C. A. Miller, J. C. Chaddock and the Park Garage.

A Volume of Addresses

The biographical addresses delivered by Judge Emory Speer on special occasions will prove a welcome volume for the more serious section of the library. They include his Abraham Lincoln, Robert Edward Lee, Ulysses S. Grant, James Edward Oglethorpe, Alexander Hamilton, John Marshall, Thomas, Lord Erskine and Joseph Emerson Brown, with portraits of the subjects and an introduction by Charles Ray Palmer, D. D. Lectures and addresses which are composed with a view to oral delivery are apt to fall short when presented in cold type, and it therefore says much for Judge Speer's ability that these essays are interesting enough in their embalmed form to carry the reader through not only without a loss of interest but with a distinct regret that they could not have been heard as well as read. Designed for the edification of collegians and law students, the addresses partake of none of the features now characterized as "popular," that is to say, familiar, superficial and "funny," but they are popular in the old sense in which the Lyceum Lectures of long ago used to be considered, designed to give information not concerning the trivial incidents of life but rather to crystallize the character and principles which actuated the men, to make them living forces rather than political puppets. Judge Emory Speer is Judge of the Southern District of Georgia, Dean of the Law School of Merced University and author of a number of standard works of law. The "Addresses" is published by the Neale Company of New York and Washington.

"Lost Borders"

Some years ago, in an interview, Mrs. Mary Austin said it was useless for her to leave the desert region about Inyo for she would be sure to go back to it. Readers who fell under the spell of "The Land of Little Rain" and "The Flock" will be glad to learn that in "Lost Borders" she has returned and if one may take the sentiment of the introductory verses she, too, is glad to be at home. There are fourteen chapters loosely strung together after the manner of tales related in a desultory conversation, a name or an incident suggesting something else. "Out there, then, where the law and the landmarks fail together, the souls of little men fade out at the edges, leak from them as water from wooden pails warped asunder. Out there, where the borders of conscience break down, where there is no convention, and behavior is of little account except as it gets you your desire, almost anything might happen, does happen in fact, though I shall have trouble making you believe it. Out there where the boundary of soul and sense is as faint as a trail in a sandstorm, I have seen things happen that I do not believe myself." And so, if the author's name was not in itself a guarantee that this will prove no commonplace recital of trivialities, one is forewarned of what to anticipate—not tales of the supernatural and magical, but stories of what flesh and blood men and women, conventional enough perhaps in other surroundings, are led or driven or drifted into doing under the spell of the land. Let us hope that some day Mrs. Austin will have confidence enough in our acquired manners, if not faith in our credulity to tell us those other tales which she now withholds because they would gain her no credit with us. One regrets that she has not seen fit to include in this collection "The Pot of Gold," which, besides being an excellent short story in itself, has now, it seems, become the genesis of a lost mine myth, like the "Wagonwheel," "Gun Sight," "Peg-Leg" and so many more which are periodically "rediscovered." One needs a new point of view from which to judge the conduct of the "squaw men" who figure in some of these narratives. Indeed one must slough off much of the acquired, city-made code of action and remember that there are no neighbors across the street, no policeman around the corner and no minister to exhort to righteousness; that men, and women, too, stand or fall alone by the virtue which is in them. "There is a sort of man bred up in close communities, like a cask, to whom the church, public opinion, the social note, are a sort of hoop to hold him in serviceable shape. Without these there are a good many ways of going to pieces." "The Hoodoo of the Minnietta," the recital of the persistent ill fortune which dogged the heels of the successive owners of the mine, and "The Pocket Hunter's Story" touch the bounds of the supernatural, though any close observer must have noted the singular coincidences which have given certain houses, stores and other properties a reputation for being "unlucky." "The Walking Woman" came in for a share of adverse criticism when it was published as a separate story, but perhaps those who took exception to it then will view it from a different angle now that it is placed in its right setting. Many of the other tales were published in Harper's Weekly, and the only fault to be found is that there are not more of them. The people in them are all intensely alive and active. They do not present themselves as "creations" nor as lay figures posed for moving pictures, but as actual residents of the Death Valley region, going about their affairs oblivious of the "chiel among them taking notes." One might expect to meet "The Woman at the Eighteen-Mile," or "The Pocket Hunter," or "Long Tom Bassit," or "Little Pete," the silent shepherd who made friends with "The Last Antelope," while the Indian women, not beautiful or supernaturally gifted with charms of mind, but utilitarian, faithful after their own conception of faith, and willing, are the only ones of their race who approximate in literature what they are in life. Mrs. Austin is not a prolific writer but when she does consent to give us of her store it is always something above and out of common. She is doing for our smaller desert what Robert Hichens has accomplished for the Sahara, making it something more than a desolate, unpopulated waste. "Lost Borders" is one of the late productions of the Harper press.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE SOLD

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 2010.

In the Matter of the Guardianship of the Estates of CHARLES CLARKE KEENEY and HELEN MADELINE KEENEY, Minors.

It appearing to this Court, from the petition of James Ward Keeney, guardian of the estates of CHARLES CLARKE KEENEY and HELEN MADELINE KEENEY, minors, and from the petition of Marie Adele Keeney and Mary Alvord Keeney, copetitioners of said James Ward Keeney, praying for an order for the sale of the undivided one-tenth interest of each of said minors of, in and to the real estate hereinafter particularly described; that each of said wards owns an undivided one-tenth interest in and to that certain piece of real property situate in the town of Berkeley, County of Alameda, State of California, bounded and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Channing Way, distant thereon three hundred (300) feet westerly from the northwesterly corner of Bowditch Street and Channing Way; running thence westerly along said north line of Channing Way one hundred and fifty (150) feet; thence at right angles northerly two hundred and sixty (260) feet to the south line of Durant Avenue; thence at right angles easterly one hundred and fifty (150) feet along said south line of Durant Avenue; and thence at right angles southerly two hundred and sixty (260) feet to the said north line of Channing Way and point of commencement; being all of lot two (2) in Block ten (10) College Homestead Association, as per map thereof recorded in Book T of Deeds in the office of the Recorder of said Alameda County at page 799, except forty feet of the north end heretofore given toward right of way for said Durant Avenue.

That it would be beneficial to each of said minors that the undivided one-tenth interest of each should be sold.

Therefore it is hereby ordered, that the next of kin of the said CHARLES CLARKE KEENEY and HELEN MADELINE KEENEY, and all persons interested in the estates of each of them, appear before this Court on the 31st day of January, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m. of said day in the Courtroom of Department number 9 of said Court, in the Grant Building, situate at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of the undivided one-tenth interest of each of said minors in said real estate.

Done in open Court this 24th day of December, A. D. 1909.
J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed Dec. 24, 1909. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 7673, Dept. No. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate and Guardianship of EMIL DIELING, LOUIS DIELING, JOHN DIELING Jr., and CHARLES SCANLAN, also known as CHARLES SCANLON, also known as CHARLES DIELING, Minors.

John Dieling, guardian of the persons and estates of the above named minors, Emil Dieling, Louis Dieling, John Dieling Jr., and Bertha Richards, the guardian of the person and estate of the above named minor, Charles Scanlan, also known as Charles Scanlon, also known as Charles Dieling, having presented to this Court and filed herein their duly verified petition, praying for an order of sale of the real property belonging to the estates of said minors, and it appearing to the Court from said petition, that it would be beneficial to the wards that said real property, the sale of which is asked for in said petition, should be sold, and that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said minors and each of them, and those interested therein, that such sale be had, and good cause appearing therefor,

It is hereby ordered by the Court that the next of kin of said minors, and all persons interested in their estates, appear before this Court, Department No. 10, Probate, on the 31st day of January, 1910, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of said department of said Court, in the Grant Building, Southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, San Francisco, California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to said guardians for the sale of said real property, and that it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks before the time appointed for said hearing, in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed in said City and County of San Francisco.

Done in open Court this 27th day of December, 1909.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Action No. 19,[illegible], Dept. No. 4.

ANTONIO DEVOTO, Plaintiff,

vs.

All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANTONIO DEVOTO, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PIECE NO. 1

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Westerly line of Powell Street with the Southerly line of Green Street and running thence Westerly along the said Southerly line of Green Street sixty-eight (68) feet, thence at right angles Southerly and parallel with Powell Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches, and thence at right angles Easterly sixty-eight (68) feet to the Westerly line of Powell Street; and thence at right angles Northerly and along the said Westerly line of Powell Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine inches (9) to the point of beginning. Being a part of Fifty (50) Vara Block No. 156.

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Northerly line of Francisco Street with the Easterly line of Stockton Street, and running thence Northerly and along said Easterly line of Stockton Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; thence at right angles Easterly forty-one (41) feet and eight (8) inches; thence at right angles Southerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches to the Northerly line of Francisco Street; and thence at right angles Westerly forty-one (41) feet and eight (8) inches to the Easterly line of Stockton Street and point of commencement. Being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot No. 1515.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 9th day of December, A. D. 1909.

The Heroism of the Study

There are few finer examples of the heroism of the study than that presented by the late Professor Finsen, the discoverer of the light-cure for lupus, who died a few years ago. For the last twenty years of his too short life, he suffered from painful diseases of the heart and liver, to which dropsy was superadded, and it was only by daily self-denial and the strictest of dieting, that he was able to live at all.

Yet for all these years, living in the very shadow of death, and in constant suffering, he stuck bravely to his great life work, even studying his own diseases with the keenest attention, and writing articles on them for medical journals. The last two or three years of his life were spent lying on his back, unable even to be carried to his beloved Institute a few yards away; and yet the lion-hearted scientist never relaxed for a single day his gallant fight for his fellow men against disease.

The heroism of the Danish professor reminds one of a similar brave battle waged by an English professor, J. R. Green, the historian, against disease and pain. It was in 1869, when the disease which had assailed him for many years finally prostrated him, and when the doctors gave him no hope of living more than six months, that Green set to work to write his famous "Short History of the English People." Day after day he toiled at his task, holding desperately on to life, and in a state of ceaseless pain and exhaustion; and so brave was the man's spirit, that he actually prolonged his life for five years. Even he was bound to confess, "I wonder how in those years of physical pain and despondency I could ever have written the book at all."

General Grant's "Autobiography," which brought his widow the enormous sum of $500,000, was written under even more trying conditions than Green's "History." In 1884, the year before his death, the ex-President found himself bankrupt through the failure of a firm in which he was a partner, and face to face with the prospect of dying penniless and leaving his wife destitute. It was at this terrible crisis that he began to write the story of his stirring career for a firm of publishers. But the cup of his misfortune was not yet full. A cancer formed at the root of his tongue, and the gallant soldier, already doomed to death, was compelled to write day and night, suffering constant and severe agony. He completed his colossal task just four days before the merciful end came, having thus performed in his study, and in his bedroom, an act of heroism which has never been eclipsed on any field of battle.

Mrs. Browning, too, one remembers, wrote most of her beautiful poems "confined to a darkened chamber, to which only her own family and a few devoted friends could be admitted, in great weakness, and almost unintermittent suffering, with her favorite spaniel as a companion."

The German poet Heine was another martyr and hero of the study. The last seven years of his life were spent on his "mattress-grave," racked with such excruciating pain, that he had to take doses of opium large enough to have killed several men, in order to give him a few blessed hours of freedom from it. Through all these years of torture, he not only bore himself with a noble resignation and cheerfulness, but produced many of his finest and most finished works, including his "Last Poems and Thoughts," and his "Confessions."

Sir Walter Scott's heroic struggle with misfortune and failing health during the closing years of his life, is perhaps too well known to call for more than mention. After the commercial crash came which left him crushed with debt, and with shattered eyes and worn brain he toiled for years, often as much as fourteen hours a day, until the end came, and with it the lifting of all burdens.

Who does not recall the patience and pluck which enabled Frank Smedley to write his books on a "bed of anguish"; how for years Edna Lyall literally kept death at bay by her brave spirit and her busy pen; how Mr. Clark Russell preserved a bright spirit and set a magnificent example of patience and industry while on "the daily rack of rheumatism"; and how much of Sir Arthur Sullivan's sweetest music was distilled from pain?

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys, FREE
Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, etc. Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?
I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.
It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

The Food Trust

At present the Food Trust is enjoying a monopoly for which it has no stomach—a monopoly of public attention. Against all trusts, despite high authority that affirms the beneficence of some of them, widespread prejudice has existed for many years, but the Food Trust is the first against which public sentiment has crystallized and for the destruction of which popular energy has been organized. The Food Trust is of course the meanest and most sordid of all trusts. It preys upon the vital necessities of the people, and its evil effects are especially severe upon the poor. The magnates of other trusts may be merely avaricious and cruel; the men that have cornered food products and deprived the weak of nourishment are worse than inhuman; they are monsters engaged in the manipulation of a terrible machine whose wheels crush out human life. Conditions that they are producing with deliberation, with the ugliest of selfish motives, once upon a time grew out of indifference and folly and inspired the Paris Commune. These men are dancing on a volcano. They have provoked the whole people to indignation, they have made the common heart resentfully beat in unison.

Our Own Hogs

Of all the subjects that are now enjoying the attention of our statesmen there is none that compares in importance with that of the high price of living. The ultimate consumer is no longer to be treated with levity. There is clamorous, insistent, angry demand for his relief and protection. Something must be done to abate the gouging of him, and whatever it is it must be done quickly. Politicians cannot afford to neglect him much longer. For the present he is not interested in hackneyed discussions of time-worn expedients for augmenting the public revenue or abating the extravagances of government. He sees that the country is prosperous, he knows there is an abundance of the necessaries of life and that in the labor market there is no abnormal excess of supply. In the circumstances why the cost of living should have soared to extraordinary heights is a question explicable on the hypothesis only that somebody whose hoggishness is unrestrained is waxing indecently fat. The ultimate consumer, startled by the leanness of his own shadow, is not in a mood to be trifled with. He is tired of platitudes. What he wants is redress; nothing else will pacify him. The politicians in Washington are promising to come to the rescue; but the problem to be solved is one with local as well as national phases. We have a food trust here in San Francisco, one that regulates the price of fish and vegetables. We also have a coal trust that impudently and brutally gouges consumers. Consequently there is urgent need of a relief expedition in the interest of the victims of the local trusts. It is high time for the local politicians who have been devoting all their leisure moments to capitalizing their hostility to the public service corporations to turn their attention to the hoggish individuals who have made the succulent, and at one time cheap and commonplace crab, a luxury beyond the dreams of the middle-class epicure. It might be worth the while of our politicians to ascertain why fish that are indigenous to the densely animated waters hereabouts become like pearls after they emerge from the nets of the prosperous gentlemen who control the market. And certainly our politicians could render no greater service to the ultimate consumer than to ascertain by what alchemy coal is changed into precious stone while serving as ballast in ships that come from the Antipodes. The suspicion is current that the only genuine accomplished hold-up artists operating in this section of the country are the gentlemen that regulate the price of some of the necessaries of life. It is also suspected that somebody has guaranteed them immunity. Let us have some light on the subject.

The Tobacco Trust

The only trust that is being vigorously prosecuted at this moment is the Tobacco Trust whose methods and practices have been compared with those of some of the daring pirates that roamed the high seas in days of old. This trust is now on trial in the United States Supreme Court where Attorney-General Wickersham has been pursuing it relentlessly. The Tobacco Trust has grown from an humble beginning in 1890, when it comprised but five firms and a limited capital, to the present combination of sixty-five firms or twenty-five individuals controlling aggregated assets exceeding $400,000,000. According to the Attorney-General this trust has progressively absorbed competitors or driven them out of business by oppressively attacking or threatening to attack with unfair trade methods. The members of this combination have obtained dominion over the agencies through which tobacco and its products are bought and sold. The annual dividends of the trust range from twenty to thirty-two per cent. Attorney-General Wickersham expects to force this gigantic trust into dissolution, but his efforts in that direction are not attracting much attention at present. Tobacco is a luxury, and besides the price is not prohibitive. The fight against the trust is of interest particularly to persons engaged in the trade. The common people are interested in the fight only to the extent to which they are interested in the trust-busting ability of Attorney-General Wickersham. With the Food Trust in the saddle we keenly feel the importance of having in the Attorney-General's office a man capable of bringing our voracious captains of industry to their knees.

Hearst and Taft

What means the change of attitude of the Hearst papers toward the Taft administration? Like those of Providence mysterious are the ways of Mr. Hearst and past finding out, yet always an inspiring theme of speculation. Some months ago Mr. Hearst was in a great rage at what he conceived to be the awful prospect of Senator Root's appointment to the Supreme Court. Promptly and with an undertone of menace he served notice on Mr. Taft that the eyes of the nation were upon him. Solemnly he warned the people of the awful danger impending, the danger of the elevation to the highest tribunal in the land of the man who incurred his undying hostility in a certain memorable campaign in New York. But the danger seems to have passed. A vacancy occurred in the Supreme Court, and Root was not chosen to fill it. Is Hearst's friendly attitude to the Administration to be accounted for on the theory that he acknowledges a debt of gratitude? Rumor holds her tongue, and the sources of light are inaccessible. The switch in Mr. Hearst's sentiments occurred suddenly a week or so ago. It was detected by readers of the effusions of John Temple Graves that radiate from Washington, D. C. At the opening of the current session of Congress Mr. Graves viewed with academic disapproval the tendencies of the Administration, so apparent to him was it that Mr. Taft was a reactionary. Mr. Graves longed for a refreshing breath of the atmosphere of the Tennis Cabinet. With an ecstatic air of devotion he meditated on the ways of Him, the Mighty Hunter, and he yearned for a sanctified recrudescence. But lo! between two days the obsession vanished. Mr. Graves lost sympathy with the muckrakers who have been utilizing the pestiferous Pinchot for their sinister political purposes, and since then he has taken more than one occasion to contrast Taft and Roosevelt to the latter's disadvantage. Hence the inference that there has been something doing, that an entente cordiale has been established between the Administration and the great Tribune whose affections are as variable as the winds and not less capricious.

The Increased Duty on Champagne

When the framers of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill increased the duty on champagne from $6 a case to $9.60 a case, they were actuated by the necessity for providing a larger revenue for the government and were apparently justified by the obvious fact that champagne is a luxury which can stand the imposition of a stiff sumptuary duty. Their reasoning would have been worthy of commendation if the importation of champagne had remained the same under the heavier tariff, but it has not. The imports of French champagne formerly amounted to about 20,000 cases a month but since the raising of the duty the average has been about 5,000 cases a month. Obviously the government is encountering a loss of revenue instead of a gain, but this is true of many imports under the new tariff schedules and it would not have been mentioned here if it had not a particular interest for the winemakers of California. Americans consume tremendous quantities of champagne and will undoubtedly continue to do so, no matter how high the tariff may be boosted. If the amount of the seductive French beverage that was tipped over the tongues of our thirsty revelers on New Year's Eve were set down here it would seem well nigh incredible. While the agents may have been temporarily frightened into curtailing their orders as a result of the increased duty, the inexorable law of supply and demand will probably soon induce them to import in quantities as of yore. Meanwhile the winemen of California have an excellent opportunity to advertise the quality of the vintages which are produced in this State. California vineyards produce every variety of wine and there is no reason why the wine-drinkers of the United States should not be told so in such striking fashion that they will cultivate a taste for our various brands. The wine business of this State is still in its infancy while the adequate exploitation of California wines is entirely a thing of the future. Let the winemen seize the opportunity presented by the reduced importation of French champagne to push their own wines into popular favor.

The Water Problem

The Examiner says that though our municipal officials and experts have agreed that the properties of the Spring Valley Water Company are worth $35,000,000 we are not bound to accept that valuation as a basis on which to compute rates. This is quite true. Whatever is the actual value of the properties that are held to be essential to the legitimate purposes of the company is the basis upon which rates must be fixed. This value is to be estimated for rate-fixing purposes, not for the purpose of sale. Besides the people are not bound by the judgment of men who are no longer authorized by law to fix rates. But why enter upon a renewal of the old controversy between the corporation and the vociferous defenders of the people's rights? Is it not about time to call a halt on the practice of corporation-baiting for demagogic purposes and to get down to business with a view to doing justice at once to ourselves and the stockholders of the water company? Experience has taught us that baiting the octopus is an occupation profitable only to politicians and thrifty journalists. It has never proved advantageous to the rate-payers. Harassed by demagogues the company has not been able to attend strictly to the business of supplying the city with water. Let us not continue to encourage the demagogues whose insincerity has been exposed by their recent change of front, when they admitted the purity of Spring Valley water and the fairness of the company's appraisement of its properties. Nor let us delude ourselves with the notion that as we have decided on building our own water system we have solved the water problem. We must still look to the Spring Valley Company for our supply, and it would be wise for us to eliminate political considerations while arriving at a conclusion as to how our interests may be conserved. Just before the Supervisors agreed to submit the purchase proposition to the people they discussed several other propositions that had been made by the company. Among these was an offer to guarantee the city an adequate supply of pure water for a term of years at a rate to be fixed in advance for the whole term. Perhaps the acceptance of this proposition would solve the problem. It would certainly enable the company to keep out of politics during the term agreed upon. Now if permitted to get out of politics the company can afford to cut rates. With a long term of immunity from political molestation ahead it could reduce its estimate of "operating expenses" and prepare to deal with the city on a strictly business basis. Such a situation would be highly advantageous to the rate-payers, but would it meet with the approval of the politicians?

JEWELERS' BUILDING

that has evoked from the New York World the observation that there is a closer relationship of literature to politics in England than exists here. "If," says the World, "a college president occasionally received a Cabinet portfolio as a reward for party services and an author once in a while became a Governor, we should have something like the political conditions in England and the result would be distinctly for the improvement of American politics." Why this difference exists is a question the World does not attempt to solve. Yet it is an interesting question, and one that may be deserving of reflection; for perhaps it would be advantageous to us to sprinkle our malodorous politics with a little of the fragrant essence of the literary art. Why do we neglect to do so? It may be answered that we don't; that we have had in the public service such men as Motley, Bancroft, Lowell, Everett and Hay, and that at present we have in the Senate so cultured a scholar as Mr. Lodge. But most of the literary men of a high order who have been identified with politics in this country were far from being politicians. Most of the literary men of distinction that have figured in the service of the government got into it by appointment. They did not practice politics. They were not conciliators of public opinion. The fact is that the taste for literature and the taste for the American brand of politics are somewhat incompatible. A taste for politics in this country is something vastly different from a taste for politics in England. A taste for politics in this country is a taste for much that is nauseating, for much that is repugnant to refined minds. In England, on the contrary there are many opportunities for political activity that may be grasped without the slightest sacrifice of self-respect. Besides in England the appreciation of literary talent is more widespread than in this country. Also there is no such scarcity of literary talent in England as exists in our Republic. We have innumerable scribblers, not many literary artists; and they that are possessed of literary ability, unlike English men of letters, are versed in little else but the literary forms to which they devote their talents. Most of the literary men of England have cultivated a taste for the philosophy of history and the science of government, and it is natural for them to adapt themselves to politics. The only profession in this country in which this taste is cultivated is the profession of law and that is why the lawyers run our government. It is perhaps not so much to be deplored that literary men do not predominate in the service of the government as that, of the lawyers that do predominate, comparatively few are men of distinction in their profession. In other words it is our misfortune that we are truly democratic; we exalt mediocrity and discourage talent.

Perspective Impressions

Hearst brought Paulhan to us, but not the storm. Call him His Satanic Majesty if you will, but remember that storms are acts of God.

The British-German war scare and the glowing prospect of perpetual peace are current phenomena that invite to philosophic study and cynical reflection.

The expected has happened. William J. Bryan has announced that he will be a candidate for President in 1912.

"Let your wife boss the home," urges a Chicago minister who probably doesn't keep a servant.

Sitting up aloft and alone in the Mount Hamilton observatory, studying Halley's comet, is a case of holding a tete-a-tete with the infinite.

The newspapers of Portland have been experimenting on Mr. Heney, and they have found that without publicity he is absolutely incapable of getting inspiration for a frenzy.

Alice Cleaver

By H. B. S.

(Alice Cleaver was a laundress, aged 20, recently convicted at the Old Bailey of the murder of her infant son whom she had thrown through a railway carriage window. She disputed the identity of the body found on the line with her own child, which she said she had given to a woman to take care of, though it could not of course be produced. The dead child was clothed in a petticoat which was identified as that of her own baby. One of the features of the trial was the coolness and self-possession of the prisoner, even when cross-examined by the judge. Though such cases are automatically reprieved, the existing state of the law gave the judge no option but to sentence her to death with all due solemnity. The poem was written by the attorney who defended the woman and is now published for the first time, having been sent to Town Talk by Herman Scheffauer who is an intimate friend of the author.)

Murder! yet neither ghoul nor Gorgon dyed
In all the richness of her victim's blood;
But just indicted for infanticide
With smile serene a youthful mother stood.

With face austere, the huge and scarlet mass
Of Justice, with its bland and shaven chin,
Looms on the dais, wary lest should pass
From out its clutch the crimson shape of sin.

Into the cushioned box the jurors troop,
Each visage blank yet pregnant with its doom
Momentous of sweet freedom or the loop,
Inscrutable with life or with the tomb.

Implacable and cold the hunters dart
Barbed facts of poison at the victim's frame,
While others help the quarry to a start,
Playing with hireling zest the human game.

With nostrils wide for news the Fleet Street pack
Hang avidly on each successive mood,
And as they hollow hot upon the track
They write and smear their yellow lines with blood.

And now the damsel who the cynics say
Has killed the offspring of a vetoed troth,
Down to the box slow swings her slouching way
And gently stakes her life upon her oath.

Her life upon the long and thin-spun lie,
She weaves with that most meek and stolid purr;—
Watch the fine sangfroid of each neat reply,
Her calm "my lord" and her respectful "sir."

And now the poignant drama that they played,
The rabid Furies that her footsteps dog,
Have dwindled to the chatter of a maid
And gentleman in placid dialogue;

Yet not to weather nor domestic hearth,
Is turned the speeches' murmured interchange,
But to the sudden passing from this earth
Of that poor mangled infant swift and strange;

No master scolds a young and careless drudge,
For objects lost or for her work undone,
But clothing death in tones of silk—a judge
Questions a girl who has destroyed a son.

Be silent, feed the dying flame of hope,
For now her champion frames his final case,
Strives to unwind the ever tightening rope,
That closer draws its unreturned embrace.

Hear him with what pathetic words import
What true conviction; hear him whisper, shout,
And strive to find within that damning court
Salvation in a little cloud of doubt.

A little cloud no bigger than the hand
Of the dead baby, yet with fevered breath
Larger and larger is the cloudlet fanned
To whelm that ruthless clarity of death;

To whelm the overwhelming, what avails
The counsel's passion or the woman's youth?
When Justice poises the insidious scales
And deftly loads the golden dice with truth;

Oh, will the truth outweigh the tiny speck
Of doubt? or will they in that secret room,
With eyes half-fixed upon a writhing neck
With all their travail hatch that monstrous doom?

Will they? What boots it? let the woman parch
Her soul with agony, in the selfsame place
Justice in its inexorable march
With tireless gait pursues another case.

* * * * * * * *

Ah! watch those grave and solemn faces, learn
The adamantine tomb that they have built,
As the twelve arbiters of fate return
Pronouncing slow the leaden word of guilt,

Of molten searing guilt, but yet the truth
Silver with mercy! if they cannot bend,
With platitudes anent her helpless youth
The twelve good men and true can "recommend."

And now that saddest tragedy is o'er,
But see that drollest comedy begin,
As th' usher calls for silence, oh encore!
Oh set your mouth into a broader grin!

The looming Virtue o'er the quivering Vice
Its sadd'ning visage to a heartfelt prayer
Religiously composes; in a trice
The usher swift adjusts the fatal square.

And now the Law's red majesty you scan
Whose ethics unimpeachable are bent
To urge the maiden in Life's short'ning span,
By mercy of her Maker "to repent."

"Repent although you live, and pious pray,
For though in fact you 'scape the gallow's goal,
You shall be hanged by your young neck, and may
That other Lord have mercy on your soul!"

Oh, is it not to gain by gloze and cheat
The busy ear of Providence, to—well,
God's blessing for a parting soul entreat
That shortly parts for neither Heaven nor Hell,

But just for Aylesbury, chained in the dead years,
To toil in solitude half slave, half nun,
A deadened thing with neither hopes nor fears
As the vast years slide slowly one by one!

Remorse? why yes, reproachful still may ring,
Through that poor soul dulled under crawling Time,
The petticoat she left on the dead thing,
The tiny flaw that marred the perfect crime.

The Arrest of Arsene Lupin

By Maurice Leblanc (From the French)

What a strange voyage this turned out to be! And yet it had commenced so pleasantly. At first the sea had been a mirror reflecting the clear blue sky. Never in my life did I start out upon a trip which it seemed to me would end more pleasantly. La Provence is an ocean greyhound, very comfortable, and commanded by a man who is as distinguished as a sailor as he is courteous as a gentleman. The passengers in the first cabin belong to the very best society. Acquaintances were quickly made and all sorts of games and amusements were organized. We had that delightful sensation of being away from the whole world, inhabiting some forgotten island, and consequently there was that feeling of intimacy which always arises among people who are dependent upon one another.

Yet nowadays there is one link which, until you are nearly in midocean, connects you with the land, and that is the wireless telegraph.

We had left the French coast about five hundred miles behind us and were speeding swiftly along under the powerful impulse of the twin screws when suddenly a thunder-storm arose. At this same moment the telegraph insstrument began to work and the following despatch was received:

Arsene Lupin is on board your ship in the first-class cabin; blond hair, wound on the right forearm; he is traveling alone under the name of R—.

At this moment there came a terrific clap of thunder, the lightning flashed in the dark sky and the electric waves were interrupted. We did not receive the remainder of the despatch. Of the name which the famous Arsene Lupin had assumed we had but the first letter.

Had the news been of any other character, I do not doubt but that the secret would have been scrupulously kept, but there are certain communications which it seems absolutely impossible to conceal, and which of their own accord break down the bars of discretion. That very day, without anyone being able to tell how it occurred, we all knew that Arsene Lupin was in our midst.

Think of it! The most famous thief of Europe, of whose exploits the newspapers had been telling for months! He was the strange personage with whom old Ganimard, the best detective in the force, was engaged in a duel to the death, and many were the strange and romantic incidents which had occurred between the guardian of society and the man who, single handed apparently bade defiance to its laws. Lupin was the fantastic gentleman who carried out his operations only in mansions and salons, and who, one night, had entered the palace of Baron Schormann and had left it empty-handed, leaving behind him, however, his visiting card upon which he had written these words:

I will return when you may have some furniture that is authentic.

He was a man of a thousand disguises; in turn a chauffeur, a tenor, a bookmaker, son of a wealthy family, a young man, an old man, a commercial traveler from Marseilles, a Russian doctor, a Spanish bull-fighter.

Think of it! Arsene Lupin not on the continent of Europe mingling with and lost among its teeming millions, but right here in this relatively small cabin, in this little bit of floating wood and iron tossing about upon the high seas; where everyone knew, or at least was supposed to know, everyone else! Every man looked askance at every other. "Perhaps this gentleman sitting opposite to me is he, or perhaps it is my right-hand neighbor, or the one sitting at the other table over there near the captain. Heavens! Perhaps he is the man that occupies my state-room with me!"

"And this is going to last five times twenty-four hours more!" exclaimed Miss Nellie Underdown the following day. "It is simply intolerable. I hope they will be able to arrest him and put him in irons." Then turning to me she added: "Tell me, M. d'Andrecy, you who are so friendly with the captain, have you learned nothing further in connection with this matter?"

I wished that I did know something, if only for the purpose of being able to please Miss Nellie. She is one of those supurb creatures who excite remarks wherever they go. Her face was as beautiful as her fortune was large, and she was always surrounded by a host of fervent and enthusiastic admirers. She had been educated in Paris by her mother, who was a French woman, and was on her way to meet her father, a Chicago millionaire. A friend of hers, Lady Jerland, accompanied her.

From the very first I had done my best to get into her good graces, but in that rapid intimacy which is formed on board a liner, her charm had confused me and I did not feel capable of attempting a flirtation when those large black eyes met mine. Still, she seemed to receive my attention with a certain amount of favor. I had but one rival, a handsome young man, very elegant, very reserved, whose taciturnity she seemed to prefer at times to my lively Parisian chatter.

He was one of the group who surrounded Miss Nellie when she asked me this question. We were on deck, comfortably installed in our steamer-chairs. The storm of the day before had cleared the atmosphere and the line where darker sea and lighter sky met was clearly defined, while all about us the foam-flecked waves rose and fell rhythmically and lazily—angry, perhaps, only when they were churned into whiter foam by the swirling propellers. The air was delightfully invigorating.

"I do not know anything in particular, mademoiselle," I replied; "but is it impossible for us to make an investigation ourselves? Could we not do it as well as old Ganimard, the personal enemy of Arsene Lupin? Really, the problem is not very complicated, taking into consideration that which we already know. First, Lupin R-something; second, he is traveling alone; third, he is blond. Would it not be a good plan to take a list of the first-class passengers and proceed by the method of elimination?"

I had this list in my pocket and I took it out and ran over the list of names.

"I note first that there are thirteen people on board whose names begin with the letter R. Of these, nine are accompanied by their wives, their servants or children. There are four left, and the Marquis de Raverdan—"

"He's a secretary of embassy," interrupted Miss Nellie. "I know him well."

"Major Rawson."

"That's my uncle," said one of the passengers.

"M. Rivolta."

"Present!" said one of the bystanders, an Italian whose face was almost hidden by a magnificent black beard. Miss Underdown burst out laughing.

"This gentleman can hardly be called a blond," she said.

"Then," I continued, "the guilty man must be the last one on the list, and that is M. Rozaine. Does anyone here know M. Rozaine?"

No one answered, but Miss Underdown called out to the taciturn young man who was standing near, and whose attentions to her had somewhat annoyed me:

"Come, M. Rozaine, why do you not answer?"

All eyes were turned toward him. He was certainly

Dominguez, a Second Rheims

Some Casual Observations on the Los Angeles Aviation Meet with Particular Reference to Paulhan, the Hero of the Affair

By Robert McTavish

A second Rheims—that is the only way to characterize aviation week at Los Angeles. Of all human achievements that of flying is least amenable to comparison because it is still in its infancy and nearly every new attempt marks an advance on what has been done before. But comparisons must be made for the proper appraisement of successive efforts and the comparison between Rheims in France and Dominguez in Los Angeles is a happy one. In the delightfulness of the weather, in the immensity of the crowds, in the singular freedom from serious accidents the two aviation meets were alike. Rheims surpassed Dominguez in the number and variety of practical flying machines, but Dominguez had the advantage of coming after Rheims; consequently records made at Rheims were broken at Dominguez.

The eyes of the world were on Paulhan both at Rheims and at Dominguez. France boasts no aeroplane driver more spectacular than this young man. President Fallieres, in good-natured anxiety for his neck, protested against his hair-raising exploits at the French meet; at Dominguez his daring kept the throngs of spectators on the qui vive every day. "What is Paulhan going to do?" was the question on every tongue. Before leaving France Paulhan declared at a farewell dinner that he would try to smash all existing records in the country of the Wrights. It was no idle boast; he more than surpassed expectations. At that time he held the altitude record, having ascended 1980 feet in a Farman biplane. Henry Farman held the distance and duration record, having by his flight of 144 miles in four hours and seventeen minutes captured the Michelin trophy. Maurice Farman had recently established a new cross-country record by traveling forty-three miles continuously. Latham, in his Antoinette, made the world's speed record at Blackpool by flying at the rate of ninety miles an hour. The best passenger carrying record was made by Farman at Rheims; he carried two passengers besides himself.

The first record that Paulhan smashed at Dominguez was that for altitude. On January 12 he ascended into the clouds 4165 feet. This feat so overtopped his previous record that it is likely to stand unparalleled for a long time. The distance and duration record established by Henry Farman was not nearly equalled by Paulhan. On January 17 he circled and recircled the aviation field for one hour, fifty-eight minutes and twenty-seven seconds, covering seventy-five and six-tenths miles. Then he had to descend on account of a leak in his fuel tank and he did not try again. But the next day he shattered Maurice Farman's record for a cross-country flight. He flew from Dominguez to Santa Anita and back again without once alighting, accomplishing the distance of forty-seven and one-half miles in one hour, two minutes and forty-two seconds. In that amazing flight his greatest speed was sixty miles an hour and his average speed forty-six miles an hour; his highest altitude was 1980 feet and his average altitude, 1000 feet. It remains to be seen how long that record will stand; certainly the man most likely to break it is Paulhan himself. The best speed record made at Dominguez belongs to the American Glenn Curtiss and not to Paulhan; and the passenger carrying record made by Farman was not broken.

The fact that Paulhan was able to break the most important of the flying records, those for height and distance, is explained in part by the character of his biplane. The aeroplane which he used was Farman's latest model equipped with a fifty horsepower Gnome rotary motor. This is the motor which Paulhan himself popularized, for it was practically unknown until he made his first height record last July. He prizes this motor very highly because the manufacturers let him have it on very liberal terms, thus allowing him to get his start toward fame as an aviator.

It is not generally known that in making his various flights at Dominguez Paulhan operated without the balancing planes which the Wrights claim to constitute an infringement on their patents. There is litigation pending now on this point and to be on the safe side Paulhan decided that he would do without them. So before coming to America he practiced flights at Mourmelon with no balancing planes. These planes, whether placed between the main decks of the glider or hung from the rear edge of the upper plane, constitute the warping device which the Wrights utilize to insure right and left stability. Their suits for infringement are based mainly upon the use of these planes in connection with the operation of the rear rudder. The fact that Paulhan is able to do without these planes is very significant and brings us to the second and most important factor in Paulhan's success as a record-breaking aviator.

Wilbur Wright has been quoted as saying that he depends more upon his skill as an operator than on any mechanical device for balancing his machine. This is nothing more nor less than an admission that the successful operation of a flying machine depends chiefly upon the acrobatic skill of the manipulator. Many aviators of international renown have admitted as much. Latham has stated that aeroplane driving is nine-tenths human skill and has proved it time and again in his hazardous flights. Count de Lambert, after his spectacular flight around the Eiffel Tower, declared that he would in all likelihood have encountered disaster if he had not preserved his presence of mind. It is an axiom of Bleriot, repeatedly expressed to his pupils, that they must not undertake hazardous flights until they have developed an instinct for equilibrium. Delagrange who was killed at Bordeaux frankly confessed to extreme nervousness. He said that the thought of what would happen if he lost his self-possession for a moment frequently appalled him. The event showed the reasonableness of his fears. Curtiss has said that one can never foretell what will happen and Wilbur Wright has pointed out that one may make forty-nine flights in safety and come to grief in the fiftieth. The fact is clear that the slightest diversion from equilibrium may mean destruction. Paulhan realizes all this and it is his skill as an operator and his mental equilibrium, never disturbed, that account for his wonderful success.

Some recent aeroplane fatalities were due to mechanical defects. Yet more have been attributed to miscalculation on the part of the pilot. Lefebvre, who was fined for foolhardiness at Rheims, forfeited his life because his instinct of balance failed him at a critical moment. Captain Ferber failed to judge his chances correctly, and the biplane capsized, the motor falling upon him. Fernandez was careless about the details of his machine and was crushed in the frightful fall. Delagrange was one of the most careful pilots in the world. But all his skill did not avail when the balance of the machine was upset in midair by the breaking of a wing. Neither was the pluck or knowledge of Selfridge of any use when the broken propeller upset the equilibrum of the Wright machine above Fort Meyer. Almost all recent accidents that did not result so tragically are directly attributable to the personal equation. Engelhart, who smashed the Wright machine at Berlin, lost control in midair. Bleriot

A Specimen of Moral Conduct

Let us consider for the space of a paragraph the case of Mr. Harry McKannay, illustrating as it does the temperament and disposition of the reformer and exemplifying the singular ingenuousness with which he establishes moral precedents for the benefit of the people and the greater glory of himself. McKannay was formerly Mayor Taylor's private secretary. It was through the medium of that office that he made his entrance to public life. At the end of Mayor Taylor's term there seemed to be nothing for McKannay to do but to detach himself from the pie wagon and, resuming his status as one of the humble, respectable units of the common herd, plunge once more into the exhilarating struggle for existence, free from all the obligations that a public office occupied as a private snap owes to indulgent taxpayers. But McKannay was not detachable. He had acquired the habit of feeding at the public crib. Fortunately he had the sympathy of Mayor Taylor; and one of the last acts of the self-anointed Administration was to create a job for the benefit of McKannay. With little more than the scratch of a pen the desert of McKannay's future was made to blossom like the garden of the muses in which Dr. Taylor is wont to gallop beflowered belly deep with smug self-satisfaction in its most seductive and poetic forms. In the interest of McKannay another burden was put on the backs of the taxpayers of San Francisco. For the pampering of this stalwart young reformer a new job was brought into being; the City Attorney was authorized to employ one more deputy; and McKannay is his name. The ordinance creating the job naively recited that a new deputy was needed to examine and pass upon property titles, but what do you suppose McKannay is doing now to earn the gratuity so generously awarded by the ultra-respectable Taylor and the gentlemanly supervisors who prided themselves on their hatred of grafters? According to the public prints he has been looking for precedent and authority at the expense of the public with which to cement to their jobs certain persons appointed by the good and incorruptible poet. In other words a law officer of the city is engaged in resisting the efforts of the Mayor to clean the Augean stables. And yet you may meet wise men about town who will assure you that the Taylor administration was not crooked; that it was only stupid.

A New Poem by H. B. S.

The poem entitled "Alice Cleaver" which is published in this issue of Town Talk is the work of a young solicitor of London and has never appeared in print before. Readers may remember that a small book of poetry from the pen of the same author was reviewed in these columns in the Christmas issue. The title of that work is "Arrows of Adolescence" and it is dedicated in a most complimentary vein to Herman Scheffauer whom the writer calls "my dear friend and poetical mentor." The volume shows signs of considerable talent and so does the poem published today. The fact that H. B. S. defended Alice Cleaver in her recent trial which was a London police sensation adds an extraneous interest to his poetical interpretation of the young woman's fate. From Herman Scheffauer who sent me the poem I learn that H. B. S. is one of the most brilliant young intellects of London, a satanically clever chap with a big career ahead which he has determined to turn into the channel of law rather than of literature. The poem "Alice Cleaver" commends itself to Scheffauer for its "pathos and deliberate bathos, its brilliancy, sentiment, cynicism and legal aloofness." Readers may determine for themselves whether this praise is or is not merited.

Scheffauer in New York

Herman Scheffauer is at present a resident in the University Settlement, 184 Eldridge street, New York, where he also spent part of last year. The University Settlement is a charitable foundation housed in an almost palatial structure in the heart of the Ghetto. Associated with the California poet and essayist are ten young men, mostly professional men, who live at the settlement and give part of their time to various clubs of poor boys who go there regularly for instruction. Scheffauer finds this charitable work very interesting and the life of the settlement which is so secluded as to be almost monastic, appeals to him very strongly. The residents have their own menage and there are delightful "Ambrosian nights" when they gather at their round table for the discussion of the topics in which their varied individualities are immersed. Mrs. Atherton dined with Scheffauer at the settlement recently and afterwards made a tour of the East Side with him. No doubt the novelist found inspiration for future work in that plunge into the slums.

His Literary Projects

Scheffauer informs me that he finds the University Settlement an ideal retreat for calm literary work and he adds something which is at once sad and significant, namely that everything points to the fact that whatever literary recognition is to be his will come to him first from England. Various English magazines and reviews, the Cornhill among them, have published a number of his poems, short stories and essays during the past year and he will continue to write for them, but he has larger work on hand. What Scheffauer calls a "world romance" entitled "Niagara" is now ready for publication, having been finished at Niagara Falls whither the author went at Christmas time to study that tremendous scene in winter. This work may be produced in England before it is presented to the American reading public. The old and conservative house of John Murray had almost agreed to publish it when the elder Murray finally concluded that it was "too American" in setting. Another English publisher may bring it out however. Scheffauer is now at work upon another romance.

A Question of Pronounciation

The supposition is that in every man resides supreme authority on all questions pertaining to the spelling and pronunciation of his name. Consequently when Fred Zeile and Fred Moody had a dispute some time ago as to the pronunciation of Mr. Baldocchi's name it did not take them long to agree to go to the flower shop presided over by Podesta & Baldocchi and abide by the decision of the owner of the name. Moody was sure that it was pronounced "Baldoekee." Having traveled in Italy and acquired some familiarity with the language of the country he had enough confidence in his judgment to hazard a little money on the issue. Zeile had also traveled in Italy, and he had learned how to pronounce the names of all objects of interest from Milan to Reggio. He, too, was willing to bet, and "Baldoechee" was what he put his money on. To the store of Podesta & Baldocchi went the two distinguished club men, and the question was submitted for decision by Mr. Moody.

"I've bet this gentleman," he said, "that you pronounce your name 'Baldoekee.' He bets that you pronounce it 'Baldoechee." Now how do you pronounce it?"

"My name?" the Italian asked in astonishment. "I pronounca my name 'Poedessta.'"

Drama on the Street

The climax of one of those tragic dramas in which every living soul is a protagonist was witnessed by a number of men at the post office the other day. At the general delivery window a young woman, whose dress betokened the humbleness of her station, was seen to receive a letter and walk quickly away. As she reached the sidewalk she opened the envelope, drew out a paper and at once, consciousness leaving her, she fell prostrate. In another moment she was lifted up and carried into the post office where she soon regained her senses. The paper that had dropped from her hands was restored to her. She grasped it nervously, and her eyes filled with tears. "My husband," she said in a voice broken with sobs, "sent me down here from Seattle with my little girl to work for my living because he could not support me. Now he is suing me for a divorce. I don't know why." There were tears in other eyes as she spoke; for the pathos of her plight was tragic to those by whom it was witnessed. Gathering herself together she said she would have to go to her child, and she rose up and went on her way. A commonplace scene from a commonplace drama, but the emotions to which it appeals are always ready to capitulate.

His Unconscious Humor

If Mr. S. G. Murphy, who was for many years president of the First National Bank, ever displayed a sense of humor, there is no record of the occasion, and yet it is known that unintentionally he could be exceedingly facetious. Mr. Horace G. Platt gives testimony to this fact. He tells the story of an episode in which he figured as the stimulus to Mr. Murphy's latent but unconscious wit. One day in the Bohemian Club Mr. Murphy broached the subject of Mr. Platt's volume of addresses which had been published for the benefit of the club. "As I travel constantly and have no time for reading," said the amiable financier, "I did not take one of the books, but instead I sent five dollars to the Library Committee." Now Mr. Platt, who is justly regarded as one of our most polished orators, is proud of the specimens of his eloquence that have been put between book covers, evidencing as they do his skill in the marshaling of words and phrases and also his general culture. Therefore it pleases him to see the books circulate. So he suggested to Mr. Murphy that as he was entitled to two volumes he should ask for them and send them to friends that have a taste for such things. "Oh, no," said Mr. Murphy, to whom everything is trivial that bears no relation to finance, "it's not worth while; the fact is I don't know anybody that has any use for the book."

Aphie James' Temper

Those who attended the performance of the Merchant of Venice at the Van Ness on Tuesday night were treated to a bit of stage realism which was as unexpected as it was exciting. It was an impromptu act behind the scenes dominated by Aphie James, the wife of Louis James, in which she made it apparent that in addition to a blonde temperament she has also an auburn temper. The act was pulled off when the curtain descended on the first scene of the fourth act, concluding the beautiful casket scene in which Portia melts with sentimental tenderness for the fortunate Bassanio. For some reason the orchestra did not play during the wait and it was owing to that fact that the audience heard Aphie James in her tantrums. First of all a masculine voice was heard. It may have been the stage manager giving an order or it may have been Louis James. But whoever it was, the response was swift, lengthy and sensational. The unmistakable voice of Aphie James rang out and her tones were of perfervid indignation. She stamped her foot so vehemently and so violently that everybody in the audience could hear it. Her harangue lasted for about two minutes and it must have burned the ears of the unlucky person to whom it was addressed. Then suddenly Mrs. James realizing, perhaps, that the orchestra was not playing and that the audience was lending ear to her words, brought the most thrilling specimen of her dramatic power to a close.

Another Instance of Passion

These public ebullitions of bad temper are rare on the stage for the very sufficient reason that actors and actresses realize how fatal they are to success and accordingly are careful to seek the privacy of their dressingrooms before unleashing their wrath. A player who loses his temper alienates his audience and try as he may, is unable to regain its sympathy. That was undoubtedly the case with Aphie James on Tuesday night. I remember another instance of the same thing. It was at the old Columbia on the opening night of "The Yankee Counsul," the musical comedy in which Vera Michelena returned to her home city as a prima donna. Miss Michelena had won considerable success in the East and as her family was well known and much liked in musical circles, there was a large and sympathetic audience on hand to greet her. But somehow or other Miss Michelena did not come up to expectations; she was pretty, graceful, sang and danced well, but she was not the feminine hit of the show. A tiny soubrette of ravishing brunette beauty whose name I have forgotten, overshadowed the native daughter and won most of the applause. At the end of the first act Miss Michelena was given an ovation and a great many flowers were handed over the footlights, among others a basket of splendid American Beauty roses. These Miss Michelena held to her bosom as she bowed and smiled her thanks, but as the curtain descended she dashed them to the stage and stamped on them in a burst of fury. The curtain had descended so far that only those in the orchestra and boxes witnessed this exhibition, but a shocked murmur went through the theatre and Miss Michelena was coldly treated for the rest of the evening.

Loveland's Retort Courteous

Once upon a time delightful were the days, angelic the nights of Napa's favorite son, the Hon. Theodore Bell, but now the cruel, unrelenting Fates are leagued against him, and discomfiture and humiliation attend him at all hours, making sad his large and vigorous heart and agitating him with painful emotions. Almost every day somebody singles him out for especial invective and calls public attention to his delinquencies. He still cherishes the hope of leading the Democracy on to victory and landing safely in the job at Sacramento, but his enemies, powerful ones, are growing in number and they are stacking the cards against him. He realizes now that he has been affording his enemies many opportunities for holding him up to ridicule, and he has sense enough to know that to be ridiculous in politics is to be impossible. One of the worst of his recent mistakes was his gratuitous assault on the railroad commission for political purposes. This was a mistake, however, that it was most natural for him to make. To the Democracy the railroad commission has been a staple object of execration since the seventies of the last century. Belief in the iniquity of the railroad commission is one of the Democratic articles of faith; smashing it early and often is at once a doctrinal form of democratic exercise and a method of expiating all the political sins that a jobchaser can commit. So Bell, being a candidate for Governor, vindicated his reverence for tradition, forgetting for the moment that Harvey Loveland is at present a member of the commission. Now Loveland is not a man to break out with gooseflesh when Bell yawps. He loves a scrap. A pretty good castigator himself is Loveland, and when he cocks his war bonnet bristling with fiery feathers he may confidently be expected to throw a shriek into the proceedings. The shriek on this occasion was emitted by Theodore Bell just as he was whacked on his resonant mazard with Loveland's battle club. And all the State laughed.

An Excusable Practice

Though I have considerable admiration for Commissioner Loveland and no little respect for his principles I am constrained at times to dissent from his sentiments. I find that even in this matter of his castigation of the Hon. Theodore Bell, whilst I applaud the achievement I dissent from the view that a jobchaser should be reprobated when he indulges in wholesale villification for the purpose of propagating the presumption that he is above suspicion. This is one of the time-honored expedients of high-minded reformers. It is to be justified on the principle exemplified by genius when it plays the mountebank to catch the public eye or the public ear. The dear people are wofully lacking in sensibility. To interest them in what is good for them it is necessary to fillip their curiosity, to quicken their imagination, to fire their feelings. Now it is imbued with some such beneficent purpose that our job-chasing reformers pour their stinging censures on the men that hold the jobs. They that are villified should not take them seriously. It's all in the game—a nasty game, perhaps, but none of us need to practice it.

Johnson in Simulated Frenzy

Insincerity is one of the essential ingredients in the make-up of your average politician, and therefore politicians should never take one another seriously. Wise politicians never do. I remember an occasion when some wise politicians gave a notable illustration of their indifference to the theatrical ecstasies and passions of one of their number. It was at Sacramento during a session of the Legislature. The bill for the removal of the capital was up for discussion. Grove L. Johnson was the chosen leader of the opposition. He knew he was beaten. Just before making his speech he called on several distinguished men present, and to each he said: "I'm going to roast you, but—(winking his eye) you know—its not on the level." And then he opened his batteries of vituperation and poured the hottest shot from his ammunition wagon into the gentlemen who had received the amiable tip. Grove Johnson is one of the most eloquent men in California, and as a master of invective or as an artist in satire he has few peers. On this occasion he was at his best. His language sizzled, his epigrams scintillated and his whiskers were full of the kind of expressions that give stern emphasis. He championed the cause of Sacramento with all the fervor of a burning patriot, and in excoriating terms he flayed the friends who had been assured that his fine frenzy was to be of the mock variety. To their credit, be it said, not one of them flinched. Indeed, they encouraged the orator with their blandest smiles.

Another Fine Specimen

Another story in illustration of what wise politicians regard as pardonable insincerity has the Hon. J. O. (Black) Hayes of San Jose for its hero. Mr. Hayes is a distinguished journalist, a pious leader of a new religious cult and a perennial candidate for governor. He is also a fine figure of a man from the standpoint of physical pulchritude. He is really beautiful. His friends pronounce him a man of high character and fastidious intellect. He is unquestionably a man of high ideals, but he inspires in his enemies disparaging and contemptuous comments which I cannot trust myself to reproduce in their original grace of rhetoric. It should be explained, however, that the invidious inspiration is due to the fact that Mr. Hayes in the exigencies of politics incurred the intimacy of Abe Ruef, which, to his credit (in the philosophy that guides reformers) he did not feel compelled to maintain and cherish after becoming aware of its infructuosity. Mr. Hayes, for the greater good of the people, has trained with many factions and it has been pretty hard to keep track of his fluctuations. One day, at a time when he and the Republican machine were believed to be in spiritual contiguity, an editorial smashing the machine and lauding the prophets of reform was printed in his paper. That day he was taken to task by a wild-eyed performer. Thereupon, by way of pacification, this explanation: "Oh, that's only for those reform fellows; you know where I stand."

The Moving Picture Prize Fight

William P. McLoughlin, the sporting writer of the New York World, takes great credit unto himself for having predicted, immediately after articles were signed, that the Jeffries-Johnson set-to would be a "moving picture fight." If there is a great deal of credit attached to the making of this obvious forecast there is no reason why I should not take my share of it, for I made the same criticism at about the same time. Perhaps it was not such an obvious forecast, after all, for the sporting writers of the local press somehow overlooked it completely, although the proceedings were so raw that a child might have been expected to see through them. The fact that both pluguglies were to receive a financial interest in the films necessitated plans for a fight which would last long enough to make the films a drawing card with the public. What chance is there, then, for the fighters to do any real milling until the necessary number of pictures have been taken? But now it turns out that the financial arrangements with regard to the pictures have been much more complete than anybody suspected at the time of the Hoboken conference. When the articles of agreement were made public, clause 7 was missing and clause 7, it develops, shows absolutely that it will be impossible for the fighters to spoil the moving pictures by a quick knockout. Under this clause the fighters are empowered to organize a stock company and to sell shares of the corporation running the fight. The corporation is to be known as the Jeffries-Johnson Moving Picture Combination. Here is the exact language of the clause, as finally agreed to: "And the parties hereto agree that the principals, James J. Jeffries and John Johnson, shall receive the full 100 per cent of the picture income and they shall pay to Gleason and Rickard 33 1-3 per cent of the profits from such picture displays. And the said Jeffries and Johnson shall form a corporation to be known as the Jeffries-Johnson Moving Picture Combination to carry out the provisions of this agreement." Of course this relieves the promoters of all responsibility and puts the success of the pictures right up to the fighters themselves. This application of the methods of high finance to pugilism makes for bigger financial returns, perhaps; but it reduces the heavyweight championship bout to the level of a sordid little farce. The late Mr. Barnum left an axiom that covers the case.

Just think, our new cook gets up at six o'clock without being called.

Wilde's Large-mindedness

Herman Whitaker, whose novel "The Planter" is considered by the Harpers the "big book" of their last year's output, tells with no little art and gusto a crackerjack joke on his famous uncle Sidney Grundy, who five and twenty years ago was the Pinero of British playwrights—a joke as good as a play, the aforenamed the victim and no less than Oscar Wilde the magnificently impudent villain, alongside of whom Bernard Shaw might well pass for Modesty's self and Gilbert Chesterton for Shaw's shadow. Among other plays good, bad and indifferent, Sidney had written one of which he had every reason to be proud, and the playwright was not an unreasonable man—a rare thing among dramatists. For the time being the name of the play has escaped me, as it has the rest of the public for good and all. Small matter! There being nothing in it, 'twould adorn the tale no whit. Nameless now, 'twas indubitably in its day a very proper play, the pink of propriety, and in but one wise memorable, namely, in this, that Oscar Wilde deemed it in part worthy of adoption. "You go see Lady Windermere's Fan!" suggested a friendly critic to Sidney Grundy: "'Twill make you wild!" "From all I hear, 'twill make him—Wilde!" Herman Whitaker's uncle returned; which goes to show that the author of "The Settler" comes honestly by his wit, being its nephew by marriage. "But seriously, Grundy," frowned the serious critic, "he has lifted a whole scene out of your pet play!" "Which accounts for his phenomenal success!—I was wondering!" was his nephew's uncle's quiet rejoinder, which sent the critic off in high dudgeon. About a week thereafter, Sidney, the victim, ran across Oscar, the villain, at the Atheneum Club. "By the way, Wilde," says Grundy, "talking of Lady Windermere's Fan, Jones tell me that you have lifted a whole scene bodily out of my play." "Jones is a bally idiot!" Wilde magnificently interposed. "Such inaccuracy in any one but a critic would be incredible. Even in him 'tis not only reprehensible but really unpardonable. Lifted a whole scene, indeed! The idea! I lifted an entire act!"

Electric Service

What it Costs to be ALWAYS READY

Electric energy can not be stored in large quantities. It can not be stored economically at all. It must be used the instant it is produced, or it is gone.

The plant must have generating power enough for all the requirements of its customers, any instant that any of them or all of them together may happen to turn on the current.

These short winter days, when early darkness overtakes business hours, a doubly great demand is made on an electric plant. It is only for a short time. But the equipment at the works and the distributing system of heavy copper wire must be able to supply that demand.

For an electrical enterprise to be ever ready for short spurts of big service requires an extra large money investment.

But if electrical demands were uniform, hour in and hour out, day in and day out, the equipment could be easily figured on that average basis. Then a much smaller investment would be sufficient. And the price of electric lights and of electric energy could be made very much less.

Comments Amended

My attention has been called to certain inaccuracies in Town Talk's editorial comments on the amendments to the Penal Code changing the procedure in appeals. These amendments were not, as stated, fathered by the Commonwealth Club, and consequently they warrant no unfavorable presumption. They emanated from the Bar Association, and they have received the approval of high judicial authority. One of the purposes of the amendments, I am told, is to prevent delays after verdicts are rendered and before pronouncement of judgment. By reason of these amendments there can be less juggling with justice than formerly in the courts presided over by Judge Lawlor and Judge Dunne. It will be impossible for either of those illustrious jurists to keep an innocent person in jail three years or more, pending the settlement of a bill of exceptions, as was done in the now celebrated case of Minnie Adams. It will also be impossible to repeat the scandal of the Ruef case, the fragrance of which gives distinction to Judge Dunne.

> You may fumigate, disinfect if you will,
> The scent of the scandal will hang round him still.

Nor do the amendments materially increase expenses or the number of appeals. The official shorthand reporter must get busy if an appeal is taken, but he did so under the old law. He got busy because a transcript was wanted for use on the motion for a new trial, which usually came off after everybody had forgotten all about the evidence. Now it must come off while it is fresh; and no transcript will be necessary in the majority of cases unless an appeal is taken after the motion for a new trial is passed on. If it is granted none will be needed. This will be a saving. Moreover as bills of exception are no longer used on appeal the expense of printing will be saved. Instead of the bill of exception, the original transcript made by the reporter is used. "I hope," says my informant, "the press will let this new law alone until it has had time to prove itself. The courts are much embarrassed in this State because the people are constantly led to suppose that some amendment to a new law is required before they really know what the law is or how it will work."

Short Starts Them Thinking

On a recent visit to Washington Frank Short of Fresno started a new train of ideas in the minds of statesmen whose constituencies are of the Far West. He called their attention to the fact that the most enthusiastic of conservationists are residents of Eastern States whose water power sites are all in the hands of private individuals. These men, he said, are concerning themselves about matters in which they have no direct interest. They demand that the water power sites of the West be withheld from exploitation for the benefit of posterity. Now the West is in need of development, and it is not to its interest to discourage empire builders from utilizing the vast potential energies of the States that are as yet sparsely settled. Short submitted for consideration the thesis that the States have some rights which the Federal government is bound to respect, and that among these is the right to employ for their material development the energies that nature has blessed them with. The man from Fresno has made it clear that there are two sides to the conservation question, and he has given new impetus to the controversy that has been raging at Washington. In several of the Western States where development has been retarded by the conservation craze his views have been adopted, and the advisability of abating the zeal of Mr. Pinchot is now being vigorously agitated.

His Amazing Vision

As a result of Frank Short's protest against putting the Federal lid on the potential energies of the Western States the whole subject of conservation has been examined from his standpoint, and now it appears from official estimates made at Washington that as an alarmist Pinchot is entitled to rank with Hobson. The records show that the rivers and streams of the United States are capable of supplying ten times or more the mechanical power now employed for all purposes in the country. In other words with all the marvelous development of our natural resources that has taken place in more than one hundred and thirty years of our existence as a nation we have not harnessed more than one-tenth of the power that we have at our disposal. Yet Mr. Pinchot is able to perceive the likelihood of the formation of a gigantic water power trust, which, he says, unless Congress acts, will soon have exclusive possession of all the water power in the country. Verily Mr. Pinchot, the bosom friend of posterity, the dreamer who has set the whole country by the ears, is a man of telescopic vision. While we are about it we should conserve him as well as our water power.

It's An Eastern Luxury

Theoretically water power is the cheapest possible mechanical energy, yet official reports declare that water power has not held its own but has steadily declined in relative importance since 1870 when it was 48.2 per cent of the whole (horse-power in the country), whereas for 1905 it was only 11.3 per cent. Reports for the year 1905 show the use in mechanical industries of 1,647,969 horse-power generated by running water. Out of this about 40 per cent was in New England and about 27 per cent in the State of New York. If power is offered on reasonable terms, the probable result is mills and factories employing hands and paying wages, or light, heat and power for towns and cities. If charges for the power are excessive, there will be no sale for the power. The practical utilization of a power site requires, usually, a large expenditure of money and a central control. It is even conceivable that this alleged "water power trust" may be a blessing in disguise, if such an organization really does exist. It may mean new centres of industry and more wage earners, more business for railroads and more wealth for the nation. There are parts of the power site conservation program which are obviously commendable. Such sites have a value, either actual and immediate or potential. If they were valueless no "trust" would want them. Any Federal grant of such a site should carry conditions, such as a time limit for development and operation and protection against an abuse of monopolistic powers by the grantees. While the laws should make impossible any spoliation of the public, they should make easily possible the benefits that may be derived from developed water power.

Politics in Los Angeles

If any proof were needed that Los Angeles possesses the real metropolitan spirit it would be supplied by the ever-increasing intensity of the political situation there. There was a time when the politics of the southern city were controlled by a few practical organizers who had things mostly their own way because the interest of the community was concentrated on other activities; but now that is all changed. Los Angeles today has a very healthy competition for political supremacy, the opposing forces being those known respectively as "the organization" and "the reformers." While the reformers have triumphed recently in the election of Alexander to the mayor's chair, the struggle will go on with increased vigor, for the rewards of success are great and the victorious ones are not so strongly intrenched that they cannot be cast out. In the approaching State campaign Los Angeles will demand her due share of the State offices and will of course insist that either Frank Flint or some other representative of the south be assured of election to the United States senate. From south of Tehachapi has already come the announcement of two candidates for the supreme bench, a tentative candidate for governor and numerous aspirants for other offices. In her struggle with the north Los Angeles has never had much difficulty in holding her own and now she has a real intramural conflict between the two strongly fortified wings of the republican party. Walter Parker will direct this conflict for one side and Meyer Lissner for the other. The forces of Lissner, at present in the saddle, are inclined to boast of their settled supremacy, but it may confidently be predicted that they are just now approaching the fight of their lives.

The Opposing Leaders

Walter Parker, the leader of the organization forces and Meyer Lissner, the chief of the so-called "silk-stockings" are as different in personality and methods as day and night. Parker is a natural-born "mixer," quick to make friends and as swift as he is accurate in deciding upon those in whom he may place his confidence and trust. Lissner, on the other hand, is naturally distant, in fact almost forbidding in casual intercourse; he is lacking in the quality of magnetism and inclines rather to distrust in his dealings with men. Parker is not jealous of the dignity which attaches to leadership, but Lissner is; those who wish to see him must go to him and perhaps wait in the anteroom. Parker knows when discipline may be relaxed and when petty breaches of party loyalty may be ignored, but Lissner exacts the most implicit obedience and in several instances has cast off a valuable ally for a slight transgression of policy. Lissner's is the card index system of doing politics while Parker's is everything which that tabulated method does not imply. It will be very interesting to watch the outcome of their next joust which, by the way, depends on the condition of Parker's health. He has not been strong recently and has been compelled to give up for a while active participation in the game. But when he puts on harness again there will be "something doing."

for visitors stopping at the Fairmont, St. Francis, Palace and other hotels. The services, in fact, are intended for visitors in the city who find it difficult and inconvenient to attend the regular eight o'clock service on Sunday evening. Vespers will be sung as at the eight o'clock services and the hotel guests will be enabled to assist at divine service and then return to their hotels in time to keep their dinner and other engagements. Those engagements would ordinarily clash with attendance at Sunday evening service and the result in too many cases would be that visitors, with only a short time to spend in this city, would forego their religious duties in favor of secular amusements.

Hittell Writing a History

Despite the fact that he has passed the psalmist's span and is almost an octogenarian, Theodore H. Hittell, author of the most exhaustive history of California ever written, is now engaged on another historical work. The new work which is nearing completion will deal with the history of the Hawaiian Islands in the same painstaking manner which has characterized all of Hittell's literary performances. Hittell is a hale and vigorous old man who still walks five or ten miles when he feels the need for exercise. His eyesight is so good that he writes a hand of almost microscopic fineness and reads his manuscript for corrections without difficulty. Hittell is a student of German as well as of the Spanish language which he learned while engaged in gathering data for his history of California, and has written an appreciation of Goethe's Faust which has won a great deal of praise from competent critics. He was engaged in the practice of law for many years with the celebrated John B. Felton and appeared in the Lick Trust and other famous cases. He had the distinction of being the only attorney who was retained when the litigation between Emeric and Alvarado over the Alvarado land grant commenced and lived to see the final judgment entered thirty years later. The Hittell home at 808 Turk street is filled with a splendid collection of Californiana.

Race Suicide in Politics

The race suicide issue is soon to be raised in Alameda county politics. The political situation in that wonderful county has been complicated in the past by all sorts of contentions, but the race suicide issue is absolutely novel and should lend an adventitious interest to the next State campaign. The issue will be raised by Patrick Cavanaugh, the Alameda painter who is the father of thirteen children and who endeavored to have passed in the last legislature a bill granting a pension of $25 a month to any mother who enriched the population by a dozen offspring. Cavanaugh was unsuccessful in having the pension bill passed, but his intercourse with legislators convinced him that there was no reason why he should not become a lawmaker himself. So he will be an independent candidate for the State senatorship in the fourteenth district, at present represented by Clem Bates. Bates will not be a candidate again but Assemblyman Otis of race-track legislation notoriety, Assemblyman Hahn and Assistant District Attorney Hynes probably will. So Cavanaugh will have plenty of opposition. This does not dismay him. He promises to raise the question of race suicide in vigorous Rooseveltian fashion and the picture of his large family will be displayed on his election cards. Cavanaugh confided to me the other day that he will probably be the father of fourteen children before the campaign is well under way. With fourteen arguments against restricted families the Alameda painter will certainly show disinterested devotion to his chosen platform and if he is as successful in getting votes as in—well, here's wishing him luck, anyway.

Tony Hart—brought him through the illness and the veteran is already thinking of going back to the stage. During his illness Harrigan was constantly remembered by actors and actresses who had played with him; his sick room was a bower of flowers and inquiries came from all parts of the country, including this city where he is known and loved by many. Of course the old Harrigan and Hart players are nearly all dead now—Annie Yeamans was about the only one of the oldsters still surviving to feel concerned about his health. John Wild is dead and so are Tony Hart and Billy Gray and Dave Braham who wrote the music for all the Harrigan laughmakers. Of course Ada Lewis wired her hope for his recovery, but she, like most of his other living theatrical friends, was a mere "kid" when Harrigan was in his heyday. It was in 1867 that Harrigan grew tired of shaving planks in a New York shipyard and came to San Francisco to begin his stage career. He played first at the Bella Union and the Olympic, the starting points for many famous players. Lotta, Joe Murphy and Maggie Moore were members of the Bella Union company at that time. Harrigan and Hart first interested New York in 1871, but the great success of the "Mulligan Guards" pieces came in 1879. The money Harrigan made then enabled him to buy the New York theatre which bears his name and which he still owns. Harrigan's last appearance was as Croup, the old negro, during the Philadelphia run of "Cameo Kirby."

The Old Independence is Moved

That ancient relic of the early American navy, the Independence, which has been stationed at the Mare Island navy yard since 1874 was moved from its anchorage recently and its keel cut through the water for the first time in two decades. For twenty years the Independence was anchored in one spot, the admiration of all who visited the yard, but it was necessary to move it in order that it might not interfere with the ships that will enter the new drydock. The Independence was the first of the 74-gun battleships built for service against the fleets of England in the second war with that country. Its keel was laid by Capt. William Bainbridge at the Charleston navy yard in 1812, and the vessel was launched in 1814. In January of the following year it sailed on its maiden cruise for the Mediterranean, with Captain Bainbridge in command. The Independence sailed in company with the Constitution, Essex, and Hornet. Upon the return of the Independence from foreign waters it acted as guard-ship to Boston Harbor until 1819. In 1836 it was reduced from three decks to two, carrying 54 guns, and sailed for Europe as the flagship of Commodore Nicholson, with George M. Dallas, who was the minister to Russia from the United States, on board. On this trip all records for speed were broken between New York and Cronstadt. In 1846, with Capt. William B. Shubrick in command, the Independence sailed for the Pacific Coast, and after spending three years in Pacific waters and participating in the capture of Guaymas and Mazatlan, the warship returned to the Atlantic Coast and later sailed for the Mediterranean as the flagship of the United States squadron. In 1854 the Independence was refitted at the New York yard and again sent to the Pacific Coast for the last time, and was made guard-ship to San Francisco Bay. In 1858 the Independence was converted into a receiving ship. Capt. John B. Milton is in command.

The Shuberts and Belascos

Two important theatrical deals were consummated during the past week. The announcement was made by Charles F. Gall, representing the Shuberts, that a lease had been taken of the Novelty Theatre in O'Farrell street west of Fillmore. The house will be opened on Monday evening, February 7, by Florence Roberts and she will present two plays which have attracted considerable attention in the east, "The Transformation" and "Gloria." Miss Roberts will play a four weeks' engagement at the Novelty. When the Shuberts decided to close the Valencia Theatre all true lovers of the stage were greatly disappointed because the character of the attractions presented there had been unusually fine. Now that they are to re-enter the local field they are sure of the same hearty welcome which they received before. The other theatrical deal of the week was that by which the five principal stock theatres of the Pacific Coast formed a combination to facilitate the engagement of plays and players. The theatrical interests which were merged were those of the Alcazar, San Francisco; the Burbank, Los Angeles; the Baker, Portland; the Seattle, Seattle; and the Spokane, Spokane. As a result of the agreement entered into by the managers, there will be no rivalry in the bidding for plays and players and the playwrights will be protected against piracy. The deal was engineered by Fred Belasco of this city and Oliver Morosco of Los Angeles. San Francisco will be the headquarters of the combine.

Celebrities Self-Revealed

"Who's Who for 1910" (London) is a book of rare interest revealing as it does the phenomena of introspection. The editors of this volume have collected through cunningly framed questions many amusing self-revealing answers. Here we have Marie Corelli telling us that she "has devoted herself to literature," but "has never abandoned the love of music-piano and mandolin." It is by sentences of this kind that Marie makes it clear that she has devoted herself to literature in vain. George Moore, questioned as to his amusements answers, "Religion." There are many of Moore's admirers who believe that he has taken religion seriously. At any rate he has done a lot of floundering spiritually, and in his work he has made it evident that he has given religion deep study. George Bernard Shaw's idea of recreation is "Anything except sport," and Gilbert K. Chesterton declares that harrying Mr. Shaw is the only form of recreation he enjoys when he is not trying to get a "rise" out of Mr. Wells. Thomas Hardy studies architecture; D' Annunzio goes up in aeroplanes; Henry James dotes on metaphysics; the Colonel—our old friend, the melodramatic hero of the jungle—has a passion for "Ranching and big game hunting on the great plains and in the Rocky Mountains; is much interested in zoology, especially mammalogy and field natural history generally." Directly beneath this confession, the longest in the book, Senator Elihu Root gives his Washington address—that's all.

From whom did you get that pretty stick-pin, doctor?
From my first patient.
Ah, he left it to you.

A Strange Association

There has been a great deal of criticism, some of it humorous and some of it cynical, expressed by lawyers who have witnessed the spectacle of District Attorney Fickert and William Hoff Cook sitting side by side in the calm atmosphere of a local courtroom and consulting in the most pacific, nay cordial fashion, about the conduct of a Chinese case. It will be remembered that during the recent campaign Hoff Cook, as a member of Heney's staff, stumped the city against Fickert and was particularly truculent and vituperative in his references to the republican and union labor candidate. But the bitterness of the stump is more transitory than human glory, for now that Hoff Cook has been retained as special prosecutor in some of the murder trials that have arisen out of the latest and bloodiest of our tong wars, the erstwhile vilifier and the object of his abuse collaborate with the gentleness of perfect amity. It is as though all that Cook said against Fickert had been wiped out of the memory, not only of Cook but of Fickert as well.

Lieutenant Minnigerode is Honored

An unusual distinction has just been conferred upon Second Lieutenant Fitzhugh L. Minnigerode of the Eighth Infantry who is well known in this city. Major General William P. Duvall who is in command of the Philippine Division, has published the names of one officer and nine non-commissioned officers and privates who have distinguished themselves "by especially meritorious acts or conduct" in the service. The name of Lieutenant Minnigerode heads this list and it is set forth that he exhibited bravery and presence of mind in going to the rescue of certain drowning men at Iloilo, Panay, on September 10, 1907.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The sharp upward move in steel on the closing day of the week was accompanied by rumors of an increased dividend to five per cent and an extra three-fourths to put the year 1909 on a four per cent basis. While there seems little good authority for consummation of such a plan next Tuesday, the stock has been heavily bought by banking interests who control the financial operations of the steel corporation. Steel common has shown an average earning power of 10 per cent for ten years past, with enormous sums of cash put into betterments in this period, hence it seems now that the stockholders are entitled to reap some benefits beyond a 4 per cent basis. The Wall Street situation in the recent week has been involved in a great deal of uncertainty, not only from the Hocking Coal scandal, but from the more important matter of the difficulty of labor which remains an unsettling factor. There seems to be little change in the political atmosphere at Washington and it is a doubtful question if bankers here are disturbed materially over coming legislation. We feel that further betterment in stock values will be seen the coming week.

Wheat showed a large and active trade last week. Shorts finally covered to reduce risks over the first of the week and indications are that larger longs are supplying their wants and that some of the big shorts who covered several days ago are again putting wheat out. At the top today wheat is up 4 cents from the low figure of a few days ago. The chief bullish consideration is the evidence that interior marketings are falling off. Both Northwest and total primary arrivals, while still larger than a year ago, show marked reduction as compared with the runs of the last few days. Primary receipts today were 582,000 bushels against 396,000 bushels a year ago. The week's total primaries show the result of general railroad clean ups in various sections following the return this week of milder weather. The week's primaries are 2,000,000 bushels larger than a year ago at 4,449,000 bushels against 4,106,000 bushels last week and 2,465,000 bushels in the corresponding week of last year. Minneapolis bought hard winter wheat at Omaha at a price equal to 2⅞ cents over Chicago May. This shows little probability of western wheat soon coming here. The local receipts for wheat this week were 214,000 against 322,000 shipped out. Trade has been much influenced by the strength at Liverpool where the closing is 1⅜ to 1½d up, affected by the small interior marketings in Argentine, the poor quality of the wheat arriving at the ports and the light American shipments this week, along with the higher prices of Manitoba and United States sorts. Local milling inquiry is good but prices are held stiff by leading owners and sales are small at 18,000 bushels.

Corn—The corn market started out strong, helped by wheat and by a considerable demand from pit traders who were expecting some of the big shorts to run for cover. Heavy selling by larger commission concerns, however, turned the tables and made the market heavy. The week's primary receipts were 3,974,000 against 4,610,000 a year ago. This week's receipts in Chicago were 1,787,000 bushels and shipments out were 1,117,000. Primary arrivals for one day were 595,000 against 650,000 a year ago. Local cash prices were 186,000. Export clearances were 206,000. The weather is fine and clear in the corn belt, not cold enough to hamper railway operations.

Oats—Oats were stronger early on good buying headed by the cash grain handling interests, shippers and elevator people, but sold off with other grains later, local speculators hammering prices as much as possible after wheat and corn turned weak. There was good absorption of offerings on the weak spots. Cars have 93, estimates 93. Week's receipts locally were 1,631,000 and shipments were 1,268,000. Week's primary receipts, 2,778,000 against 2,739,000 a year ago. Local cash sales, 170,000 bushels.

Cotton—A cotton buying public obsessed with the idea of 17 cents or even higher cotton, had its fingers burned. The slump in spot prices on the New York Exchange from 16.46 about two weeks ago to 13.50 was a loss of 14.80 per bale. Such a reaction of an unsound technical market position is now well known to have been the result of a succession of waves of long selling concentrated upon the New York market from various quarters of the world. This had the effect of overloading the chief bull protectors of the market until they were compelled to liquidate their holdings. A clearing up of the situation has its most hopeful aspect in the chance the recession gives to the spinner to buy cotton on future contracts on a reasonable basis. The cotton world, because of the dispelled illusions about excessive prices is all the healthier for the most remarkable reaction in the record of the cotton year. Although the market seems to be getting into a position now where it will have to be tested by the actual question of demand and supply, we believe that for some time to come the market is a sale on bulges rather than a buy at any time and that May and July are for the present at any rate a sale whenever they reach 15 cents and unqualifiedly think that October is a sale at 13 cents as we cannot see how the new crop's early prices can, against all precedent, maintain themselves. The market is at present strong but withal nervous and with a degree of uncertainty that denotes that it will take several days to adjust itself. Therefore we reiterate an opinion that for the time being at least it is a professional market and advise selling on all bulges.

Copper—Traders in copper stocks supplied an abundance of material on which to frame opinions as to tendencies in the copper metal market, but more or less conflicting ones on the outcome of the merger, and the cause of this can be attributed more or less to the dissatisfaction on the part of the Nevada Consolidated stockholders to participate in the same on the ratio in which they are invited by the Utah, especially as the strength or wealth of the Utah does not now appear to be all that it has been talked and written up to be. copper metal is steadily and surely going up, 14¼ now being the price and there seems to be no question but that it will soon pass 15 cents and, as we predicted in these columns some six weeks ago, that copper will before the end of the year be selling in the neighborhood of 18 cents. In view of this it should follow that stocks in good ore producing mines should gradually advance to a higher range of prices and we unquestionably think that Anaconda is cheap at the present market price at about 50; that Amalgamated is a good buy especially on any recession, and in the New York Curb and Boston Coppers, that Miami and Nevada Consolidated should shortly advance. Chino is a purchase at its present price of $13.00 as on its showing it should not go under this price; Giroux, we think, is good at the present level. There seems to be no question as to the value of Lake which is every day gaining a higher mark and this applies to Osceola as well. I would advise watching Baltic. At the same time one must remember that all newly incorporated companies of this order see many vicissitudes before they reach a level founded on their intrinsic value. With the recovery in the stock market there seems to be no doubt that the copper stocks will go up proportionately.

Local Securities—Business in local stocks and bonds has been greatly reduced for the past week or so and this may be attributed to generally depressed stock market conditions which prevail in almost all of the country's big exchanges and also, to the extended period of heavy dealings which California securities enjoyed throughout the greater part of last year. At the present time, Alaska Packers and the Hawaiian Sugar stocks appear to be the strongest spots on the local list. The former stock continues to make new high records which seem to express the satisfaction of the public with the association's annual report which came out last week. Sugar stocks occupy a favored position caused by the strength of the raw sugar market and the crop prospects for the ensuing year which speak of extra dividends on several of the companies. Hawaiian Commercial, Honokaa, Hutchinson, Makaweli, Onomea, Paauhau and Union are all holding their recent advances with a show of considerable strength. Associated Oil has lately gone through a large amount of selling and has declined a number of points. There does not seem to be any technical change in the company's affairs that would justify this slump, although it is said that dividend prospects on Associated Oil are not as bright as they were at the latter part of last year. Spring Valley Water has become very quiet and weaker if anything and is talked of, in a speculative way, in but few circles. Pacific Telephone and Pacific Gas stocks, in sympathy with the declining New York Stock Market, are also very weak and are lately much neglected in the local market. Bond transactions are greatly reduced and outside of declines in Peoples Water 5s and Market Street Cable 5s, show no special features. It is said that the local market will remain quiet for the next month or so and may even in a general way seek slightly lower levels but as the majority of the California stocks and bonds possess great merit it is thought that the list should again start to improve after that time.

She Held Her Dresses Too High

Mrs. Patrick Calhoun administered a gentle rebuke to one of the young ladies at a recent Greenway ball and did it in a fashion which was pointed and effective without hurting the girl's feelings. The young lady is piquant and bewitching, but that is as closely as I care to identify her. While dancing she held her gown a trifle too high, thereby exposing to the view of the other merrymakers a pair of well-turned ankles and shapely limbs. A number of the more conventional matrons were quite shocked by this unconscious exhibition, but only one knew just how to bring it to an end. That one was the charming and always tactful Mrs. Calhoun. She called the young lady to her and said: "Permit me to adjust the drapery of your dress. Now, hold your gown this way and you will not spoil its beautiful lines." The words were accompanied by a deft lowering of the dress which effectually concluded the unusual exposure of which everybody except the young lady herself was painfully aware.

Cupid and Jennie Crocker

For many reasons, the chief of which is obvious even to the obtuse, Miss Jennie Crocker's fluctuations of sentiment are matters of the profoundest concern to her friends. A girl with so much money as she has to throw to the birds, or convert into pearl necklaces, as fancy dictates, is naturally regarded as a fine, available figure for the kind of romance that Cupid loves to weave in the lines of favored mortals. And naturally also, as she is a prize beyond the domain of the commonplace, there is more than ordinary interest in the pursuit thereof. Every gallant upon whom she bestows her smiles has friends who takes a lively, personal interest in the outcome. To add to all these circumstances the element of elusiveness which Miss Crocker betrays is to afford a faint conception of the somewhat thrilling effect of the competition on society at large. All the while Miss Crocker bubbles over with the joy of living, and separation from the bliss of single blessedness seems remote from her thoughts. Nevertheless the bavardes are on the qui vive for symptoms of the fever, and every new gallant that heaves in sight becomes the object of speculation. The latest tip out from the center of gossip is that a young Italian Adonis is at present close up. Since meeting him Miss Crocker has taken an interest in the study of Italian, a circumstance that is regarded as fraught with significance.

A well known society man was being relieved of his overcoat at the Tillman affair the other day when a pistol in a holster fell from the pocket. Several ladies were leaving at the time and saw the weapon before the butler replaced it in the pocket of the overcoat. The young chap is now being called "the unfighter" by those who have heard of the incident.

Observations of a Social Philosopher

A young man whose grandmother was one of the belles of our provincial aristocracy and whose prospects entitle him to be regarded as "a good catch" poured a few timely observations into my ear the other day. The observations were apropos the complaint recently voiced by certain representatives of the fashionable herd about the lowering of the bars of their swell corral. If there is anything to complain of, according to this young social philosopher, it is the scarcity of interesting persons in the present day smart set. It has occurred to him that there is a painful lack of vivacity and originality in the smart set and that something should be done to give it color and distinction. He believes that our fashionable herd has degenerated as a result of the dying out of the old stock and the infusion of too much of the blood of the mediocrities that inherited money from parents who had none of the enterprise, courage or family traditions of the society leaders of pioneer days. To liven things up a bit, he argues, the bars should be lowered but with discernment and discrimination.

The "Rushing" of Miss Farrell

The observations of the young social philosopher are respectfully and with due deference submitted to our social leaders. As to Mr. Greenway he needs no hint.

MISS FRANC PIERCE

An attractive and talented girl who lent her aid to charity in the big extravaganza of the week.

He is always trying to introduce more color into the smart set, and he has a keen eye for the qualities that ring true. It was under his auspices that Miss Kathleen Farrell, the talented niece of Mrs. Shea, was introduced to the only genuine blown-in-the-bottle brand of society some time ago. Now that interesting girl is right in the midst of fashionable proceedings. A month or so ago she came out at a Greenway dance, and many were the lorgnettes raised for scrutiny as is always the case when a new-comer arrives. A little later I met her at the exclusive bon ton dance given by the "Patronesses," as the ladies of our F. F. S. F. designated themselves. Next I heard of her rehearsing for the Professor Napoleon performance, and in terms encomiastic. Her dance, it was predicted would be the gem of the evening. The fact is that from the moment of her coming out Miss Farrell has been "rushed," as they say, at Blingum, which means that she possesses engaging qualities and is decidedly what the newspaper reporters call "an acquisition."

Miss Tillman's Debut

It would possibly be unjust to say that the De Sabla ball was eclipsed by the Tillman continuous performance of last week but it was certainly rivaled. Miss Vera de Sabla had made the most brilliant debut of the season until Miss Agnes Tillman was formally launched at an elaborate reception followed by two simultaneous dinners, one for fifty and one for twenty guests, which were in turn followed by a dance; a series of events that extended well over ten hours. The dinners took place in the dining-room and billiard room of the Tillman residence, one for the pretty debutante and her young friends, and a smaller one for the elders. There may have been a luncheon preceding the reception but it is not recorded. The Tillman home is one of the spacious old mansions of a former decade and amply met the requirements of the Tillman hospitality. It was formerly the Frank Goad residence and was especially arranged for entertaining on a large scale. The three Goad girls, now Mrs. Osgood Hooker, Mrs. Charles McIntosh and Mrs. Robinson Reilly of Paris, gave many jolly dances in the big old-fashioned ball-room. I believe the last brilliant affair for which the house was thrown open previous to the festivities of last Saturday, was the wedding of Miss Genevieve Goad and Andrew Martin, the second son of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, which took place in the music-room, in the presence of many guests. The obvious illness of the young bridegroom rather marred the gaiety of this occasion, and it was only a month later that he passed away in Santa Barbara. Genevieve Goad Martin later married Robinson Reilly of Washington and they make their home in Paris. Frederick Tillman who made a fortune in spices, bought the house which crowns Washington street hill several years ago, and its hospitable traditions promise to be lavishly maintained. Miss Tillman, by the way, is one of the cleverest of the younger girls. She has written verses which display much poetic ability.

MISS GLADYS PLATT

One of the dainty maids who appeared as a "Mary Jane Girl" in the "Professor Napoleon" extravaganza.

Amid flowers and sighs Miss Enid Gregg left for the East and Europe last week, leaving many an aching heart behind. I'm told that Roger Top is inconsolable since the departure of this charming girl. Miss Gregg will be gone some time and will study music with the best professors in the French capital.

George Keppel, Wine Agent

In speaking of the Honorable and Mrs. George Keppel last week I forgot to mention that the husband of the king's chum is a wine agent. He is a member of a small firm of wine merchants on Pall Mall and I am told that he has made a comfortable income out of commissions on sales to the fashionable friends of his wife. Keppel is a man of versatility, for at one time he was the agent of Sir Thomas Lipton's teas. From the selling of tea to the selling of wine is quite a leap, but no doubt there is more profit in the wine business, for undoubtedly the friends of Mrs. Keppel consume more champagne than oolong. Whether Keppel's firm supplies wine to No. 3 Carlton House Terrace where his wife is now installed I do not know, but if he does, he has the honor of being a purveyor to the king, for Edward dines and sups at Mrs. Keppel's very frequently. As a wine agent Keppel is worthy of being bracketted with Harry Lehr of Newport and our own Ned Greenway, but he has never had the social leadership which belongs to these sprightly gentlemen and never will, the scheme of English society not allowing such a position.

King Edward Abhors Divorce

The very latest speculation in the American colony of London, I learn from a gossipy correspondent, deals with the size of the dent which Mrs. John Jacob Astor will make in English society. Mrs. Astor has big designs on British exclusiveness and is expected to make a whirlwind campaign for the favor of the most sacred circles. Undoubtedly she will find many doors open to her golden knock, but it is being pointed out that she can hardly hope for royal patronage. Mrs. Astor, as all the world has had the opportunity of learning, is a divorced woman and King Edward has placed a ban upon divorcees. It is said that even a marriage to a titled Englishman will not serve to rehabilitate a divorced person in the eyes of that stern moralist, the king; and it will be interesting to see this theory tested in the case of Mrs. Astor. It may surprise many to learn that King Edward is such an uncompromising stickler for the proprieties of social intercourse, but many incidents have shown that the son of Queen Victoria is not unworthy of his parent in the observance of external forms of virtue. It will be remembered, for instance, that as Prince of Wales the king was proud to number Richard Croker among his intimates, but the former boss of Tammany has never received royal recognition. He has been cast out even as Henry V. cast out the Falstaff who had delighted Prince Hal. A Prince of Wales may cultivate sports and ex-bosses but a king must be more careful. Hence it is that King Edward in lieu of Croker, has taken Pierpont Morgan into his confidence. Morgan is higher than any other layman in the councils of the Episcopalian Church, he is an enthusiastic art collector and is lavish in financial tips to his titled friends. He is just the sort of man whom royalty may honor with impunity and if he indulges certain eccentricities of conduct, it is possible that he is therein not so different from the king. Mr. Morgan has never been divorced.

Harold Maundrell, the partner of Miss Flossie Cluff in the spook's dance in the "Professor Napoleon" extravaganza, called on Miss Alice Doe one evening on his way to a dress rehearsal. When he left the Doe home he found that his motor car containing his suit case with his costume had been stolen. There was great scurrying to get a new costume ready.

A Bourbon Taxicabby

Parisians so inclined may now employ a Bourbon prince as a taxicabby and so many are taking advantage of the opportunity that the titled chauffeur is reaping a harvest in fares and tips. A letter from Paris brings me the information that Prince Charles Louis of Bourbon has taken out a license as a taxi-chauffeur and is now to be found daily plying for hire with his smart cab along the boulevards. He is the grandson of Naundorff, a famous Pretender who claimed to be the Dauphin that escaped from the Temple Prison. Many favored his claim, but more believed him to be a Spandau watchmaker and one who, if not a rogue, had hallucinations. The Dutch government permitted a stone to be raised in his memory inscribed "Here lies Louis XVII., King of France and Navarre." The Third Republic gave to Naundorff's descendants permission to bear the name of Bourbon and to adopt princely rank. They are still princes and princesses, but in the present day they follow trades and professions not at all befitting their supposed rank. The eldest son of the house owns a wine shop where workmen take their liquor "from the zinc." For the moment, however, the fashion is to be driven in the Bois with a Bourbon at the wheel.

The Gay Prince of Monaco

Some of the foreign correspondents have noted the fact that Prince Louis of Monaco has brought suit in Paris against Mlle. Juliette Louvet but they don't seem to know what the row was all about. It is the latest bit of scandal on which the boulevardiers are regaling their tired palates. Like his father, the reigning prince of Monaco, Prince Louis is noted for his gallantries. He is the son of his father's first wife who was Lady Mary Douglass-Hamilton. The prince divorced her and later married the widowed Duchess of Richelieu who was Miss Alice Heine, daughter of a New Orleans banker. They were divorced eight years ago. Prince Louis who is now forty years old, has been very fond of Mlle. Louvet. This charming young woman lives in a delightful little house in the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne. Prince Louis was seen there so often that the neighbors supposed it was his home, but his suit has disabused them of that idea. He claims that Mlle. Louvet refused to restore to him certain family portraits which were given to him by his mother and which adorned the walls of the bird's-nest on the avenue. The prince sent a notary and a bailiff to the house and they seized the portraits but the notary has refused to turn them over and the prince has been compelled to bring action against his erstwhile friend. Paris is waiting for the trial of that action with considerable interest.

Techau Tavern's Vocal Concerts

The Techau Tavern will again entertain its patrons with vocal concerts of a very high order, such as were given previous to the disaster of 1906, when the cafe was located in Mason street. The public will remember that the management of the Techau Tavern originated this form of entertainment for the cafe patrons in San Francisco by first presenting the Royal Hawaiian Quintette which sang itself into the hearts of our cafe-going public. They met with such great success that the management decided, on the expiration of their contract, to continue giving its patrons the best talent procurable, and to that end brought out the Neapolitan Quartet from Italy. These Italian singers pleased the patrons of the Techau Tavern so much that, although they were only engaged for eight weeks, they remained for five months. The management has now procured an operatic attraction which will no doubt eclipse all its previous efforts in this line. The singers will be accompanied by an orchestra of soloists and the concerts will be given daily for luncheon, during shopping hours, dinner time, and after the theatre.

It is said that Mrs. Kate Voorhies Henry and her inseparable friend Miss Jennie Lee will leave for New York in the near future on a visit to Queen Vergilia Bogue Baron.

Not the Jew That Shakespeare Drew

By Edward F. O'Day

It is a matter of stage history that when Alexander Pope first saw Charles Macklin, the great Irish actor, in the role of Shylock he wrote: "This is the Jew that Shakespeare drew." There was good reason for Pope's admiration. As a student and commentator of Shakespeare he knew that the representation of Shylock as a low comedian which had been a stage tradition for more than one hundred years, was a caricature of the splendid character delineated by the dramatist. Yet the old tradition lingered into another century and it was only when the great Kean revived and bettered the Macklin interpretation that Shylock was permanently rehabilitated. It was a great service which Macklin and Kean did the stage, but if Louis James labors under the delusion that he is destined to be bracketted with them, he is doomed to disappointment. James has never given the theatre any but the traditional Shakespearian characters and although he has departed from usage in his depiction of Shylock, he has been untrue to Shakespeare and not to Louis James. Throughout a long career devoted to Shakespearian tragedy James has been consistently James in all the roles he has attempted. His Richard III is own brother to his Brutus, his Brutus to his Othello, his Othello to his Macbeth and now he gives us a Shylock from the self-same venter. James' Shylock has the pouted strutting carriage, the heavy stiff-kneed tread, the sawing gestures, the windy susurrations that we have known for years in James' other Shakespearian roles. This Shylock would have been as likely to endure the voiding of Christain rheum on his beard as Othello; he would have been as likely to sharpen his knife on his shoe as Brutus in the capitol; he would have been as likely to stagger from the court with streaming eyes as Richard III. In a word this Shylock is an excellent depiction of James the tragedian but it is not the Shylock of Shakespeare. If James thinks that it is, if he imagines that he is completing the work commenced by Macklin and carried on by Kean, he is wofully at fault, for he has put the character through a reducing process which has not refined it, except by eliminating all characteristics which are alien to the character of James. Of course everybody knows that James is an excellent comedian. The Falstaff which he gave us in his production of "The Merry Wives" some time ago was a continual joy. Old-timers remember his wonderful portrayal of the jester in "Francesca da Rimini." If James must enact the serious role of Shylock why does he not return to the old tradition shattered by Macklin and put to death by Kean. By giving us a low comedy Shylock he would at least teach us a lesson in stage history and might create a sensation besides. At any rate he would not suggest disquieting comparisons with the late Richard Mansfield and the living Robert Mantell. The program tells us that James presents the Booth version of "The Merchant of Venice." He does nothing of the kind. He presents a mangled version which would shame the meanest barnstormer. We have grown used to James' remorseless cutting of beautiful speeches, so there is no use protesting that the quintessential poetry in which this play abounds has been wantonly marred. But it is impossible to grow accustomed to James' interpolation of silly lines. Why does he not tell us in the program that the play has been adapted by Louis James from Edwin Booth's version of Shakespeare? That would be the truth. In my experience of various presentations of "The Merchant of Venince" I have never seen an actress less fitted to play Portia than Aphie James. She suggests the high school girl who reads the lines in the closing exercises, only the high school girl, having had the advantage of more of less sympathetic teaching, attacks the blank verse in a more determined spirit. Mrs. James seems to have a good local memory. Her mind's eye pictures the word which ends each hexameter and she swings her voice upward over the verse, always reaching the highest pitch on the last syllable and dropping down again for the next line. It is the most persistent singsong I have heard and it is not alleviated by any special vocal music, for Mrs. James has an unsympathetic instrument to play on. Portia is one of the most charming women in Shakespeare, combining extreme feminine delicacy with masculine keen-wit and balancing with piquant nicety between boldness and modesty. Mrs. James has not mastered the part; one knows that just as soon as she makes her first entrance, affecting a swimming gait that might become Sapho at the studio ball or Cleopatra in the midst of her women but is foreign to the lady of Belmont. The Antonio of this production is not only a sad but a saddening actor; the Bassanio would never have captivated the Portia if the Portia were the real Portia; the Lorenzo is never once half-convincing. Jessica, by the way, ignores the boyish disguise and escapes in her Jewish costume. The Launcelot Gobbo stood out as a cheerful bit in a dreary production.

Stage

Marie Cahill, Mistress of Chaff

The stage has a number of players who are adepts in the genial art of chaffing, but they are mostly men. Chaffing is a masculine characteristic, more so than most other forms of humor. One rarely meets a woman who has the gift of banter and in the rare occasions when this quality is found in the gentler sex, it is ten to one that feminine wisdom or instinct represses its exercise. In the scheme of life it is not considered fitting that a woman should poke fun at a man and as for a woman poking fun at a woman (to her face), it is, I am credibly informed, discountenanced in the best circles which of course make the rules for all other circles. Women there are a-plenty who possess the sense of humor, traditions to the contrary notwithstanding, but their humor is never of the mellow genial type. It is illuminative but not reflective; it abounds in whimsicalities, in quaint turns of thought and speech, in oddities of outlook, but it is almost entirely lacking in the direct delivery of witticisms that are barbed with ridicule and sting to laughter. This sort of humor springs from the masculine mind and it is sometimes bitter and sometimes kindly, according as the mind has matured sweetly or soured in the aging process. Woman rarely boasts this quality, I repeat, but when it is bestowed upon her and she cultivates it to a pleasant bloom, it is an irresistible charm. Its very rarity is appealing, but much more the incongruity that is expressed by a masculine grace in a mind intensely feminine. Like every other charm of a true woman humor must be a matter of sex. To abandon the field of generalization and to get down to particulars, Marie Cahill is one of the few women on the stage who have this fascinating attribute of humor. Miss Cahill is a chaffer, a "kidder," to use the vulgar term and she has one of the pleasantest chaffing manners which it has ever been my good fortune to enjoy. She has a light heart and a swift wit and out of these two enviable possessions she fashions golden laughter for herself and her audience. Every situation evokes from her the right word, uttered at precisely the right moment with the right intonation. For the right word the librettist is more or less responsible and in "The Boys and Betty" George Hobart is continuously equal to that responsibility; but I have no doubt that Miss Cahill interpolates her own fancies, as they well within her. I feel sure that she can chaff off the stage as charmingly as on. Banter is by its nature foreign to uproarious mirth. It is a quiet form of pleasantry that diffuses laughter like a broad musically-flowing brook, instead of concentrating it in a torrent of hilarity. Miss Cahill's banter keeps the audience laughing all the time, but laughing gently in a continuous glow of amusement. When she isn't indulging this delicious disposition Miss Cahill sings. Her singing is a matter of temperament like her humor.

TERESA CARRENO

The famous pianiste who will give recitals at the Garrick Theatre.

She has an inconsiderable vocal gift, measured by volume and she can never hope to satisfy the musical critic who exacts technical excellence; but her singing is informed with her sunny personality and it always pleases. To ragtime she brings an originality of treatment which may be imitated but cannot be reproduced by any singer who is not another Cahill and I, for one, have never seen another Cahill. Marie Dresser certainly possesses unique attractions; May Irwin also; but no doubt they are sufficient unto themselves and do not challenge comparison with Miss Cahill. There is room for all three in our theatre. Until we have an opportunity to see the others we may fittingly enthrone Miss Cahill on a pedestal of solitary distinction and acclaim her in these western parts queen of the genial art of banter and a princess in the realm of song. —Edward F. O'Day.

Mrs. Carter at the Van Ness

Mrs. Leslie Carter, the emotional actress, is to appear at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday night, to remain there for one week only, presenting a new play by Edward Peple, author of "The Prince Chap," a problem drama of modern life and emotions called "Vasta Herne." The press agent announces that the production of this play will be one of the big events of the theatrical season and that wherever it has been seen it has been hailed as the biggest success of Mrs. Carter's long career. It is a marked departure for Mrs. Carter and it differs materially from the work she has done in "Zaza," "Mme. Du Barry," "The Heart of Maryland," or even "Kassa." It is the first time in many years that theatregoers will have an opportunity of seeing Mrs. Carter in modern costumes and some of the Paris gowns of the latest modes which she wears in the title role of "Vasta Herne" are in themselves sufficient to lend the entertainment distinction. "Vasta Herne" is described as a big, modern problem play, dealing with a striking theme in an unusual way, and affording Mrs. Carter the best opportunity of her career. The only matinee at the Van Ness during the Carter week will be given on Saturday.

The Teresa Carreno Concerts

The only one of the world's great pianists to visit the west this season will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, the beautiful Spanish artist who will give two concerts at the Garrick, the dates being next Thursday night, February 3 and Sunday afternoon, February 6. At the first concert the artist will play Edward MacDowell's "Keltic Sonata" which has not been heard here since the lamented young composer visited us some eight years ago. Chopin's seldom played "Sonata," Op. 58 and the Liszt arrangement of "The Erlking" will be other attractive numbers. At the Sunday afternoon concert the star will play the Schumann "Quintette" for piano and strings assisted by the new Lyric String Quartette, besides the Beethoven "Sonata," Op. 109, Bach's "Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue," a group of Chopin and a group of MacDowell works.

Robert Mantell Coming to Columbia

The second and last week of Marie Cahill in "The Boys and Betty" begins Monday night, January 31. The only matinee will be on Saturday. The success achieved by Robert Mantell when he appeared at the Van Ness Theatre in a series of classic productions has induced the great star to arrange a three weeks' dramatic festival at the Columbia Theatre and it will be started on Monday night, February 7. The star will be supported by Miss Marie Booth Russell and other players who have won distinction for artistic efforts in the interpretation of Shakespeare. The most extensive repertoire ever attempted by any American player has been arranged for this engagement and the announcement is made that fourteen different plays ranging from comedy to tragedy will be offered. Included in the list of plays will be found "Louis XI," "The Lady of Lyons," "Julius Caesar," "King John," "Macbeth," "King Lear," "Hamlet," "Richelieu," "Othello," "Merchant of Venice," "Romeo and Juliet," "Richard III," "As You Like It" and "The Marble Heart." The repertoire will be announced Monday. The sale of seats begins Thursday.

"Alice of Old Vincennes" at the Alcazar

Edward E. Rose's dramatization of Maurice Thompson's tale of revolutionary times, "Alice of Old Vincennes," will be the Alcazar's bill during the coming week, commencing Monday evening. The play was last presented in the old Alcazar half-a-dozen years ago, when it ran three weeks. Like some other plays adapted from novels, "Alice of Old Vincennes" is more interesting on the stage than between book covers, because the story is more concisely narrated and has the advantage of conveying in action as well as in words its vital scenes as well as actually showing instead of describing the people and places. The play breathes poetry and romance as well as intrigue and warfare. Alice is the kind of a girl whose charms any man of intellect would find it difficult to resist, for she has brains as well as bravery. In this role Evelyn Vaughan will be seen at her best for in some respects it is akin to that of Mistress Kitty Bellairs.

The Schumann-Heink Concerts

Manager Will Greenbaum announces that he is ready to receive mail orders for the concerts of Mme. Schumann-Heink who is to sing at the Garrick Sunday afternoon, February 13, Thursday night, February 17 and Sunday afternoon, February 20. These mail orders will be filled in the order of their receipt and must be accompanied by check or money order. At the opening concert the diva will sing five great operatic scenes and arias, including the "Waltraute Scene" from "Gotterdamerung." The others will be from Mozart's "Titus," Saint Saens' "Samson and Delilah" and Meyerbeer's "Le Prophet." There will also be songs by Schubert, Loewe, Strauss, Weingartner, Nevin, Chadwick, Bond and Ganz. At the second concert another great offering is promised, including some novelties by Max Reger, L. Stein and Richard Sahla. One of the favorites on this list is Schubert's "Erlking." For the farewell concert a special program will be prepared.

"Babes in Toyland" at the Macdonough

"Babes in Toyland," the operatice extravaganza by Victor Herbert and Glen MacDonough, will be the offering at the Macdonough Theatre, Oakland, on Sunday, January 30 and Monday evening, January 31. There will be a matinee as well as an evening performance on Sunday. The company is headed by Harry Ladell and is a most competent one. The chorus is said to be unusually beautiful and the production, in every respect, is an elaborate one. William H. Crane in George Ade's "Father and the Boys" finishes his engagement at the Macdonough this Saturday evening.

The First Sunday "Pop"

This Sunday afternoon at Kohler and Chase Hall the first of Greenbaum's Sunday "Pop" concerts will be given, the performers being the Lyric String Quartette composed of Misses Mary and Dorothy Pasmore, Sallie Ehrman and Viola Furth and Mrs. B. M. Stich, soprano, with Miss Lydia Reinstein as accompanist. The program is a very beautiful and interesting one with numbers from Mozart, Brahms, Schubert, Franz and Beethoven. The next concert will be on Sunday, February 27, when Edgar Stilman Kelly's "Quintette" will be played for the first time in this city with Mr. Frederick M. Biggerstaff at the piano.

"St. Elmo" in Oakland

The much talked about stage version of "St. Elmo" will be seen in Oakland for the first time on Monday evening, when the Bishop players will offer it at Ye Liberty Playhouse as their attraction for next week. The piece caused so much discussion during its recent run at the Alcazar Theatre in this city that there is hardly any need of going into detail regarding the play, except that the original Willard Holcomb version—the only authorized one—will be used by them. During its presentation at the Alcazar "St. Elmo" proved to be more dramatic and to have a stronger appeal than one with sceptic memories of a book read years ago would believe. St. Elmo is a fascinating stage figure, and the steadfastness and fearlessness of Edna Earl compel admiration.

Another Week of Figman

Max Figman has only one week more at the Savoy, commencing Sunday afternoon in his fine comedy "Mary Jane's Pa." Mr. Figman has been as much a surprise as his play. He has demonstrated that he is a consummate master of his art and has a facility for drawing tears as well as provoking smiles. His performance of the ne'erdowell who is transformed by his love of wife and children into a noble member of society, is a gem of histrionic achievement. The following attraction at the Savoy will be Miss Rose Melville in her quaint and delightful character, "Sis Hopkins."

Julius Steger at the Orpheum

Julius Steger whose success in "The Fifth Commandment" is still remembered will reappear at the Orpheum next week and present a new musical playlet entitled "The Way to the Heart." It is from a German source and has been adapted by Ruth Comfort Mitchell. Eastern critics pronounce it a worthy and fitting successor to "The Fifth Commandment." Gus Edwards' "Kountry Kids" will appear in a rural comedy in one act called "Miss Rose's Birthday." This operetta by the author of "School Days" and "The Blonde Typewriters" is given by a dozen youngsters who sing and dance cleverly. All the musical numbers in it were written by Mr. Edwards. August Prato's Simian Cirque will also be included in the coming attractions. Arthur Whitelaw known as "The Irish American" will give a monologue which is said to bristle with humor. He sings a number of original songs.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

FAIRCHILD'S, PARIS, SAYS:

Some Observations and Notebook Sketches of Men's Dress in the French Metropolis

Winter being in full swing here now, the cold days have caused long-heldover "fall fashions" to be replaced by winter styles; even the blue sky of Paris is darkened and the outdoor parties give way to the society functions, theatre parties, suppers, balls, etc.

Now, then, what are the peculiarities of men's wear to be seen in our beautiful city?

Peculiarities

To begin with, I am going to tell you that, naturally enough, the long rolls which were so conspicuous in the summer coats are reduced to more practical sizes for winter wear; no more broad shoulder effects ("pin cushions") are to be seen here, though we don't patronize the rather skinfitting clothes of the great tailors from Saville Row in London. There is no solution of discontinuity, as I would say in French, between the upper shoulder slope and the top of the sleeve; that effect is obtained with little or, better, with no padding, by a special cutting of the sleeve. The tendency is to shorten the length of last season's coats, but not so much as in the English styles.

About the Stuffs

Two kinds of stuffs meet with success; these are the rather light in color English cheviots, general dye; gray, with darker or blue checks or oval spots (called here "nid d'abeille"—bee's hive) and the smoother serges or "peigne's" with the diagonal effect or smaller check or twill. The above are generally used for morning coats. More dressy garments are cut in plain gray stuff, rather shaggy, or in blue cheviot.

Really smart cutaway coats (jaquettes), dinner jackets and full dress coats are made with rather shaggy cloths.

As for overcoats, thick but loose wools in gray patterns for morning wear, dark gray for business or dress are used.

To make a long story short, gray dyes prevail here, though very dark maroon colors are favored by some eccentric swells.

Overcoat Styles

For an introduction to the best and really "Parisian styles" let me lead you to the smart places in Paris. It will unquestionably be less wearisome than any tailor's description.

Though the weather is biting it's good to have a walk in the morning, so go to the Avenue du Bois, where swell-dressed men are likely to be met.

Look at that elderly gentleman walking huskily with that smart young man! Their clothes bear evidently the hall-mark of a great tailor. That's the first-rate game for us. Both of them wear "bowlers," the former a half-turned, brimmed one, the latter a very low-brimmed one with low crown.

The first of the gentlemen has a sack overcoat of rather dark color, with no seam and no cut in the back; the other wears one of those "nid d'abeilles" stuffs. The shape is very ample, two long folds falling from the middle of the back, where the underseam of the sleeves is attached; there's a seam in the middle of the back, followed by an opening; the sleeves are turned up at the bottom. See! they have turned sharp and walk toward us.

The first man's coat is single breasted though the roll of the collar is rather long and wide and buttons just a little aside the middle. The other's is double breasted, buttoning up with three buttons. Notice the long roll with no crease, the half-an-inch wide seam along the edge, together with the fullness of the skirts.

Sack Coats

Have an "apperitif at the Pavillon d'Armenonville" or at Cafe Chineis, the rendexvous of the riders, and there will be noticed two kinds of sack coats, single-breasted or double.

The double-breasted coat, which is becoming very popular, is cut half loose at the waist, rather long, buttoning with three buttons; the roll has no crease, so that it may be fastened to the second button, if desired; the front falls straight and is very flat (the curve of the roll being obtained by a plait underneath).

The collar itself is long on the breast; what we call renverse (reversed), showing a little expanse of tie and skirt. No more wide skirts; they hang straight from the hips, and the side seams of the back are open at the bottom. Most of these coats have no breast pocket, no ticket pockets, only two wide-flapped ones on the hips.

Most of the young men wear this kind of coat, which is very becoming to slim individuals.

The single-breasted coat referred to is on the same lines, a little bit tighter at the waist, with one or two vents cut in the back; it fastens with three buttons, very near to each other. The front is cut away from the third button.

The vests are mostly cut single breasted, with five buttons, cut away at the buttom.

Now this refers to the suits of which coat, vest and trousers are of the same stuff.

In this case it will be observed that many young men, such as may be seen at Portlands, Armenonville, wear rather wide trousers with the turnup bottoms and high belts, cut on the same pattern as military ones. Such trousers are generally worn with shoes, in most cases patent leather and of American shape. Nevertheless, the really well-dresed man wears straight trousers, rather wide down from the knees.

PURITY ESSENTIAL

In no other form of food is Purity so absolutely essential as in milk products. Richness is also necessary, as without richness, milk is of little value as a food. Purity and richness are the embodiment of Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. As a food for infants or for general household purposes it has no equal.

blond. I must admit that I felt a slight shock and the embarrassed silence of the other passengers indicated that they felt much the same as I did. Yet the thing was absurd, for there was nothing about this gentleman to arouse the slightest suspicion.

"Why do I not answer?" he said. "For the reason that taking into consideration my name and the color of my hair, I have already made the same investigation and arrived at the same result. There is no doubt about it, I am he, and I insist upon my immediate arrest."

He said these words in a comical way, yet his thin lips seemed to become thinner as he pressed them tightly together, and his eyes became slightly bloodshot.

Of course he was joking, yet his manner and expression impressed us strangely.

"But have you the wound?" asked Miss Underdown naively.

"That is true," he said; "the wound is missing."

With a nervous gesture he turned up his sleeve and showed his arm, but I was at once struck with the thought that he exhibited his "left" arm. Miss Nellie had made the same observation, as I noted by the peculiar look she gave me.

To tell the truth I was about to call the attention of the other passengers to this fact when another incident attracted our attention. Lady Jerland, the friend of Miss Underdown, came running toward us. The poor lady seemed completely upset. The passengers gathered around her but it was several moments before she was able to speak intelligibly.

"My jewelry, my pearls—they have stolen everything—everything!"

No, they had not taken everything, as we learned later. A very curious thing had happened; the thief had chosen wisely and skilfully. He was evidently a connoisseur in precious stones. From the diamond star and the ruby pendant he had taken not the largest stones but the most valuable, the most precious, those which were of greater value and would take up less space.

In order to accomplish this, the thief in full daylight, while Lady Jerland was taking tea in the cabin, had been compelled to go along a much-frequented passageway, break in the door of her cabin, find a little bag which had been purposely concealed in the bottom of a hat-box, open it and extract the stones.

The moment the robbery was known the passengers unanimously concluded that the thief could be only Arsene Lupin. The whole thing was characteristic; his method of working had always been complicated, mysterious, unforeseeable.

At dinner, this is what happened. The two seats, one on the right and one on the left of Rozaine were empty, and later in the evening we learned that he had been summoned to the captain's cabin.

It was a great relief to all of us when we heard of his arrest; people began to breathe freely. That evening we played cards, checkers and dominos and had a very jolly time in the cabin. There was also dancing, and Miss Underdown seemed to be in such good spirits I was convinced that if the attentions of Rozaine had pleased her in the beginning, she had forgotten all about them. The charm of her manner conquered me completely, and about midnight, when we went to the deck for a breath of fresh air and watched the moonlight scintillate upon the waves, I plucked up courage to tell her that I loved her and she did not seem to be very much displeased.

But imagine the general astonishment on the following morning when it was learned that the evidence against Rozaine had proved insufficient and he had been set at liberty. He had exhibited papers which were perfectly regular and which showed beyond a doubt that he was the son of a wealthy merchant of Bordeaux. Besides, his arms showed absolutely no trace of any wound.

"Papers! Certificate of birth!" cried the enemies of Rozaine. "But Arsene Lupin is able to give you as many as you want! As for the wound, it was simply a mistake, he never had any wound!"

To this the others objected that it was proven beyond a doubt that at the time the robbery was committed Rozaine was on deck. To this the others replied:

"Does a man of the stamp of Arsene Lupin have to be present when he carries out a crime?"

Still there was one point which even those who were inclined to believe in Rozaine's innocence could not get around: Who, excepting Rozaine, was traveling alone, was blond and had a name which began with the letter R? Whom could the message have meant if not Rozaine?

A few moments after breakfast Rozaine walked impudently toward us. Miss Underdown and Lady Jerland arose from their chairs as he approached, and walked to another part of the deck. It was evident that they were frightened, yes, frightened.

An hour later a manuscript circular was passed from hand to hand among the crew, servants and passengers of all classes, signed by M. Rozaine, wherein he stated that he would pay ten thousand francs reward to the man who would discover Arsene Lupin and find the stolen jewels. And Rozaine further declared in the smoking-room that if no one could find the arch thief, he would find him himself.

"I will not rest under this imputation," he declared, "and if Arsene Lupin is aboard I can assure you that we can have him in irons before we see the lights of Sandy Hook."

THE SURBRUG COMPANY, New York City

Now it was Rozaine against Lupin, or rather, as a good many thought, Lupin against Lupin, for it was the conviction of many of the passengers that Rozaine and the famous thief were one and the same person. The struggle, however, promised to be full of interest.

Two more days passed during which the great ship followed undeviatingly her course toward the port of New York. The passengers saw Rozaine going hither and thither, talking with sailors, stewards and passengers. At night they could see his shadow as he roamed about the deck, evidently determined to leave nothing undone to vindicate himself and bring the real Lupin to justice.

On his part, the captain of the liner used every possible means to find the lost jewels. Every corner of the great ship was searched; every corner in every cabin was minutely examined without exception upon the very just pretext that the last place the thief could have hidden the stolen property was in his own state-room.

"Do you not think they will find the jewels?" Miss Underdown asked me one day. "This man may be a sorcerer, but he certainly does not possess the power to render pearls and diamonds invisible."

"Well, I replied, "they have not yet looked in the linings of our hats nor torn out the linings of our overcoats, or searched our clothing."

I showed her my kodak, 9x12, with which I had taken various pictures of her during the voyage. "Even in a small box like this there is room enough and to spare, for all the jewels of Lady Jerland. One could pretend to take photographs and the trick is done."

The investigations led to no results. Yes, there was one, and it was comic and somewhat ironical: the watch of the captain of the vessel was stolen.

Furious at his loss he redoubled his efforts and watched Rozaine more closely than before. He had several interviews with him. A few hours later the watch was found in the collar-box of the second officer.

All this seemed miraculous and was very clearly in accord with the humorous methods of Arsene Lupin. He was certainly an artist in his line and sometimes when I looked at Rozaine, taciturn and self-contained, and when I thought of the double role that this curious man was playing, I could not help feeling a certain admiration for his talent.

The night before we landed, the officer of the watch heard groans emanating from one of the darkest portions of the deck. He ran up and found a man lying on his back, his head and face enveloped in a thick gray scarf, his hands and feet tied by means of a strong but small cord. He was freed at once from his bonds, assisted to his feet and every care was given him.

It was Rozaine.

He had been assaulted while on one of his tours of investigation, knocked down and robbed. A visiting card was found pinned to his coat upon which these words had been written in pencil:

Arsene Lupin accepts with thanks the ten thousand francs offered as a reward by M. Rozaine.

As a matter of fact, the stolen port folio had contained twenty bills of one thousand francs each.

Of course, they accused the unfortunate man of being the real author of this attack upon himself, but besides the fact that it would not be possible for any man to tie himself up in this manner, it was clearly demonstrated that the writing on the card differed absolutely from that of Rozaine and bore a strong resemblance to that of Arsene Lupin, a photograph of which had been printed in a paper that was found on board.

And so they were forced to admit that Rozaine was not Lupin, and yet the certainty that the latter was on board had been demonstrated beyond a doubt and by an act which indicated how dangerous this man could be.

All were in a state of terror and confusion. No passenger dared remain alone for a moment in his state-room nor had he the courage to go to lonely places on the deck. They walked about together in groups of two or three, but after all every man had a lurking fear of his neighbor. The fact was that they were not now menaced by a single individual, isolated, watched and hence rendered less dangerous. Lupin was—everybody. In our excited imagination he possessed miraculous and unlimited power. We believed him to be capable of assuming the most surprising and unexpected disguises; now he was the respectable Major Rawson or the noble Marquis de Raverdan, or, for we were all rapidly losing our heads, he might be any one of those men whom we knew, even though he was accompanied by wife, children and servants.

The first messages by wireless telegraph which reached us from the coast of the United States brought no news. At least, if they did, the captain did not see fit to communicate it to us, and his silence was by no means reassuring.

The last day seemed to us interminable. We were living in the continual expectation of some great misfortune. This time, we conjectured, it would not be a theft, an assault, but a crime possibly murder. No one believed that a man like Arsene Lupin would limit himself to this theft. Absolute master of the ship, the authorities utterly helpless, he could certainly do as he pleased; he could dispose at will of the property, even of the lives of those on board.

Still, I personally felt a certain amount of gratitude toward him, for his acts had won me the confidence of Miss Nellie and enabled me to pass many delightful hours by her side. She had been deeply impressed by the occurences and, rather timid by nature, sought my protection which, it may well be believed, I was only too glad to grant. Yes, I blessed this rascal, Arsene Lupin. He had brought Miss Underdown and myself closer to each other. It was due to him that I was able to indulge in dreams of love and happiness, more or less chimerical, perhaps, yet why? My family is of noble origin though I confess that our coat-of-arms requires regilding, but it is not unworthy of a gentleman to attempt to win back for his name some of the glory it has lost. I felt that these dreams did not offend Nellie. Her smiling eyes authorized me to indulge in them, and her soft voice seemed to whisper hope.

And, up to the last moment, we leaned together on the rail, side by side, while the American coast gradually rose upon the horizon and seemed to be moving toward us.

On the last day of the voyage all investigations had been practically given up. Everyone, from the first-cabin passengers to the immigrants who crowded the steerage, was awaiting the supreme moment when the ship would dock, and then, perchance, the inexplicable puzzle would be solved. Who was Arsene Lupin? Under what name, under what mask was he hidden?

The great ship passed Sandy Hook and proceeded slowly up the channel. A number of tugs, so small in comparison that they looked like flies buzzing about an ox, accompanied her. They pushed and hauled the leviathan to the dock, and after a few moments the gangways were lowered. There was the usual swarm of custom house officers and people expecting their friends.

Now the supreme moment had arrived. Should I live a hundred years I will never forget a single detail of what followed. "How pale you are, Miss Nellie!" I said to my companion, who was leaning upon my arm.

"And you," she answered, "ah, you seem to have changed so much!"

Before the passengers were permitted to land, a number of men came on board—custom house officers, men in uniform and even postmen.

"Do you know," said Miss Underdown, "that if it were ascertained that this man Arsene Lupin had escaped from the ship while we were on the high sea I really would not be surprised."

I gave a sudden start, and when she asked me what was the matter, I replied:

"Do you see that little old man there, waiting at the gangway?"

"Which? The one with the umbrella and the olive-colored overcoat?"

"Yes. That is Ganimard."

"Ganimard?"

"Yes, the celebrated detective who has taken an oath that he will arrest Arsene Lupin with his own hands. Now I understand why we did not get messages from this side of the Atlantic. Ganimard was there and he doesn't like to have other people meddle with his private affairs."

"Then Arsene Lupin is certain to be captured."

"Who can tell? It seems that Ganimard never saw him excepting when he was disguised. Unless he knows the name under which he took passage it is doubtful if he will be able to lay hands upon him."

"Oh," said Miss Underdown, with that woman's curiosity which has something of cruelty in it, "how I wish I could see him arrested!"

"Let us wait a little. It is certain that Lupin is already aware of the presence of his mortal enemy. He will undoubtedly prefer to be among the last to leave the ship, when the eyes of the old man are tired watching the procession moving down the gang plank."

The passengers began to move. Leaning on his umbrella, with an air of perfect indifference, Ganimard did not seem to pay the slightest attention to the crowd which was passing before him. I noticed that one of the ship's officers stood just behind him and whispered to him from time to time, evidently giving him information regarding the passengers. The Marquis de Raverdan, Major Rawson, the Italian Rivolta, passed by, and finally I saw Rozaine descending the gangway to the dock.

Poor Rozaine! He did not look as if he had recovered from all the misfortunes he had endured on board of that ship. Really, I felt sorry for him.

"Perhaps it is he after all," said Miss Underdown. "What do you think?"

"I think it would be very interesting to have a photograph of the meeting between Ganimard and Rozaine. Would you kindly take my kodak? I am so loaded down with these valises that I cannot use it."

I handed it to her, but it was too late for her to make any use of it. Rozaine passed by. The officer of the ship touched Ganimard's shoulder and whispered something in his ear. The detective simply shrugged his shoulders and Rozaine went on.

But in the name of heaven, then, which one of them was Arsene Lupin? There were not more than twenty people left on board.

"We must go," I said to Miss Underdown. "We cannot remain any longer."

She walked toward the gangway and I followed her. When we arrived at the bottom Ganimard advanced, extended both of his arms and barred our further passage.

"What does this mean?" I exclaimed.

He looked at me keenly for a moment and then said: "This is Arsene Lupin, unless I am very much mistaken!"

I laughed outright.

"No, I am Bernard d'Andrecy."

"Bernard d'Andrecy died three years ago in Macedonia. I should take great pleasure in telling you how you secured his papers and passport."

"But you are crazy! Arsene Lupin procured his passage under a name which began with 'R'."

"Yes, that was another one of your tricks intending to throw us off the scent. You are very smart, my boy, but this time you've lost the game. Come, Lupin, don't weaken, show that you have the nerve for which everyone has always given you credit."

Then, with a rapid movement, he struck me on the wound on my arm. I could not repress a cry of pain, for the blow had fallen upon the wound mentioned in the wireless message and which had not yet healed.

There was nothing to do but surrender. I turned toward Miss Undertown. Pale as death, she staggered and only the rail to which she clung prevented her from falling. Her eyes met mine for a moment and then she looked at the kodak which I had given her. She started and I had the impression, yes, I was absolutely certain that she understood. The jewels were there, in that little black box which I had taken the precaution to hand to her before Ganimard could arrest me; it also contained Rozaine's twenty thousand francs.

I swear that at this moment, as Ganimard and two of his assistants laid hands upon me, my arrest, the hostile looks of the passengers who had gathered about, were completely indifferent to me; I had only one thought and that was what action would Miss Underdown take, knowing what she did.

Would she furnish them with conclusive evidence, which they desired, by simply handing them over the kodak and requesting them to examine it? Would she betray me? Would she act as an enemy who will not forgive, or as a woman who remembers some pleasant hours and whose anger might be tempered by contempt leading, perhaps, to mercy?

She passed on. I bowed very low without saying a word. She mingled with the other passengers on the dock, still carrying my kodak.

"Doubtless," I thought, "she does not dare hand it to me before all these people. Tomorrow, perhaps the day after, she will return it."

But at that moment she was passing close to the edge of the wharf. She stumbled against some packages and dropped the kodak into the river. Then she entered a carriage and drove away.

I had awakened from my dream. It was all over. I stood for a moment with bowed head, feeling a sadness that I had never known before. Then, to the great astonishment of Ganimard, I murmured:

"What a pity it is, after all, that I am not an honest man!"

could not regain his balance while flying over Constantinople. Latham repeatedly has fallen from perilous heights, but luckily without serious consequences. Curtiss had a bad fall on the ice at Baddeck, N. S., while flying the Silver Dart. He bears visible proof in the form of a deep gash in his chin. Williams lost control of his machine while flying above Hempstead Plains last summer and broke his arm.

The Baroness De la Roche recently made numerous successful flights in a Voisin biplane at Chalons. But she lost her presence of mind recently and was critically injured when the machine crashed to the ground. On the same day Santos Dumont, the survivor of accidents without number, barely escaped with his life when he lost his balance while in flight. Sommer, another world beater, limps slightly on account of an accident. Calderara, the Italian military attache, forgot what to do and lay hovering between life and death for weeks as a result of what happened. It is obvious that flying machines are not safe. The point is that they are far more unsafe than the average person realizes. When Wright flew up the Hudson he literally took his life in his hands. As a matter of fact every time an aeroplane driver flies he is in peril of injury and defies death. He is every bit as daring as the man who walks the tightrope above the Niagara Falls, or who jumps from a balloon in a parachute. He courts the same chances as the wild animal tamer. Much depends upon the operator's instinct. But there are many sources of danger he cannot control. He can't start his motor again when it stops in midair. He never knows when it will stop. The least disarrangement of any detail upsets the balance of the machine and makes all human resources useless

In view of these ever present perils it is pleasant to remember that the Los Angeles meet passed off without serious accident. A few trifling mishaps occurred but there was nothing to cast gloom over the meet, to bring home to the pleasure-seekers the imminence of death in the midst of the thrilling sport. Hardly an automobile race takes place of which so much may be recorded. Rheims had no serious accidents; Dominguez had none. It was the best of good fortune in both instances. Great improvements must be made in the aeroplanes before they will be approximately safe. Without doubt there will be further loss of life before mechanical ingenuity grapples seriously with that part of the flying problem. At present it is too interested in the novelty of the whole thing to pay much attention to that sinister aspect of the conquest of the air.

As typical of the present day refinements in high-powered limousines is the interior of the car exhibited at the Madison Square Garden Show built by the E. R. Thomas Motor Company of Buffalo. This body has an interior seating capacity for five people, the auxiliary seats being detachable. When not in use these are simply removed from a socket which is then very inconspicuous. The car is a six-cylinder, 70 horsepower Thomas, the most powerful stock car in the United States.

"Speaking of the Oakland Automobile Show, the results from our standpoint are very gratifying," said R. L. Ijams of The Diamond Rubber Co. "Not only do we show our make of tire on 39 per cent of the total cars exhibited, but we have 100 per cent more equipment than the next nearest tire concern."

Auto Notes

The Haynes Auto Sales Company made two retail sales and one agency deal as a result of the first day's business at the Oakland Automobile Show.

H. E. Doty, assistant coast manager of the White Company, is in charge of the White Company's exhibit of steam and gasoline cars. The White Steamers are the only steam cars on exhibit at the show. Unusual interest is taken in the new White gasoline car of which three models are shown. Mr. Doty who has just come to the coast says that the show compares very favorably with eastern shows. He expressed much surprise at the great variety of cars gathered together and the enthusiasm shown, both by exhibitors and by visitors. Mr. Doty is much pleased with the interest taken in the White cars.

"It is a good show and one that would be creditable to any city. We sold two cars on the opening night and look for splendid business during the week," said Calvin Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Company which has one of the largest and most attractive as well as varied exhibits. There are seven cars suited to almost every purse, need and taste, in the Pioneer exhibit: A Chalmers-Detroit "30," pony tonneau; a Chalmers-Detroit "30" touring car; a Chalmers-Detroit "40," pony tonneau and a "40" touring car; a 6-40 Thomas Flyer, pony tonneau; a Hudson runabout and a Babcock electric.

S. G. Chapman has in his exhibit an Oakland "30" roadster, an Oakland "40" and a Hupmobile "20." The handsome little "Hup" in the exhibit, for which the claim is made that it "compares with the costliest cars as a perfect small diamond with a large one," is one of the hits of the show.

H. W. Bogen, coast distributor for the Empire and Black Crow cars, has placed the agency for both of these popular machines in San Jose with B. Bernard, a well known dealer of the garden city.

Weinstok and Nichols have equipped the new seven passenger Pope-Hartford of George Tyson of Alameda with Morgan and Wright Nobby Treads.

A big Six Winton is being used on an automobile stage line between Folsom and Sacramento, and it has already succeeded in clipping the train schedule between those two places exactly in half. The charge made for the trip is but slightly more than the cost of a ticket on the train, and the better time of the Winton causes it to be heavily patronized. It seldom carries less than ten passengers to the trip.

The Black Crow is as unique as its name in that it supplies a complete line of models, all at popular prices. H. W. Bogen who is coast distributor for the new models, is selling the cars as fast as he can get them. The Model "C" roadster is the leader of the line turned out by the Black Crow factory, and it is said that it is one of the finest pieces of automobile designing and workmanship ever offered at a popular price.

An electric built on the lines of a gasoline car and able to travel at a 25 miles an hour speed is the latest startling announcement of the Babcock Electric Carriage Company. The new car is built along the lines of the most expensive gasoline cars, its hood being much like that of the Thomas Flyer. It is as fully equipped with all the little accessories that make the operation of a machine a joy instead of a burden as any automobile on the market.

Word was received recently by Ivan L. DeJongh of the Standard Motor Car Company from W. L. Hughson who is at present in the East, stating that the local automobile man is much impressed with the prospects for the next season throughout the East. The Ford factory in particular, Hughson states, is working overtime in order to get out enough cars to supply the demands of the dealers and agents throughout the country. Hughson has been successful in getting increased allotments of Ford machines for this territory, the shipments of which are now leaving the factory regularly.

The Standard Motor Car Company recently reported the sale of two Ford cars to the Coalinga Motor Car Company of Coalinga. These are 1910 models of the Ford car and are among the number of Fords contracted for by the Coalinga Motor Car Co., who are representing the Standard Motor Car Company in the southern part of the State.

The other day the Rambler automobile hose truck used by the San Diego department was pressed into service to relieve a team of horses after the team had become stalled in a mire. The horse-drawn aparatus was on a railroad track with its wheels down to the hubs in mud. The Rambler truck pulled it out without any damage or effort. This truck has been in use six months and the service that it has given, coupled with the cost of upkeep, has more than repaid for its substitution in place of a horse-drawn apparatus. The Rambler has answered eighty-two alarms and covered about two thousand miles.

The Howard Automobile Company received two shipments of 1910 Oldsmobiles recently. Included in this shipment are two of the new Close Coupled four-cylinder cars. This is one of the most beautifully finished cars shown on Automobile Row, and is especially adapted for touring purposes. There is a space under both front and rear seats for a suit case, the gas tank being back of the tonneau. This gas tank has a capacity of 30 gallons. The car is particularly easy riding, being equipped with 36 inch wheels, and having shock absorbers all around. The demand for the Close Coupled car is so great this year that the Olds factory announce that at least 50 per cent of their output will be made this year with this type of body.

That the physicians appreciate the necessity of a perfect anti-skidding device on their automobiles in wet weather is shown by the large number of the new Diamond Grip casings being sold them. Among the many prominent purchasers of this type during last week was Dr. E. G. Frisbee.

E. R. Thomas, the Buffalo manufacturer, whose nerve brought victory to the Thomas Flyer in the great Round the World contest from New York to Paris which started February 12, 1908, and finished July 30 of the same year, received the trophy emblematic of the victory at a banquet held at the Automobile Club of America, 54th street, New York, Saturday evening, January 8.

PETITION

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 6228, New Series, Dept. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of WILLIAM HALE, Deceased.

The verified petition of John H. Grady, praying for a decree of this Court authorizing and directing the administrator of the estate of William Hale, deceased, to convey to him certain real property belonging to said estate, which said William Hale had agreed to convey to said John H. Grady by a written contract set forth in said petition, having been duly filed herein, and said real property being situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows, to-wit: Lots numbers Eight (8) to Twenty (20), both inclusive, and Twenty-nine (29) to Forty (40), both inclusive, in Block number Three Hundred and Eighty (380), as the same are laid down, delineated and numbered upon a certain map on file in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, entitled "Map of the O'Neill and Haley Tract."

It is hereby ordered that Thursday, the 17th day of February, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m., in Department No. 10 of said Court, at the Courthouse in the Grant Building, corner of Seventh and Market Streets, San Francisco, California, be and the same is hereby fixed as the time and place of hearing said petition.

It is further ordered that notice thereof be served on Frank Shay, as Administrator of the estate of William Hale, deceased, personally, by delivering to and leaving with said administrator a certified copy of this order at least ten days before such hearing.

It is further ordered that notice of such hearing be given by publishing a copy of this order once a week for four successive weeks before said day of hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which publication is hereby adjudged to be sufficient notice of said hearing.

Dated, January 12th, 1910.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 4965, Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, Deceased.

Mary A. Barry, the administratrix of the estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, deceased, having filed herein her petition, duly verified by affidavit, praying for an order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her, as such administratrix, to mortgage the real property of said deceased therein and hereinafter described, for the purpose set forth in said petition; and it appearing that it will be of advantage to said estate that said mortgage be made;

It is here ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, deceased, do appear before this Court on the 28th day of February, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the real property of said estate, hereinafter described, should not be mortgaged for the sum of four thousand and five hundred ($4,500) dollars, as prayed for in the petition of Mary A. Barry, the said administratrix, this day filed, or for such lesser amount as to the Court may seem meet. Reference is made to said petition for further particulars. Said real property, the property to be mortgaged, is situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and is more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Parcel "A"—Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Eighteenth street with the easterly line of Noe street, running thence easterly along the southerly line of Eighteenth street thirty (30) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.); thence at right angles westerly thirty (30) feet to the easterly line of Noe street, and thence at right angles northerly along the last mentioned line one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) to the southeasterly corner of Eighteenth and Noe streets and the place of beginning; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

Parcel "B"—Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Eighteenth street, thirty feet distant thereon easterly from the easterly line of Noe street, thence along said southerly line of Eighteenth street easterly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft); thence at right angles westerly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles northerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

Parcel "C"—Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Noe street, distant thereon one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) southerly from the southerly line of Eighteenth street and running thence southerly along said line of Noe street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles easterly one hundred and five (105) feet; thence at right angles northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles westerly one hundred and five (105) feet to the easterly line of Noe street and point of commencement; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

It is further ordered, that this order to show cause be published once a week for four successive weeks before the day of hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, this 21st day of January, 1910.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE SOLD

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 2010.

In the Matter of the Guardianship of the Estates of CHARLES CLARKE KEENEY and HELEN MADELINE KEENEY, Minors.

It appearing to this Court, from the petition of James Ward Keeney, guardian of the estates of CHARLES CLARKE KEENEY and HELEN MADELINE KEENEY, minors, and from the petition of Marie Adele Keeney and Mary Alvord Keeney, copetitioners of said James Ward Keeney, praying for an order for the sale of the undivided one-tenth interest of each of said minors of, in and to the real estate hereinafter particularly described; that each of said wards owns an undivided one-tenth interest in and to that certain piece of real property situate in the town of Berkeley, County of Alameda, State of California, bounded and described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the north line of Channing Way, distant thereon three hundred (300) feet westerly from the northwesterly corner of Bowditch Street and Channing Way; running thence westerly along said north line of Channing Way one hundred and fifty (150) feet; thence at right angles northerly two hundred and sixty (260) feet to the south line of Durant Avenue; thence at right angles easterly one hundred and fifty (150) feet along said south line of Durant Avenue; and thence at right angles southerly two hundred and sixty (260) feet to the said north line of Channing Way and point of commencement; being all of lot two (2) in Block ten (10) College Homestead Association, as per map thereof recorded in Book T of Deeds in the office of the Recorder of said Alameda County at page 799, except forty feet of the north end heretofore given toward right of way for said Durant Avenue.

That it would be beneficial to each of said minors that the undivided one-tenth interest of each should be sold.

Therefore it is hereby ordered, that the next of kin of the said CHARLES CLARKE KEENEY and HELEN MADELINE KEENEY, and all persons interested in the estates of each of them, appear before this Court on the 31st day of January, 1910, at ten o'clock a. m. of said day in the Courtroom of Department number 9 of said Court, in the Grant Building, situate at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of the undivided one-tenth interest of each of said minors in said real estate.

Done in open Court this 24th day of December, A. D. 1909.
J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed Dec. 24, 1909. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 19,408, Dept. No. 1.

LOUIS D. FRICHETTE, Plaintiff,
vs.
All persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of LOUIS D. FRICHETTE, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

FIRST PARCEL

Commencing at the Northeast corner of Monticello and Shields Streets, running thence Easterly along the Northerly line of Shields Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Northerly and parallel with Monticello Street one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Westerly and parallel with Shields Street twenty-five (25) feet to the Easterly line of Monticello Street; and thence at right angles Southerly along said line of Monticello Street one hundred (100) feet to the point of beginning; the same being designated upon the Map of the City Land Association filed in the office of the County Recorder of the said City and County of San Francisco as lot eight (8) in Block Ten (10) of said City Land Association.

SECOND PARCEL

Commencing at the northwesterly corner of Powell and California Avenues, and running thence Westerly along the Northerly line of Powell Avenue fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at a right angle Easterly fifty (50) feet to the Westerly line of California Avenue; and thence at a right angle Southerly along the said Westerly line of California Avenue one hundred (100) feet to the point of beginning; being a portion of lots numbers 352 and 353, Precita Valley Lands.

THIRD PARCEL

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate on the Westerly line of Cherubusco Street, in said City and County of San Francisco, and designated as lot No. "342" upon that certain map known as "Gift Map Number 3" filed by Harvey S. Brown in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 31st day of December, 1861, in Map Book No. 2.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of December, A. D. 1909.
(Seal)
H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this Summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 18th day of December, A. D. 1909.

A Bill of Particulars

This is given as a true bill, made by an artist, for repairs and retouchings to a gallery of paintings of an English lord in the year 1865:

To filling up the chink in the Red Sea and repairing the damages of Pharaoh's host.

To cleaning six of the Apostles and adding an entirely new Judas Iscariot.

To a pair of new hands for Daniel in the lion's den and a set of teeth for the lioness.

To an alteration in the Belief, mending the Commandments, and making a new Lord's Prayer.

To new varnishing Moses' rod.

To repairing Nebuchadnezzar's beard.

To mending the pitcher of Rebecca.

To a pair of ears for Balaam and a new tongue for the ass.

To renewing the picture of Samson in the character of a fox hunter and substituting a whip for the firebrand.

To a new broom and bonnet for the witch of Endor.

To a sheet anchor, a jury mast, and a boat for Noah's ark.

To painting twenty-one new steps to Jacob's ladder.

To mending the pillow of stone.

To adding some Scotch cattle to Pharaoh's lean kine.

To making a new head for Holofernes.

To cleansing Judith's hands.

To giving a blush to the cheeks of Eve on presenting the apple to Adam.

To painting Jezebel in the character of a huntsman taking a flying leap from the walls of Jericho.

To planting a new city in the land of Nod.

To painting a shoulder of mutton and a shin of beef in the mouths of two of the ravens feeding Elijah.

To repairing Solomon's nose and making a new nail to his middle finger.

To an exact representation of Noah in the character of a General reviewing his troops preparatory to their march, with the dove dressed as an aide de camp.

To painting Noah dressed in an Admiral's uniform.

To painting Samson making a present of his jaw-bone to the proprietors of the British Museum.

A Book in Breeches

Lord Melbourne told Sydney Smith that Queen Victoria could never see Macaulay without a burst of uncontrolable laughter because Sydney Smith's description of him as "a book in breeches" always recurred to her. But Macaulay was a book even in petticoats. When a servant spilt some raging hot coffee over the child's naked legs at Lady Waldegrave's at Strawberry Hill, to the deep concern of his hostess, he answered her anxious inquiry with, "Thank you, madam, the agony is abated." Mrs. Hannah More delighted to recall a visit to Mrs. Macaulay's when she was met at the door by a fair, pretty, slight child about four years old, who informed her, "Madam, my parents are out; but, if you will be so good as to come in, I shall be glad to bring you a glass of old spirits." This to the saintly Hannah! "Old spirits!" she exclaimed. "Madam," replied the child, "that was what Robinson Crusoe often had."

Remarkable Bible

An immense amount of labor has been expended on the various Bibles of the world. The palm for execution must be given to the Kuthodaw, which is a Buddhist monument near Mandalay, in Burmah. It consists of about seven hundred temples, each containing a slab of white marble, on which the whole of this Buddhist Bible, containing more than eight million syllables, has been engraved. The Burmese alphabet is used, but the language is Pali. This wonderful Bible is absolutely unique. The Kuthodaw was erected in 1857 by Mindon-min, the last king but one of Burmah. The vast collection of temples together form a square, with a dominating temple in the centre. Each of the marble slabs on which the sacred text is inscribed is surmounted by an ornamental canopy in pagoda form.

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys, FREE

Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, etc. Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

The Opulent Farmer

Secretary Wilson gives testimony that the farmers of the country are prospering. Mr. Wilson's testimony is authoritative. It is his business to keep in touch with the soil, with the men that till it and with the fruits of their labor. The prosperity of the farmer, however, is no longer a matter requiring statistical corroboration. Unequivocal signs of affluence are multiplying in the rural districts. Rare has the farmer become that homeward plods his weary way. It's the hired man that does that. The man that owns the farm is becoming a slave to the ensnaring charms of pompous luxury. On the average farm nowadays there are many evidences of a purchasing power great enough to fill the greedy middleman with envy, and, mayhap, to start an exodus from city flats back to the smiling meadows. Ignorance of wealth is no longer the farmer's best riches; he has a substantial bank account; he sits at a groaning board in a spacious house that exhibits some pretension to architectural beauty; he rides in an automobile; he no longer stands in awe of the city, confining his revels to the gay motes that people the sunbeams but contributes frequently to the hum of men in the crowded centers, registering at the swellest hotels and mingling with the fashionable herd on first nights at the leading theatres. Going, if not already gone, with the impoverished farm is the hayseed farmer, the charming embodiment of guilelessness and simplicity, the best patron and prey of the jocund confidence operator. What was once the favorite contrivance of the builders of homespun dramas —the mortgage on the farm—will soon become an anachronism. Secretary Wilson tells us exultingly that the value of American farm products last year was $8,760,000,000, an increase of 40 per cent in only five years. With this money farmers have paid off mortgages, established banks and developed an appetite for luxuries. We felicitate the farmer on his prospect of entering ere long the ranks of the plutocray, and we have nothing but scorn for those whose envy prompts the suspicion that some of the ultimate consumer's money has been getting past the middleman and into the hands of the agriculturist. The farmer has our best wishes. If extravagance has followed upon the heels of prosperity increasing the cost of production, we are not inclined to grow censorious or to demand the practice of thrift in the interest of the ultimate consumer. It is about time for the farmer to have his fling.

Criminal Negligence of the People

Countless multitudes of Examiner readers were made to mourn the other day when they read in that great depository and guardian of truth the startling information that nowhere in this broad land was the direct primary giving satisfaction. This news from this source has something of the impressiveness of holy writ. The Examiner, even though it did not command universal confidence, even though its credibility were impeachable, would hardly be suspected of affirming untruthfully the failure of one of the many pet catholicons of its revered owner. Of course the Examiner does not repudiate or disparage the principle of the direct primary. The principle is all right, but the machinery doesn't work according to expectations. The iniquitous politicians bedeviled the machinery so that a cog invariable slips at a paramount psychological moment. Such is the Examiner's explanation of the failure of the direct primary. Naturally the people are dissatisfied, but what do the people think about the principle of the great contrivance by which once we hoped to approximate perfection in human government? Depend on the Examiner, the direct descendant of the Delphic oracle, to divine at all times, in crises as well as when sailing is smooth, the precise predilections of the people. According to the Examiner the omniscient sovereign people have not lost faith in the direct primary. It would be absurd, says the infallible journal, to suppose that the people do not wish to nominate the men from amongst whom their servants are to be selected. At first blush this proposition seems irrefutable, but singularly enough Mr. Hearst's learned editorial writer, nodding on his tirpod, essays the refutation of it himself. From 40 to 60 per cent of the people, he says, do not vote at the primary. Assuming this to be true, it may be inferred that the people themselves are as much to blame as the politicians for the failure of the primary. This is what we have suspected without having the temerity to avow the suspicion. We take it, however, that the Examiner has given us trustworthy information, and yet we still perceive a gleam of hope for the champions of the direct primary. The thing to be done to make it live up to the expectations of its designers is to amend the Penal Code, making it a crime for any man to neglect the duties and obligations of citizenship. This being a government decidedly paternal in its tendencies, to make it a crime for a man to fail to vote would be to take but another step along the road of paternalism that we have been traveling. We have commissions for everything under the sun. Let us have an election commission empowered to make people vote for their own salvation. It is evident that the people are torpidly abstracted. Something must be done to stimulate the bone and sinew and righteousness of the commonwealth. In the name of culture, humanity and the higher life, let us put the fear of jail in the popular heart to the end that the direct primary be justified. Means that are drastic we must adopt to put an end to the deep damnation of popular apathy and indifference.

The Mayor and the Schools

Mayor McCarthy has given gross offence to some of the most ardent lovers of the Charter who, when they are in office or in control of those that are in office, demand that it be cherished as a palladium sent from heaven for the preservation of us from the machinations of villainous politicians. The violation of the Charter is an old story, the first chapter of which opens on the day on which it became the organic law of this city and county. Since that day political expediency has never been obstructed by any of its provisions. A magnificent disregard for the Charter was one of the salient characteristics of its chief sponsor, the Hon. James D. Phelan, and to the convenient precedents established by him the highest deference has been paid by his successors. It is not to be argued, however, that the privilege of violating the Charter is one of the inalienable prerogatives of a mayor. Precedent does not make legitimate power or sanctify evil practice. Far be it from us to acquiesce in violations of the Charter. We hope that Mayor McCarthy, if inclined to follow the example of such men as Taylor and Phelan, will be constrained to strict observance of the letter of the law. At the same time we protest against the cant of those critics who would persuade us that his attitude toward the school directors appointed by Mayor Taylor argues a disposition to plunge the public schools into politics. The public schools have never been out of politics. Mayor McCarthy says he intends to take them out. Cynical as we have grown to be this declaration does not impress us deeply, yet we are convinced that the public schools are not in any more danger now than they were when Dr. Taylor transferred "Whiskers Joe" O'Connor from the Mission High School to the school board where he proceeded to juggle the salary roll for his own benefit causing a scandalous waste of public money. Furthermore we are convinced that the reasons Mayor McCarthy has given for his attitude toward Dr. Taylor's appointees are far more cogent than the one which satisfied the easy conscience of the ultra-respectable poet when he removed Thomas Boyle from office. There was nothing said at that time about plunging the school department into politics. Nor was the sanctity of the Charter the inspiration of an uproar when Mrs. Kincaid came from Berkeley to spread the light of her intelligence over the public schools which she has never visited. So why yield our emotions to the canting hypocrites who are affecting profound concern for the school department? Why not rather urge Mayor McCarthy to tackle the book trust? The gouging of parents in the interest of the book trust is the worst of all the political scandals that ever smudged the school department. Mayor McCarthy has given intimation that he knows something of its methods. He is the first mayor on whose perceptions there ever dawned the faintest inkling of this hotbed of graft. If he can expose and throttle it and will do so no greater service can be expected of him. Meanwhile let us possess our souls in patience. Let us not "view with alarm" in a spirit of anticipation. Action that to hostile critics seems to be motived in the principle embodied in the epigram, "To the victor belongs the spoils," may be (as the Mayor asserts) inspired with zeal for political regeneration. If but few of his appointees are men of distinction in public life, if they are somewhat lower than the angels of reform, why not credit the Mayor with the intention of compelling faithful performance of duty? We, in common with most of our fellow citizens, believe that we could improve on the Mayor's selections. The responsibility, however, is on his head. It's up to him to make good.

The Song of Songs

A school teacher in Kansas having been taken to task for reading the Song of Solomon to his pupils, pleads in justification that it is good literature and also a work of profound spiritual significance which he delights in expounding for religious purposes. The Song of Solomon is certainly good literature, but all theologians are not agreed that it is a work of spiritual significance. There are many scholars who regard the Song of Songs, as they are pleased to call it, a profane work in the writing of which Solomon had no hand. To assume that it has any spiritual significance, say they, is to postulate of the people of Israel in about the tenth century before Christ a great development of transcendental theology, whereas in the bosom of ancient Judaism there was nothing of the mysticism of India and Persia; all doctrine was clear and transparent; symbolism was not in favor. Some authorities, Bossuet among the number, have conjectured that the poem was intimately connected with the marriage rite among the Jews; that it was divided into acts or scenes corresponding to the number of days during which the nuptial festivities lasted, and that it was acted as a pastoral drama in wedding celebrations. M. Renan has taken this same view, and he is certain that, whoever was its author, certainly Solomon was not; for the part he plays is a poor one and the whole composition is pervaded with ill-disguised hostility to his reign and memory. It represents the defeat of an Oriental despot whose overtures are made in vain to a simple maiden of Issacher who preferred the hut of a shepherd to the harem of a king. Solomon in all his glory cannot touch her heart. For her, better by far is the hillside, where the vines cluster and the melodious notes of the turtle-dove are heard, and the voice of the well-beloved calls on his fair one to arise and come away, than all the glittering splendor of Jerusalem. The degrading life of the Seraglio may appeal to the maidens of Babylon and Memphis but not to the passionate heroine of this poem. Decidedly erotic apparently is the Song of Songs when interpreted literally; and when viewed as an allegory it presents ideas that are hard to reconcile with the severe conception of the deity which prevailed among a people intolerant of everything that might be construed as blasphemous. Nevertheless this reconciliation has been effected. The Song of Songs is held by churchmen to be canonical, and therefore to have a hidden meaning. What scholars have pronounced the bridal drama of a rude Semitic tribe, theologians have characterized as the Epithalamium of the Church with her celestial bridegroom—Jesus Christ. For centuries a war of criticism has raged round this beautiful poem which a Kansas schoolmaster expounds to his pupils without the slightest doubt in his mind as to its significance. We have not heard of the exact nature of his exposition, but if we could dictate the policy of the school board we should be inclined to simplify matters by insisting that no broader view of the moral character of the poem be taken than that which is indicated by the 7th verse of the 8th chapter: "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it; the rich man who would buy love, he buyeth but shame."

abysses of infinity, commands our attention, filling us with mixed emotions and giving the astronomers new problems to solve. Halley's comet, eminent in the world of science and distinguished for regularity and punctuality, though advertised as the headliner among current firmamental phenomena, is relegated for the time being to second place. From its past we argue good behaviour for the future, and view its current performance with philosophic calm. The new comer with a reputation to make has an air of mystery that fascinates and enthralls. All the astronomers have their tubes pointed at the stranger in expectation of developments that may add to the store of human knowledge, and it is to be hoped that the unknown will gratify their laudable passion for discovery without cutting any disagreeable capers. But while the astronomers are taking a purely scientific interest in the new member of the comet family there are many people viewing him with something like consternation. The best of comets, those that have followed a beaten track and pursued a well-regulated career, are hardly to be considered welcome by people who have no poetry in their souls, who are devoid of passion for scientific inquiry and desire for anything that stimulates speculation upon the great mystery of the cosmos. To such people comets of the character of the one that now holds public attention are not only far from welcome but positively disquieting. Doubtless if they could look to the astronomers for soothing assurance it would be extremely gratifying, but the star-gazers have very little information to hand out on the subject of comets. A little while ago they formed a theory as to why a comet's tail always points from the sun, and to this achievement they now point with pride, a circumstance which enables us to apprehend by what small stages progress is being made in the study of the heavens. Of all the sciences astronomy is probably the most impressive and awe-inspiring, but the more we study the cosmos the greater becomes our bewilderment. Man is really in a state of dense ignorance regarding the stellar universe. He has not yet succeeded in acquiring even a sense of the vastness of it. The space within the confines of the solar system of which the earth is part, and the outermost known member of which is nearly three thousand millions of miles from the center is but a drop as it were in the vast ocean of space out of which comets swim into our ken. We think of and measure distances on earth in terms of an inch or a yard. The smallest unit of measure used by astronomers is the semi-diameter of the earth's orbit, roughly speaking ninety-three millions of miles. Reflect on these things that make us conscious of the insignificance of man, and then consider whether it is to be wondered at that our information about the deeps of infinity is anything more than shreds and patches; or, on the contrary, consider whether it is not to be marvelled at that man has accomplished so much; that for example he has succeeded in ascertaining with certainty the presence in the solar atmosphere at a distance of ninety-five millions of miles of metals such as iron and magnesium. Assuredly here is a triumph of science! Insignificant as man is, confined within a narrow zone, on the surface of a puny planet, he stretches out his intellectual powers through boundless space and estimates the chemical composition of matter contained in the sun and fixed stars with as much ease and certainty as if he had it in his hands and could prove its reactions in his test-tube. Man has done wonderful things with his telescope, with his spectroscope and with photography in connection with both these instruments, yet so far as the celestial domain is concerned, to "follow knowledge like a sinking star" is the utmost to be expected from human endeavor. The chief result of the progress now being made in astronomy is the negativing of much that once was held to be indubitably true. Gravity, for example, no longer carries all before it in cosmic theories. The persuasion continually gains ground that, in the last resort, when matter is reduced to a certain degree of tenuity, it can be held in check or overcome by forces of an opposite nature. The rigid law of condensation has thus ceased to claim unqualified obedience; the activity of countervailing forces can be discerned. In some instances the reverse of what Sir William Herschel affirmed has come true, notably with respect to "diffuse nebulosities" which he believed would gradually assume more and more compact forms. It has been found that evolutionary theories of a few years ago need revision to bring them into harmony with newly detected yet fundamental facts. The more that conservative scientists learn the more are they disinclined to dogmatize about the heavens. Many of them have ceased to seek for a purpose therein. The aims of nature are as inexplicable as her phenomena. The purpose of comets is as much a mystery as the purpose of the gigantic brontosaurus that paddled about in the marshes of the infant earth, or the fantastic pterodactyls that spread their darkening wings on the mephitic air. Nevertheless the universe in its dual aspect, material and spiritual, has for us an irresistible and inexhaustible fascination, and in both aspects it becomes intensely fascinating at such a time as this presenting as it does epochal phenomena of a most sensational character. By such phenomena is the riddle of the universe obtruded on mankind, impelling some to scientific speculation, others to religious meditation. Perhaps the comet is the Sphinx of the heavens, a messenger, whose interrogatory tail was designed to give our thoughts a spiritual trend.

It is becoming more difficult each day to differentiate the luxuries and necessaries of life.

The Hon. Francis J. Heney says he is going to run for Governor. Does this mean that District Attorney Fickert has promised him immunity?

Though it was all right for Dr. Taylor to remove a commissioner "for cause," imaginary or other kind, it is decidedly wrong for Mayor McCarthy to remove a commission for malfeasance or anything else. The distinction is obvious to all whose corns have been trod upon.

"What is hell?" asks a New York Doctor of Divinity. And the gentlemen evicted from the public crib by Mayor McCarthy make reply: "This is it."

Dr. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, is advising that a time limit be put on the cold storage of eggs. But what's the use so long as eggs can accumulate a past before reaching cold storage?

Aeroplanes and Dirigibles for War

While Most of the European Powers Have Experimented Only With Dirigibles in Their Aerial Military Maneuvers, Events at Los Angeles Showed the Practicability of the Aeroplane as a War Machine

By Robert McTavish

Two incidents stand out in the wonderful aviation meet held at Dominguez Field in Los Angeles as possessing the utmost importance for pioneers in the science of aerial warfare. One of these was Paulhan's flight from Dominguez to San Pedro, a distance of only seven miles. Of course Paulhan made a number of flights covering much greater distances, but the point is that in this particular spin through the clouds the French aviator flew over the site of a proposed federal fort. Only the day before negotiations for the purchase of land at Point Fermin had been concluded by the federal government. This land it is proposed to fortify as a link in the chain of California coast defense. Just suppose that the fortifications had been completed and that alongside of Paulhan in the biplane there sat a keen-eyed military expert with a strong field glass. The entire ground plan of that fort, its greatest strength and its weak points, the easiest avenue of approach and the most vulnerable spots for shell attack, would have been noted with the utmost facility.

The other significant incident was the experimentation with the biplane as a carrier of high explosives. It was Lieutenant Paul W. Beck of the signal corps of the United States Army who conducted these interesting experiments. Lieutenant Beck made several flights with Paulhan, carrying dummy dynamite bombs. While the biplane was several hundred feet above the ground and flying at the rate of forty miles an hour, the army officer dropped the bombs, aiming at a spot measured off on the aviation field to represent a gun pit. Lieutenant Beck's aim improved with each attempt and although none of the dummy bombs landed in the "gun pit," the actual point of impact was closer to the spot with every flight, showing that strict accuracy could be attained without laborious practice. In other words the practicability of dropping bombs from a biplane upon an enemy's position was clearly demonstrated.

All the great European powers are spending millions in the construction of fleets of army dirigibles and the fact that the United States has not yet appropriated money for this purpose has exposed this country to considerable criticism from military experts. But the experiments conducted at Dominguez show that the United States has adopted a wise course in proceeding slowly. It is too early for anybody to declare that the biplane will be the preferred aerial fighting machine of the future, just as it is rather premature to take it for granted that the dirigible is better adapted to the uses of warfare. Yet the powers of Europe have been proceeding on this latter assumption. France has done more than any other nation in the operation of the aeroplane; yet the military authorities of that country are constantly seeking appropriations for a fleet of dirigibles. England is making great efforts to acquire a fleet. Germany has perfected three systems of dirigibles for war use and today possesses the only efficient fleet in the world. Russia, Austria, Italy and other nations have been carefully following the lead of Germany.

In view of the interesting experiments made at Dominguez it may seem strange that when the Wright brothers exhibited their biplane in Berlin at the invitation of the Crown Prince himself, the military experts showed no inclination to adopt it. But there are reasons of considerable plausibility which may explain this indifferent attitude. Germany has done a great deal for the perfecting of the dirigible and very little for the perfecting of the biplane. It would not be human nature for the German military authorities to confess that their laborious and expensive efforts had been wasted and that would be the virtual effect of accepting the biplane as a superior war engine.

The arguments advanced in support of the superiority of the dirigible to the biplane for war purposes do not seem particularly strong. It is pointed out, for instance, that it requires an expert to work the aeroplane. It is said that the aerial war machine must be of such mechanical construction that the common soldier will be able to master its operation. Just why this should be impossible with the aeroplane while it is possible with the dirigible, it is not easy to understand. The aeroplane may be learned with little more practice than the automobile. It is also alleged that the aeroplane could easily be brought down by infantry or artillery fire. That argument sustained a big puncture when Paulhan made his record-breaking flight into the clouds at Dominguez. A biplane flying at the rate of forty miles an hour three or four thousand feet above the ground is not an easy mark for infantry or artillery fire. So much cannot be said of the dirigible, for it has never attained such heights and besides it is so large that it can be distinctly seen at a much greater altitude than the birdlike aeroplane.

The military airship, whether aeroplane or dirigible, will be used principally for the reconnaissance of the enemy's position. Hitherto it has been practically impossible to reconnoiter more than an inconsiderable part of an enemy's force. When a large force is on the march only the head of the column can be reconnoitered with ordinary success. The airship of course could reconnoiter the entire force or the entire position of an enemy. But where does the dirigible possess greater advantages than the heavier-than-air machine for these purposes? It is true that dirigibles have made much longer trips than aeroplanes, but they have also made much slower trips. It is impossible to obtain the same speed in a Zeppelin dirigible as in a Farman biplane and Paulhan's record-breaking flight from Dominguez to Santa Anita and back showed the possibilities of the biplane for scouting purposes. Paulhan covered forty-seven and one-half miles in one hour and two minutes. That was equivalent to traversing the entire line of some of the bloodiest battles that have ever been fought. Of course the future has still to demonstrate the possibility of an aviator in a biplane covering the whole theater of war as well as a battlefield. Zeppelin's flights down the Rhine and Count de la Vaulx's record-breaking trip in a dirigible from Vincennes, France, to Kososticheff, Russia, a distance of 1193 miles traversed in 35 hours and forty-five minutes, seem to indicate the superiority of the balloon, but it is almost too soon to make such a statement.

When we pass from the use of airships for reconaissance to their use as engines of destruction the biplane seems again to uphold its usefulness against the favored dirigible. Lieutenant Beck's experiments are of importance in this connection. Taken by and large it is not too much to say that the signal corps of the United States army has made no mistake in delaying the construction of a fleet of dirigibles. By the time that the European powers have mastered the use of the balloon as a war engine the progress of invention may show that the Wright and Farman biplanes are greatly superior for these military purposes.

UNION SQUARE SAN FRANCISCO

In the Kursaal

By Bart Kennedy

A tenor with a resonant sobful voice was sobbing forth the famous song from "Pagliacci." I listened with much unenthrallment, for if there is anything that makes me more tired than usual it is the having to listen to a soulful, sobbing tenor. Why, oh why, is there not a law for his suppression? And here let me put in a word for the English tenor. He may not have a vast amount of temperament, but at least he refrains from lacerating your soul with sobs. He may shout out his top A's like a navvy, but he will refrain from inundating his voice with tears.

The last sob from the tenor died a natural death, and —well, there were thunders of applause in the great concert-hall. Why, I don't know. But evidently the audience liked this sobbing business, for they applauded and applauded till the tenor came forth to sob again. I personally would have presented him with a well-aimed orange, but I didn't dare. I had to put up with it and look handsome.

And then there came a baritone, one Jean Note. And made up for what I had had to endure from the sobster. How beautifully he sang. He got his effect by the telling of the story. He remembered what so few singers remember: that the voice, however beautiful, is after all but secondary. It is the story that must come first, always first. The ear soon tires even of the most beautiful voice—if there is nothing behind it. The singer must tell you something.

But not only did this Jean Note tell one a story. His voice in itself was beautiful—a clear, fine, powerful, ringing, man's voice. And a voice of strange and individual timbre. I should say that he was the finest baritone I ever heard.

How beautiful was this great concert-hall here in the Kursaal! It held thousands of people, and still the softest tones of the singer could be heard. As I sat I could hear the low, deep sounding of the water out beyond the Digue. It came, a curious under monotone.

Here in this hall the people of the great world were taking their ease. Here were well-dressed men and beautifully dressed women of all nationalities. And children. All enjoying themselves, listening to the music. The people here represented the apex of the vast, human pyramid. At the base of the pyramid, down beneath—but what was the use of thinking of that? Darkness exists as well as light, and someone must work. And I felt that I hardly had the right to cavil. For was I not here myself?

The concert was over and the vast crowd was moving away. But there was now the ball. There was now the dancing. And I strolled towards the ball-room.

Some of the people went off to gamble. But they were, so to speak, only the privileged few. For before you were allowed to gamble you had to belong to the club. You were not allowed to lose your money in a free and easy and casual fashion. You had to be named and labeled and docketed. The casual stranger's money was very much at a discount. Public gaming had been stopped in Ostend.

Here was the ball-room. It was enclosed, as it were, in a vast room. From this room you could look through beautiful arched spaces in upon the dancers.

Ah! Here was the lilt of a waltz. One of the divine waltzes of Strauss. Surely are the waltzes of Strauss amongst the greatest achievements in music. They picture the very soul and spirit of movement. And movement is life. These divine, moving, music-dreams of Strauss! They are movements etherealized.

A man was holding a beautiful woman in his arms. They were waltzing to the wonderful, sensuous music. This music was a spiritualizing of the glorious and enchanting mystery of sex. Sex in its wondrous essence. This dance was as a beautiful phallic rite. Yea, it was an echo of the religion of a time gone thousands of years. Of a time when was worshipped the profound mystery of sex.

Couples were going around and around. How joyously contented looked the women. A true daughter of Eve loves dancing above all things. She would give her soul to dance. Around and around to the spiritualized sensuousness of the divine music-dream. Yonder was a girl with hair, beautiful hair. Her eyes were shining as she moved round with the young man who was holding her. He was a fine young fellow, a fitting mate for her. And here was a woman upon whom the hand of time had fallen. But her eyes too were shining. The spirit, aye! and the actualness of youth were with her. She was dancing now as she had danced in the long years ago. The wonderful, lovely, mazing music was carrying the couples along. How the diamonds of the women flashed and sheened as they circled round and round. There was a woman with glowing, wondrous, red-gold hair. She was gone, and here again was the fair-haired girl with the fine young man. Here were women dancing together. And the music stopped, and the dancers streamed out from the ball-room. Merry voices were rising.

Again they were dancing. The music was now going faster. And it went faster and faster. There was a madness in it. A reckless gaiety and deviltry. The dancers whirled around with flushed faces. Their eyes reflected the meaning of the music. They reflected strange abandonment. How strange was the face of that girl as she whirled past. And the face of that man. There was something in it that was sinister.

Back again to one of the divine music-dreams of Strauss. Back again to the waltz. I knew these people by now. I knew the woman with the glorious, red-gold hair. I watched and watched for her amongst the dancers. I wondered about her. Who was she? What was her life? I would like to have known her. And I would like to have known the woman with the bright, beautiful face. And yonder beautiful woman. I would like to have known her. I began to single out the women amongst those who were dancing whom I would like to have known. No, I would not care for her. There would be no consonance between her temperament and mine. True, she looked desirable. But she would be in consonance with some other than me. But this woman. I would like to have known her. And her. Here was a woman whom I had not noticed before. A dark-haired, strange-faced girl who was dancing with a man with a hard, reckless face. I would like to have known her. Her face was lit up with the glow of the magical music-dream to which she was dancing. I would like to have known her.

Beautiful were the blending lines of the figures of the women as they danced. Beautiful were their passing faces. Beautiful was the flashing of their jewels and the sheening of their silken dresses.

Moving to the divine, entrancing music. I could have watched them for ever.

To be here with this magical scene of light and music and moving, beautiful women was to be inspired with the glow and the fire and the power of youth!

To be here with this divine, moving music-dream was to live!

A Golden Hair

By Charles Le Goffic (From the French)

Archibald Macleod and myself were chatting and smoking on the deck of the inspector's boat as it forged ahead toward the Roches Douvres. Near us sat the fair Mrs. Macleod, deeply engrossed in conversation with Monsieur Pierre Lemale, the government inspector of lighthouses.

I had not seen Archibald for two years. Although unable to attend the wedding, I had learned from his letters that Mrs. Macleod's name was Maude, that she was twenty-three years old, and that she was the widow of a rich New Zealander, whose yacht had been wrecked in European waters. It seems that Maude was an excellent swimmer and had been the sole survivor of the sad catastrophe.

They were spending their honeymoon in France, and had lingered in the defiles of Tarn, the chateau district of the Loire and the groves of La Vendee. Mrs. Macleod now wished to visit the northern coast and especially to see the lighthouses,—the beacons of the open seas. I had thought it a singular caprice for a bride, but the ways of women are strange and unaccountable.

Maude was very pretty, almost too pretty. Her beauty seemed to cast a spell upon those who crossed her path. It was even now making a deep impression upon Pierre Lemale. He seemed strangely affected by her great emerald-green eyes, the bewildering smile of her thin, deliciously curved lips, and especially by the mass of golden hair, worn low at the back of her neck and hardly held in place by the three tortoise-shell combs thrust into it. I was beginning to fear for the reason of our gallant Pierre, and Archibald evidently shared my apprehension, for he suddenly rose and approaching the pair, said:

"My dear, what is Monsieur Lemale telling you now?"

"Why," said Maude with a reproachful glance, "you have just interrupted him at the most thrilling point. Do continue, Monsieur Lemale."

"Mrs. Macleod asked me to tell her the most exciting experience that I have had during my tours of inspection," said Pierre, turning to us.

"May we not hear it also?" asked Archibald.

A slight movement of the eyelids and an almost imperceptible flush were the only signs of Mrs. Macleod's annoyance. She tapped her husband lightly, saying:

"You are impossible, dear; I thought curiosity was a feminine failing. But then, it cannot be helped. Proceed, Monsieur Lemale."

"You may not know the Roches Douvres," said Lemale. "The beacon is barely visible from the mainland even in clear weather. Today, on account of the haze, we shall not be able to see it for an hour. The red granite base, which supports the light, rises but little above the waves. Indeed, they cover it completely at high tide, allowing only the summit with its slender point to be seen. The light at the Roches Douvres now has three keepers, but at the period of my story, it had only two, who were relieved once a fortnight. Of all our Channel lights, this one is the farthest from the shore and consequently the most exposed. As far as the eye can reach, there is nothing but sea and sky. Only the most experienced men can endure such absolute isolation and solitude, and such a one is therefore always appointed as the head keeper.

"For three years, a man named Quere had held this post. He was quite old and a woman-hater, but very kind and gentle with his assistant and colleagues. He had found a profound charm in this hermit's life, and was always reluctant to relinquish his duties and go ashore when his turn came. The assistant keeper, Talabardon, was of a different sort, a big, strapping fellow of twenty-six, jolly and active, who had recently left the army to marry. Quere and Talabardon got on famously together and were looked upon as a happy combination. The veteran initiated the novice into the care of the lamps and the oil supply, kept him employed, amused him, and comforted him when he became despondent. Quere never complained of Talabardon nor Talabardon of Quere.

"Toward the end of March, we had a series of heavy storms, accompanied by snow and high tides from the North, making it impossible to send supplies and relief to the lighthouse on the usual day. We were not alarmed about Quere and Talabardon, however, for they had provisions enough to last them a month. As soon as the sea became navigable again, we set out for the Roches Douvres.

"Usually the keeper and his assistant met us at the platform to help us make fast, but this time neither of them appeared. I quickly stepped ashore with Postic, the keeper who was to relieve Quere. There was no flag of distress flying, but I vaguely apprehended some misfortune. The door of the lodge was open. I entered and shouted to the keepers, thinking they were in the lamp-room. There was no answer. I climbed the ladder. There was no one there! I came down again and inspected the chambers—the keeper's, the assistant's, the engine-room, the supply-room. I found no trace of Quere or of Talabardon.

"What could have happened to them? Only the night before, the light had shone forth as usual. It could not have lighted itself. Quere and Talabardon must, therefore, have been alive on the night before. What then? Why, an accident must have occurred on this very morning. One of the men must have been carried away by a wave, and the other had perhaps been drowned in trying to save him.

"I had arrived at this point in my reflections, when Postic, who was exploring about the base of the lighthouse, cried out to me:

"'Come, Monsieur l'Inspecteur! Oh, my God! They have killed each other! They have chocked each other to death!'

"It was true. In a little crevice, under a mass of floating rubbish that had hidden them from sight, the two keepers were lying clasped in a last convulsive embrace. A cruel expression of hatred still distorted their features. They had fallen into the water while struggling with each other upon the platform of the lighthouse and had continued their savage battle under the waves. Even in death they had not relaxed their hold.

"'They are almost green,' remarked Postic. "Quere's eyes have been eaten out by crabs. They must have died as long ago as Sunday or Monday.'

"'And today is Thursday. Who, then, can have kept the lamp lighted each night until now, the 6th of April?'

"'Signal the authorities," said I to Postic. 'They will have to find another keeper at once and proceed with the execution of the law.'

"'What about the bodies?' asked Postic.

"'Put them into the boat.'

"'But they will not be able to send me any assistance until tomorrow.'

"'Evidently you are afraid to spend the night alone here. I shall remain with you.'

THE SURBRUG COMPANY, New York City

The Spectator

The Colonel and the King

When Leopold, King of the Belgians, died some weeks ago, Colonel Henry I. Kowalsky, citizen of the world and bosom friend of the gay monarch, received many expressions of sympathy from this city. The supposition was that with Leopold in his grave the Colonel's confidential relations with royalty were at an end. In this the Colonel's sympathetic friends were mistaken. The famous attorney for all and sundry illegitimate heirs is still hanging by a stout cable on a prince's favor. In the gorgeous palace where Belgium's capital gathers her beauty and her chivalry, San Francisco's famous raconteur is still persona gratissima. No longer on the leg that now is turning to clay, he is nevertheless in a position still to smite the rock of national resources and make an abundant stream gush forth. For, be it known, Albert, King of Belgium, was the Colonel's friend even before the Kowalsky was dreamt of in Leopold's philosophy. It was Albert who introduced the Colonel to Leopold. Albert's friendship for Kowalsky dates back to the heyday of the Baldwin Hotel when the Colonel was the star boarder at that hostelry. It was formed at a time when the Colonel had no suspicion that Albert was heir to a throne. Albert was traveling incog, and the Colonel, discovering that he was a good fellow, took him in tow and showed him the sights. Together they laughed under the moon and made the star-studded welkin ring with their merriment. The French restaurants knew Albert, and the tenderloin vouchsafed him its warmest welcome. So fascinated was Albert with the mad, glad ways of the old town that he hated to leave, but Leopold summoned him home, and the royal summons was not to be ignored. To Kowalsky, who had entertained him throughout his stay, he confessed on the last of the thirty and one nights of his sojourn that he was not what he seemed and made a clean breast of his royal entanglement. Kowalsky assured him that despite his being a crown prince he was every inch a good fellow. Albert begged to be permitted to entertain the Colonel in Brussels, and the Colonel had no objection.

Our Sensational Mayor

Mayor McCarthy has been wielding the new broom with a ruthless hand. He has turned things upside down and inside out, producing something in the nature of a cataclysm in the municipal government, and a deafening uproar has followed in his wake. The gentlemen who have been violently wrenched from their jobs have rent the circumambient with their shrieks, their friends are in the white-heat stage of indignation, and the community is holding its breath with amazement. The Mayor has taken hold of things with a leonine ferocity, he has played havoc with the conventions, he has given evidence of an appetite for drastic action, a passion for boundless responsibility. In the circumstances it is not surprising that criticism has been rampant and vehement. It is surprising, however, that there should already be talk of putting in operation the machinery of the Recall. This talk is premature. If the Mayor is hungry for responsibility why not give him a chance to gratify his appetite? The spirit of the Charter is not opposed to the concentration of responsibility in the hands of the mayor. On the contrary, the chief design of the framers of the Charter was to centralize power so that in the event of dissatisfaction the people would have no difficulty in fixing responsibility. This principle was insisted upon by the gentleman who had the honor of putting the Charter in operation, the Hon. James D. Phelan, who removed one of his own police commissioners for no other reason than that he refused to facilitate the consummation of an ante-election compact. This was doing politics with a vengeance, and Mr. Phelan was censured, but only by his political enemies.

A Significant Change of View

It is interesting to recall at this time that when Mr. Phelan employed his official power in the performance of practical politics, the Examiner, which is now so fearful of the tendencies of the present dispensation, was in a complaisant mood. The Examiner's change of sentiment is not inexplicable. When Mr. Phelan removed a police commissioner it was for the purpose of enabling the Examiner to put one of its proteges in the office of chief of police. When Mr. McCarthy indulged in wholesale decapitation he failed to discriminate in favor of two persons in whom the Examiner takes a motherly interest. One of these persons is Mrs. Kincaid who has established social connections which give her a strong influence in the Examiner office. She was appointed a school director by Mr. Phelan and again by Dr. Taylor to please the Examiner. The other person whom Mayor McCarthy treated somewhat cavalierly is Mr. Fred Sanborn who is also a protege of the Examiner's. Mr. Sanborn was the gentleman upon whom the Graft Prosecution depended to "keep the Examiner in line" and who succeeded for a time. He was rewarded with a job for that service and also, it has been said, because he was a very zealous grand juror.

The Tactlessness of Him

So we see that newspaper criticism is sometimes a matter that is determined in a measure by the question, Whose ox has been gored? We also see that Mayor McCarthy is a tactless official. He doesn't examine the brand of the ox that is brought to the slaughter. For his tactlessness he is censurable, and also, perhaps, for the politics he is doing, but the feeble spirit of justice faintly demands that pending developments from which accurate judgment may be formed, the truth should be told whenever it may appear to throw light on the motives of his critics.

His Official Family

A good deal of the criticism that has been visited upon the Mayor he has incurred by appointing to office men who have not figured in civic affairs. Most of them are from the lower walks of life, a circumstance that is exactly what might have been expected. McCarthy is the representative of organized labor, and he is intent on giving us an out and out labor administration. There are many of us that would like to see him give a more liberal recognition to the exalted business interests and assuage his abiding prejudice against the well groomed gents that luxuriate in our richly upholstered clubs, but it must be admitted that we are getting precisely what the dear people voted for at the polls. And after all the Mayor has not been so revolutionary as he might have been. He has retained the election commission, and he intimates that the parks and fire department are in satisfactory hands. His appointment of William H. Metson to the Park Commission has given general satisfaction. Mr. Metson is a park lover, a gentleman, who, when formerly connected with the park board, rendered such efficient service that Mayor Taylor's failure to reappoint him has been listed among that gentleman's many official blunders. Quite as satisfactory as Mr. Metson's appointment will be that of Mr. Kirkpatrick, which is said to be contemplated.

How About Our Taximeters?

Does anybody in San Francisco know whether the taximeters register correctly? There is no ordinance here requiring municipal inspection of the taxicabs and therefore the man who hires one has no way of knowing that he is being charged only for the actual time consumed in his ride. That there is room for overcharging must be obvious to everybody and if there were any doubt on the subject, Boston's recent experience would remove it for good and all. The State department of weights and measures is the official body which inspects taxicabs in Massachusettes. Recently this department finished its inspections in Boston. Not a single taximeter in the city was found to register correctly; all of them showed discrepancies in favor of the operating company. The meters allowed only twelve minutes of the waiting time for the first thirty cents recorded, instead of the eighteen minutes provided by the city ordinance. This resulted in an overcharge in such instances of ten cents. In view of this discovery might it not be well for the local municipal authorities to prepare a measure regulating charges and providing for an inspection?

Hearst the Ready Canonizer

It might be thought that William R. Hearst who has given considerable offense to the Catholics of the United States at one time or another, would proceed with extreme caution whenever he deals with Catholic dogma or Catholic personalities. Yet despite the recent storm which certain articles and cartoons in the Hearst papers aroused in several communities, notably in San Francisco, the Examiner continues to blunder in its treatment of themes connected with the Catholic Church. The last instance was typical. The Examiner announced that Father Hecker may be canonized, and enlarged on the possibility of his becoming the first American saint. It referred to his "visions" and to his mystical espousal of "Lady Poverty." It even compared him to St. Francis of Assisi. If William R. Hearst imagines that the publication of such news items as this will salve the wounded feelings of his Catholic readers, he is very much mistaken, Catholics are endowed with unusual humorous appreciation, according to Gilbert K. Chesterton, and they will find food for considerable mirth in this suggestion by Hearst that Father Hecker may be canonized. The truth is that Father Hecker hasn't a chance of being raised to the altars as a saint. Exemplary as was his life, his doctrinal teachings were open to serious criticism and no teacher who was not strictly orthodox was ever canonized. When the Examiner speaks of Father Hecker as a visionary, it unconsciously hits the mark. While not a visionary in the mystic sense of St. Francis and St. Teresa, Father Hecker most certainly was a visionary in the vulgar sense in which Alcott, Thoreau and the other Brook Farm enthusiasts were visionaries. He had a vision of an altruistic community where physical labor should relieve the strain of transcendental philosophy, but the vision never came true.

Cromwell in the Role of an Irishman

While I am correcting errors in the Hearst newspapers I must not overlook the very latest blunder of Fra Elbertus Hubbard who exudes pseudosophy every morning for the delectation of those who read the Hearst editorial page. In a recent article entitled "Transplanted Irish" wherein Hubbard pays glowing tribute to the Irish in America, he makes the astounding assertion that Cromwell was not only Irish but "awfully Irish." Imagine an Irishman reading that article with feelings of pride and being suddenly confronted with this statement. To say that Oliver Cromwell, the most execrated man that ever set foot on the Green Sod, the soldier who butchered men, women and children so wantonly that even today "the curse of Cromwell" is the deadliest malediction an Irishman can utter, sprang from the soil which he drenched in blood is surely to trifle dangerously with the traditional good nature of the transplanted Irish. I would recommend that the sage of Roycroft make a little journey to the encyclopedia where he will find that the Cromwell family came from Huntingdonshire, England.

Gillett's Withdrawal

Now that Governor Gillett has eliminated himself from consideration in connection with any of the questions to be solved in the coming campaign the politicians who were not of his political circle are experiencing the pleasing sensation that follows the passing of a vexatious dilemma. The leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League are elated and jubilant over the Governor's withdrawal. While he was to be reckoned with they were in distress, for they very well knew that his strength was not easily to be overcome. Though they affected an air of self-confidence, they were not victimizing themselves with delusions. Plausible four-flushers are the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement. With expectations and hopes grounded entirely in hostility against the Republican machine, they realized that with Gillett as a candidate they would have some difficulty in sowing the seeds of revolt. For though Gillett is of the Republican machine he has made it manifest throughout the State that he has a high sense of the dignity and responsibilities of his office. Frankly sympathetic with the Republican organization, he has exhibited more independence than any Executive this State has had in twenty years. He has truckled to nobody. He has subordinated the interests of the machine to the interests of the State, and in more than one instance he has compelled the spontaneous applause of the organs of the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement by his refusal to accede to the wishes of the friendly agents of political power. Now that Gillett is out of the gubernatorial contest the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt movement will perhaps be generous enough to acknowledge that he has made a pretty good governor. Of course, while his candidacy was a matter of doubt, the exigencies of pure politics and the highest considerations of civic patriotism demanded that he should be pronounced anathema. The politics of this State cannot be purged until the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League are inducted into office, and consequently anything that stands in the way of the glorious consummation must be dealt with drastically. In the matter of jobchasing, that is, in the effort to conserve the public interests through the medium of patronage every politician is a patriot, and the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League are peerless among patriots.

Pardee Still Yawping

Ex-Governor Pardee, one of the most patriotic of all the Lincoln-Roosevelt patriots, has been taking another swat in the columns of his Oakland paper at the Santa Cruz Convention, famous in song and story for the catastrophe that was precipitated in the midst of its deliberations—the repudiation of the gentleman whose yawps perennially split the empyrean in Oakland. This eminent moralist and burning patriot will never forgive the Santa Cruz Convention—never while there is breath in his body to unfurl his unruly tongue. But why he should be croaking dolorously at this time it is hard to explain. Now that gubernatorial candidates are bobbing up serenely on all sides Dr. Pardee ought to be feeling his oats. He has repeatedly accused the machine of having defeated the will of the people in turning him down at Santa Cruz. Why does he not seize the opportunity to rebuke his enemies and gratify his friends—the people. Opportunity in the form of the direct primary stands before him with outstretched plump and rosy arms and heaving midriff. Is the gallant doctor shy? Does he suspect that his star flickered to extinction at Santa Cruz?

Two Types

If Dr. Pardee has come to the end of his tether in the political pasturage then it may be worth while moralizing on the lesson to be found in the acts of this apostle of civic righteousness, a lesson to be made luminous by a comparison between the ex-Governor and the present Executive. The temperament and methods of these two men are strikingly dissimilar. Pardee is a fine, almost perfect type of the up-to-date reformer. In office he practiced zealously for his own benefit what St. Paul advocated in the cause of religion—the art of being all things to all men. An exponent of purity in politics, he flirted with the machine, tried to compass his renomination by proposing a compact with Abe Ruef and bartered his power of pardon in the State convention. Today the machine would have nothing to do with him were he to offer his soul as the price of a nomination, and so far the reformers appear to be utterly oblivious of his whereabouts. Now look on the other picture, that of a product of what is known as abominable machine politics—Governor James Gillett. Frankly a machine politician, he is approaching the end of his term in the full possession of his self-respect, and in the enjoyment of the esteem of his political opponents. He is believed to be stronger before the people today than when he was elected. The wise politicians of the Republican organization are so sure of his strength that they have pleaded with him for weeks to run again. His refusal is due absolutely to considerations touching the welfare of his family. The difference between Pardee and Gillett is the fundamental difference between the average vehement reformer and the average machine politician, and that is perhaps why the cause of reform has made such little progress. The cause of reform is too often led by men who would not be permitted to lead anything else. Which reminds me that it was in a measure due to the pleasing contrast into which James Gillett was thrown by the ugly behaviour of reformers that he was picked out as a candidate for Governor of the State. Once upon a time in the early days of his politicial career he refused to grant the machine a favor. He was a machine politician, but his fidelity to his word constrained him to refuse the favor. And this favor which he refused to grant was obtained by the machine with the aid of reformers who did not scruple at breaking their word.

The Test of Fitness

The only gubernatorial candidate who doesn't appear to care at all what the sentiment is with respect to his candidacy either in the Lincoln-Roosevelt League or in the Republican machine is Charley Curry, who is living strictly up to the letter and spirit of the direct primary. He is out for the job on his own merits, spending his own money and giving the people a run for theirs. All other Republican candidates are waiting to be called; which means that they are not eager to back themselves, but prefer to form an alliance on a patronage basis, which isn't just precisely what the framers of the direct primary law contemplated. And the patriots of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League will not have the slightest hesitation in contracting for their support on that basis. But of course no man may hope to get their support without submitting to a diagnosis and chemical analysis. Not by strewing the State with platitudes and moral maxims can man persuade the leaguers. He must be felt for his bumps, and he must strip himself as naked as a new born babe to prove that no taint of the octopus is on his person. He must be tested for gameness, and he must remove the veil from his private life, the lid from his ideals, and promise not to give the railroad any of the jobs, which is a safe and sane way to imply that the league must have first and last call. To this profound scrutiny statesmen in every section of the State are eager to submit. Phil Stanton will come all the way from Los Angeles whenever summoned. But Phil cannot understand why the people have not risen as one man to start and animate a Stanton boom.

Stanton's Boomlet

When Stanton was in Washington a few weeks ago he told several members of the Californian delegation that the wires were hot with messages from home urging him to return and get into the fight. When he reached this city on his way home he was still sensible of the high temperature of the wires. He was under the impression that pending his decison with reference to the gubernatorial job business had been suspended in Los Angeles, and all the people were preparing to give him an ovation on his return. After he got back to the beautiful city of his adoption his San Francisco friends were informed that the only noise heard at the station on his arrival was made by the locomotive. He was permitted to arrive without ceremony and he walked up town alone. Now, according to the public prints, Mr. Stanton is resolved not to run unless the people of Southern California decide to elect a Southern man to the gubernatorial office. How this decision may be made manifest nobody knows.

The Disciples of Janus

The paragraph which I wrote last week in relation to the political eccentricities of the Hayes brothers, "Rouge et Noir," with particular reference to the insouciant behavior of the blackbearded disciple of Janus, has created considerable stir in Santa Clara county. It is a remarkable instance of the naivete of certain politicians that the divagations of these twin worshipers at the shrine of the two-faced deity have never wholly alienated them from one faction or the other. This is explained in part by the efficiency of their team-work. When "Red" Hayes lambastes the machine "Black" Hayes drops around at headquarters to explain the roast away; and when "Black" takes a fall out of the reformers "Red" is always handy to point out that his brother's words must be construed in the Pickwickian sense. The organization men, of course, are more cynical than their long-haired opponents; they reck little of motives provided the goods are delivered. The reformers, on the other hand, are given to the analysis of intentions; they dissect character and expect to find the jewel consistency hidden beneath a clutter of contradictory deeds and opinions. With the curves of "Red" Hayes they have been long and perplexedly concerned. They know of his connubiation with the machine in Santa Clara county, but they are also familiar with his persistent bludgeoning at the armor of Uncle Joe in Washington. In the national capital "Red" Hayes is the reddests of the "reds," as the rampant insurgents are now called; in San Jose he is as cooing as a dove. The reformers with remarkable myopia are willing to see devotion to their cause and to overlook the appearance of trickery in this double-shuffle. At times however they are genuinely disturbed in their charitable interpretation of the Hayes conduct. Such a story as that I published last week sheds a sudden light in which they see things as they are. But it is never for long. The Hayes brothers have always succeeded in playing both ends and they are not yet ready to quit.

Hayes and Wolfe for Congress

State Senator "Eddie" Wolfe has been thinking seriously about running for Congress in the fifth district. If he makes up his mind to enter the fight his opponent, of course, will be "Red" Hayes. Then will be given a characteristic example of the Janus method of politics so peculiarly the attribute of the Hayes brothers. Wolfe is an organization man and doesn't care who knows it. He believes in the organization, thinks that the organization is beneficial to the people and, as an organization leader in the State legislature, has been active in putting a number of meritorious laws on the statute books. If Wolfe runs against Hayes, it will be the signal for Hayes to feel the divine fire of political purity consuming his veins and he will go forth on the hustings to smite the accursed machine and all its friends with the blows of a well-trained tongue. "Eddie" Wolfe, of course, will share in the denunciation hurled at the machine. He will be made to appear the candidate of all the powers of darkness and as a contrast to his political iniquity the modest Hayes will limn his own portrait in lines of radiant whiteness. Meanwhile "Red" will not refuse any offer of support which may come to him from the machine or individuals thereof. He will probably send "Black" around to solicit it. If elected, he will not maintain his attitude of conscious superiority to all performers—in California; the exhibition of heroic virtue will be given in Washington where there is nothing to lose. Never having been in the good graces of Cannon, Hayes has calculated to a nicety the political prestige which is to be won by banging Cannonism. And so it goes. This acrobatic stunt of the Hayes brothers has been put on many times for the delectation of the wise observers, yet it never seems to lose its novelty. From time to time the act is improved, new "business" is introduced, the brothers master a new and more thrilling bit of balancing and only occasionally is one moved to wonder how long they can keep it up.

That Contemplated Bolt

Two weeks ago I told how the Lincoln-Roosevelt leaders of Los Angeles were making plans to bolt the party and swing their support to Theodore Bell in the event that an organization candidate wins the direct primary nomination for governor. With the elimination of Governor Gillett from the race, the success of an organization candidate becomes more nearly a matter of certainty than ever before. Hence the plan for a bolt assumes added significance. It is hardly necessary to discuss the principle of the scheme here. Party loyalty is a state of mind on which all men do not agree and the ethical responsibility attaching to its observance is very differently construed by different temperaments. No doubt if it should be pointed out to those who contemplated bolting their party that the wisdom of the republican electorate had been expressed in the direct primary result, they would reply that it was their prerogative to assume that the wisdom of the democratic electorate is a higher wisdom or at least more consonant with their tendencies. As to the result of the bolt it is equally useless to theorize; but one fact may be mentioned. Perhaps it is indicative of a state of mind. While the Lincoln-Roosevelt leaders in the south are quite frank in admitting that they will swing their strength to the democrats if the primaries have an unsatisfactory outcome, the local leaders are less ingenuous. They will not admit that such is to be their course, but they point out, with deprecatory gestures, that the rank and file of the reformers cannot be controlled by the leaders, that it is useless to attempt to hold them if they make up their mind to bolt. This of course is hypocritical poppycock. A political aggregation is not like a street mob; it acts through leaders and when the leaders lose their sway, they quit. But when the bolt comes and while the Los Angeles men are marching at the head of their seceders, the northern leaders will trail behind their forces, talking the while about "not being able to hold them."

Our Vanishing Merchant Marine

With the withdrawal, today, of the steamer New York, of the American line, from the run between New York and Southampton the United States is left with but two steamers engaged in the Atlantic cross-sea trade. These two vessels are the St. Louis and Philadelphia. The St. Louis was built at the Cramp shipyard. Philadelphia, and the Philadelphia on the Clyde. It will thus be seen that this country, with over eighty millions of people and an annual foreign trade worth $3,000,000,000, is represented on the Atlantic by one lone American vessel. Nor is the position on the Pacific with all its commercial potentialities much better. Trading on the waters which wash the distant coast of Asia, five vessels, the China, Korea, Siberia, Manchuria, and Mongolia ply between this port and the Orient; the Minnesota, belonging to the Great Northern Steamship Company, is on the run between Seattle and Hongkong, and the Oceanic Steamship Company's little steamer Mariposa, not much more than a yacht, is engaged in the tourist traffic between San Francisco and Tahiti. These nine vessels are now all that remain of the American merchant marine engaged in the cross-sea commerce of the world. One by one our vessels have disappeared until today it is an exceptional sight to view the stars and stripes on the ocean. The $46,000,000 paid annually by foreign governments in subsidizing their commercial fleets have driven those engaged in the shipping industry of the United States out of business. Efforts at maintaining their position were palsied by the fierce competition which followed the subsidizing of these foreign ships with their cheap white and colored crews. The foreign subsidies which have killed our commercial shipping have left us without any auxiliary to our expensive navy. On the other hand they have built up powerful trading fleets belonging to our competitors which are specially designed to assist their battleships and cruisers in time of war.

The Humphrey Bill

The Merchant Marine League of California is doing good work throughout this and other States in educating the people to a realization of the perilous position in which the country is placed through lack of an efficient merchant marine. Partly as a result of this educational work the prospects for the passage of the Humphrey shipping bill and other measures for the relief and encouragement of the mercantile marine now before Congress seem brighter than ever. Apart from the setback alien interests in this country are likely to receive by the passage of any of the bills now before Congress, it is likely that the enactment of protective legislation to our shipping industry will mean a new era of prosperity throughout the whole country.

An Unavailing Police Hunt

The murder of Elsie Fieber by a jealous longshoreman recalls a duel which was fought in South San Francisco by two toughs of that section who were rivals for the girl's affections. The duellists were Bernard Meyer and Eugene Peguillan and the incident happened shortly before the fire. The two hoodlums quarreled about the girl, exchanged the customary insults and decided to fight it out with pistols. With their friends they sought out a quiet spot, tossed for the first shot and observed, roughly enough, all the formalities of the code. Meyer hit Peguillan who fell and died almost instantly. With the assistance of his friends Meyer made his escape and when the police arrived on the scene there was no clew to his whereabouts. It was a very stormy Saturday night and through the small hours South San Francisco was combed by policemen and newspapermen in automobiles, on horseback and afoot, all of them looking for Meyer and the girl who had been the cause of the trouble. The search proved unavailing and when the weary police and reporters gave it up they were pitiable objects, rain-soaked and covered with South San Francisco mud. Before noon of Sunday both Meyer and the girl were in custody. Meyer was arrested while having his shoes shined on a Third street bootblack stand. Elsie Fieber was taken to police headquarters on her return to her home after having enjoyed the pleasure of an all-night dance at Teutonia hall.

Worrying Governor Gillett

Jost how great a load of vexation Governor Gillett has lifted off his mind by announcing his decision not to be a candidate for re-election is realized most fully by the newspapermen of Sacramento. During the months over which speculation as to his plans extended the reporters of Sacramento did more to worry the governor, to take the savor from his meat and drink and to make the world look dark for him, than all the politicians who were hammering away at his tight-lipped reserve. It was a good joke from the viewpoint of the newspapermen, but I doubt very much whether the governor can regard it in that light, even now. There are in Sacramento at least six newspapermen who visit the governor's office in the capitol every day. These are the political writers of the three Sacramento dailies and the correspondents of the three San Francisco morning papers. Of course it became the duty of all these to keep a sharp lookout for the first sign of a resolution of the governor's political indecision; equally of course they soon noticed that their persistent sleuthing gave the governor great unhappiness. Whereupon, with true reportorial fiendishness, they organized a systematic attack upon the governor's temper. One after another, every day, these newspapermen would present themselves at the governor's desk and after passing the time of day, would inquire, in the most interested and solicitous tone imaginable: "Governor, are you ready to announce yet whether you will be a candidate for re-election?" This perpetual interrogative on a subject which was agitating his mind battered so remorselessly against the governor's sweet disposition that it was pretty nearly demoralized when he finally determined to make his position public. I am credibly informed that toward the end the governor's answer to the stereotyped question was couched in language as vigorous as that of a Humboldt logger. But to the newspapermen it was all a joke.

A Letter From Herbert Law

Though Mr. Herbert E. Law, now one of the principal stockholders of the Western Steel Corporation of Seattle, spends most of his time in the northern city, he still retains his material interests as well as his sentimental interest in San Francisco. But as a result of the broadening of his interests since the fire, by which he was severely but only temporarily crippled in a pecuniary sense, he now concerns himself with the industrial affairs of the whole coast, and upon these he expatiates in a letter to a friend in this city who recently inquired whether he was as optimistic as formerly about the future of San Francisco. This letter I have been permitted to read; also to print what I please of what it contains. "My opinion," writes Mr. Law, "has not changed. Much that I predicted before the fire has been realized. The development exceeds even what we believed certain at that time. It is almost impossible to think broadly enough and to plan wisely enough to keep abreast with the growth of the coast and to forecast the extent of its trade relations ten years hence. The fortification of Pearl Harbor, making it a second Gibraltar, the building of transport docks in San Francisco, the increase of trade relations on the very friendly basis that exists between ourselves and China, all tend to bear out what I predicted a few years ago. I stated at the Merchants' banquet shortly after the fire that the trials we had in San Francisco would prove the most beneficial thing that had ever come to us. Now our city and our methods bear the same relation to their former character that a new, modern machine bears to an old machine that has outlived its efficiency. We were a happy, joyous, contented lot. We woke up, and all the slumbering strength within us was put into forceful action. Men discovered they could carry burdens they never dreamed of shouldering before. The world never saw more creditable qualities of fortitude, more admirable powers of re-creation. Now considering those qualities, considering also the resources at hand, the Oriental and other trade tributary to our coast, so vast that it exceeds the total trade tributary to the Eastern section of the United States and all the rest of the civilized world put together, it would not be unreasonable to predict that while you and I are still in the arena, we shall see crystallized in achievement a development so great that, however optimistic we may be, we cannot conceive the extent of it."

Law on Steel

Mr. Law is now versed in the mysteries of the steel trade, and he has something of interest to say on this subject. "Steel," he says, "is the barometer of trade. The consumption of steel and its healthy condition is indicative of the same condition of all the rest of trade and commerce. It is the measure of prosperity. This by the way is very singular, for the steel industry is less than fifty years old. H. N. Casson, who wrote the Romance of Steel,' I think, used the only phrase that expresses it. We use 1,200,000 tons per year on the coast, and I notice the Examiner of January 20 quotes the increase at 25 per cent per year, and gives our good San Francisco credit for a consumption of $4,000,000 worth in 1909. We pay $18,000,000 per year freight. Who can doubt the vast resources and unparalleled development and extension of growth of trade prosperty when this coast of ours can afford to pay that much tribute and still be prosperous notwithstanding that it pays in addition thereto the same rate of profit that this steel brings where it is consumed in the East, and when the income from buildings and other things in which steel is consumed is not greater here than there? The creation of a steel plant on the coast is one of the most important signs of the coast's stability and insurance of development and increase. About the steel industry group themselves more industries that are necessarily allied to it, than are grouped about any other article of trade. This light, silent, durable, compact, everlasting material has uses limitless, and they are increasing more rapidly today than in the past. Consider for a moment that the Gary plant, the largest, most modern, and finest steel works in the world, costing $100.000,000, is to have an addition now of another $100.000.000, and that although the plant is running to its full capacity, and all the rest of the steel works in the United States are doing the same, it is impossible to fill their orders. The steel industry is as far from being able to fill its orders today as it was the day the Gary plant was conceived. Recently we placed an order for steel for the Rialto Building, and although our relations are very close, we were unable to get delivery sooner than the middle of the present year. The U. S. Steel Corporation produces 42 per cent of the steel used in the United States, and the Independents 58 per cent. The steel corporation's capacity is stated by the New York Journal to be 42,000 tons per day, and its orders are 51,000 tons per day at this time."

Oakland's Chamber of Commerce

That was a cheering message which Oakland's Chamber of Commerce sent recently to the men who are formulating plans for the big world's fair in 1915. The Oaklanders sent word that they were heartily in sympathy with the project, but they added that they were most anxious to express their sympathy in terms of practical assistance. "Tell us what we can do and we will try to do it" was the gist of their communication. Here is an example of the comity that should exist between neighboring towns which cannot be too strongly commended. With more expressions of the same sort from other cities the path of the world's fair men will be smoothed of formidable difficulties. In this connection it should be noted that the installation of a San Francisco man as secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Oakland was a fortunate move both for Oakland and San Francisco. It was Homer Boushey, the official in question, who sent that cheerful message. Boushey is a San Francisco man in the best sense of the term. He it was who took charge of the publicity work for the Portola celebration and saw to it that literature on the subject was distributed and read in every part of the world. Boushey did his work very quietly and it was only after the Portola had come to an end and the whole town marveled at the amazing success of the fiesta that people began asking what Boushey had been doing. When they found out they put a high appraisement on the services of this erstwhile newspaperman, but just about that time Oakland needed a secretary for her Chamber of Commerce and lured Boushey across the bay. He has a wide acquaintance with the public men of the State, is full of original ideas and, I am told, is making himself indispensable to the Oakland body.

A Revolutionary Pundit

It is difficult to keep pace with the progress of erudition at Berkeley. In fact nothing in our educational system is quite so difficult, unless it be the task of following with unblinking eye the breathless cavortings of the gentlemen who have made Berkeley a refuge for discredited ideas. Truly 'tis an unimaginative don who cannot make himself the subject of discussion at the university at least once a month; and as it is considered the basic principle of university professorship to excite discussion, particularly in the colmuns of the yellow dailies, the entourage of Benjamin Ide Wheeler must be looked upon as a highly successful bunch of performers. Just at the moment the palm for notoriety belongs to one Harry Overstreet who ornaments the department of philosophy with his large and luminous mentality. Professor Overstreet has taken a fall out of the atomic theory and has put a crimp in the soul—an achievement which, as it was accomplished in a single lecture, must be regarded with particular respect. It may be urged that to destroy the atomic theory with a puff of words is no original accomplishment. True, the atomic theory has been crumpled before; yet must it be allowed that the don who repeats the feat is as deserving the reputation for courage as that fearless wight who dared to speak ill of the equator. The annihilation of the soul is a less spectacular performance, it must be admitted. Custom has staled the infinite variety of that adventure; the soul has been bowled over so often that the populace has ceased to gape with awe at the spectacle. Nevertheless our revolutionary pundit of Berkeley has done his deed with thoroughness and despatch. Hear him pound the soul to a pulp: "The traditional ideal of the soul has labored under the same difficulties as the atomic theory. The philosopher must simply describe and account for the togetherness and eliminate the soul entity as a product of mechanical idealism." Let it be understood that this "togetherness" is the professor's graceful word for the world. Having blithedly eliminated the atomic theory from the physical "togetherness" and the soul from the spiritual "togetherness," it becomes the professor's duty to supply us with something to take their places. Will Prof Overstreet please give this matter his immediate attention?

Disputing a Velasquez

The rage for detecting the hand of the forger in works of art which have passed as genuine for years, perhaps for centuries, has just had its reductio ad absurdum in London where Sir W. B. Richmond, an artist and art lecturer, has attempted to throw doubts upon the authenticity of the Venus by Velasquez in the National Gallery. According to this connoisseur two pigments were used in the picture which did not exist in the time of Velasquez. He infers therefrom that the great Spaniard did not paint the picture. Admitting that his statement is correct it does not warrant any such inference. The hand of the restorer has wreaked its ravage on many of the masterpieces of painting; that hand may have added the two pigments which so worry Sir W. B. Richmond. Many of the Velasquez paintings in the Prado of Madrid show similar drastic treatment; overpainting, skinning of the delicate glazes, patchings, mendings which show at twenty paces and so-called restorations that are simply acts of vandalism. The history of the Venus of the National Gallery is well-known and admits of no dispute. It can be traced directly to the great master and that was one reason why the English government did not hesitate to pay $225,000 for it. But aside from this every esthetic consideration proves its authenticity. Who that has studied Velasquez doubts that only he of all the Spanish school could have painted this beautiful nude? It is informed with the spirit of the master; it breathes forth his genius. One might as well say that the Moses of Michelangelo is a spurious work.

Morse's Poetical Consolation

Charles W. Morse, the ice king, has entered the Atlanta penitentiary in a chastened spirit. While persisting in his protestations of innocence he seems to have resolved to serve his time in complete resignation to the decree of fate, but it is significant that when he exchanged his civilian dress for a suit of stripes he requested that a copy of Henley's "Invictus" be left in his possession. The request was granted and it may be inferred that by constant perusal of this poem Morse will sustain his unconquerable soul and that in the fell clutch of circumstance he will continue to keep the mastery of his wonderful energies. There are many instances in history of distinguished prisoners who have soothed the harshness of their enforced solitude by reading the poets and there are many more of those who have turned to the writing of poetry and prose the mental activity which otherwise would rust and decay. From Villon and Lovelace to Verlaine and Wilde the list is a long one. It would not be surprising if Morse should make one of this famous company. Certainly he has had many experiences in and out of Wall street which would make thrilling and illuminating reading and if he ever decides to put on paper what he knows of the System, his revelations will make the chronicles of Tom Lawson seem pale and insignificant. Let us hope that Morse may find inspiration in his cell and enrich contemporary literature with his memoirs.

Schumann-Heink on American Music

It may stimulate the patriotism of American music-lovers to learn that a great artiste like Madame Schumann-Heink has engaged in missionary work on behalf of American music. The wonderful contralto, it will be remembered, recently became an American citizen and this adds interest to these words uttered in a recent interview: "I love to sing Americans songs at my concerts. The music of some of them is positively beautiful. For example, take 'The Rosary,' by Ethelbert Nevin. It is one of the most exquisite pieces that I know of, and I am very fond of it. Nevin is a genuine artist; and this particular song, if it had been written by Shubert or Schumann, would have caused all the critics in the world to rave. Everywhere I sing it the audiences go wild over it. Beautiful as the words are themselves, the sentiment of the music is still more bewitching. The climax is reached at the close of the accelerando and largo passages. Nevin was a genius, I repeat, and his music is something beautiful. Likewise, G. W. Chadwick's 'Two Folk Songs' have been incorporated in my programs, as I consider them very beautiful. He is one of our best composers. I find that the American songs take best; and inasmuch as they are so beautiful and exquisite in sentiment, I think it the proper thing to have them on my programs. 'The Irish Love Song,' by Margaret Ruthven Lang, is also a piece that I love to sing, and one that receives great applause from my audiences. Mrs. Beach wrote some beautiful music, and her 'Irish Love Song' is very much liked. I sing it frequently. America has no need to feel ashamed of these composers. Their work will compare very favorably with the songs of the Old World."

beautiful new natatorium. Mrs. Thomas Magee, Miss Jennie Crocker and Mr. Edward M. Greenway were among those whom I noted on a recent visit. The girls of the younger set have formed little swimming parties which visit the new baths on Tuesday and Friday mornings, for on those days from nine until noon the natatorium is reserved for women exclusively. I am told that the new bathhouse cost $150,000 and after inspecting its various departments and its architectural details I can very well believe it. The architecture of the Pompeiian baths has been copied in the new Lurline and the structure is of reinforced concrete, a great improvement on the old wooden building which was burned down in 1906. The plunge is 65 by 140 feet, the depth varying from two to nine and one-half feet. There are 103 tub rooms with hot and cold fresh and salt water and a shower in every room. There are 350 dressing rooms, massage parlors for men and women with electric and steam cabinets and steam rooms. A barber shop is also part of the equipment. As a matter of fact the new Lurline Baths will take rank as the handsomest and most fully equipped baths in the country.

Von Dorn Hotel Leased

The word has gone forth that Colonel D. S. Dorn, president of the Boosters' Club, has leased the Hotel Von Dorn to George A. Eastman for a term of five years. Mr. Eastman is an oldtime hotel man and will conduct the hotel in the most approved manner. Colonel Dorn will henceforth have more time to devote to the activities of the Boosters' Club and other enterprises in which he is deeply interested.

Mrs. Manykids—There is one thing about our girls—they are entirely self-possessed.

Mr. Manykids—Yes, they're too self-possessed. I wish they'd get someone else to possess them.

Dear Bess:—

You ask have I plans for the summer. Yes, I have, and knowing me as well as you do you will marvel as you read them.

I am rapidly overcoming, if I have not already done so, my deep seated and utter repugnance to the Oakland side of the bay. One day last week, one lovely, soft alluring spring day, I went across the bay to visit some friends in their new home in the foothills back of Oakland; and having spent the day, I am going to find some one, to show me the way to spend many days, by acquiring a lot of my own. So enthusiastic have I become, almost in a moment over the charm of the place.

As I said, it was a very duck of a day. We lunched on a bewitching flagged terrace which gave us a sweeping view of the bay, with Mt. Tamalpais' purple shadow in the distance. It was so clear that the water, sparkling and lovely, seemed almost at one's feet. Later we rambled in a garden that in a few weeks will be a riot of bloom. We picked some lovely fragrant roses, early as it is, and basked in the warmest sunshine all afternoon.

It is certainly an ideal spot, and I am fairly launched on the idea of a home in those foothills, which is and is not the country but fills all the country requirements with none of its draw backs.

Tomorrow I hie me across the bay, straight to the delightful task of choosing the spot, suiting both my pocket book and my artistic eye. Will write you next week what measure of success is mine.

Yours in a blissful state of anticipation,

—Claire.

Odd Things in the World

The oldest newspaper in Belgium is the Gazette van Gent, which received the privilege of printing the Gendtsche Post-Tydinghen on November 17, 1666, and which has existed almost continuously since the first number was printed on January 1, 1667. The oldest copy preserved is No. 69, of September 8, 1667. The next oldest newspaper in Belgium is L'Independance Belge, in its eightieth year.

Time is calculated among the Indians by moons instead of months. "Wee" is the Indian for month. January is called "We-ter'i," "the Hard Moon." February, "the Raccoon Moon." March, "Sore-eye Moon." April, "the Moon in which geese lay eggs." May, "the Planting Moon." June, "the Moon when the strawberries are red." July, "the Moon when choke-cherries are ripe." August, "the Harvest Moon." September, "the Moon when rice is laid up to dry." October, "the Rice drying Moon." November, "the Deer Killing Moon," and December, "the Deer Moon."

Scotland possesses several railway anomalies, of which probably the most notable is that of the stations of Mallaig and Kyle, of Lochalsh, which, though only twenty miles apart in a straight line, are separated by no less than 360 miles of rail by the shortest route, viz., Crianlarich, Balquhidder, Perth and Inverness. Yet another Scotch incongruity is that the nearest railway station to the town of Port Ellen, on the island of Islay, if we except the small local line at Campell town, is Ballycastic, in Ireland.

An expedition left Llandudno, Deganwy, and Penmaenmawr recently with the object of tracing, if possible, the submerged palace of Llys Helig, a Welsh chieftain of the sixth century. The palace is said to be visible at very low tides at a point midway between Penmaenmawr and Great Ormes Head, but it cannot be said that the search established its existence. The exploring party was divided into two sections, one of which laid bare what looked like an old wall, while the other claimed to have traced the outline of a wall 130 yards long, with a shorter wall running at right angles. The rising of the tide compelled the explorers to leave the spot before completing their search.

If M. Cunisset-Carnot's observations are correct, the crow is one of the most intelligent of birds. Normandy is a place where crows love to congregate, and a Paris contemporary reproduces M. Cunisset-Carnot's experiences, to the effect that in 1876 the first maneuvers took place in Normandy after the war, and it is not an extravagant hypothesis that many crows who saw the troublous times of 1870 were alive in 1876. These birds watched the soldiers at a distance of about 200 yards, but when in firing the men were extended on the ground the birds would hover about at quarters so close as seven feet, evidently, in the opinion of the observer, mindful of the times they had enjoyed six years before and in expectation of a further feast.

The fear of premature burial, which prompted the late Lord Burton to direct by his will that his heart should be removed from his body, has caused many well known men and women to order a surgical operation to be performed upon their bodies. Harriet Martineau left her doctor fifty pounds to amputate her head, and Lady Burton directed that her heart should be pierced with a needle. The late Edmund Yates left instructions that his jugular vein should be severed, with a provision that a fee of twenty guineas should be paid for the purpose. Literary persons appear to have been particularly afraid of premature burial. Bishop Berkeley, Lord Lytton, Hans Andersen and Wilkie Collins all took measures to protect themselves from it.

The euphorbias are very numerous in the colony of Queensland, and among them is the Euphorbia pilulifera the "Queensland asthma plant," which has a remarkable reputation for curing this troublesome complaint. Several pharmaceutical preparations of the plant are extensively sold in Australia. Analysis shows that a green plant contained 79 per cent by weight of water and 3 per cent of ash, leaving 18 points of vegetable matter. A dried plant contained an alkaloidal substance equal to about one part in a thousand. It contained also a glucosidal substance to the amount of not more than four parts in the thousand. Possibly one or both of these was the active principle of the plant.

WHY SONGS ARE SUNG

'Tis not for honors he may win,
The poet's songs are sung;
'Tis not for these he lets us in
To worlds he lives among.

No bay nor laurel would he wear;
But that for which he longs,
Is only that some one, somewhere,
May learn to love his songs.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—A material change for the better in security values was the feature in Wall street at the week-end. No change has occurred in the condition of fundamentals in the country to create this change in values; hence we might look at the market in the earlier part of the week when values were being severally depressed as being one where a strong bear party was in control and using Washington advices to cover large commitments sold at much higher figures. The sharp drives made at leading speculative issues during the week would strongly warrant this belief. There is now reported the usual January slackening in the steel industry, also for railway supplies. This condition is quite logical after a tremendous business booked six months previous. Steel and equipment shares have anticipated this event and it is likely that they have seen bottom figures. Railway returns will begin to show us less traffic ere long on account of bad weather and a slackening trade, which is the rule in January and February, but these shares have already discounted this matter with declines of 10 per cent to 30 per cent in six months. However, without looking too far into the future, we feel that temporarily, we have seen the worst in Wall street and a slow betterment should occur.

Grain—Floods in France gave wheat its great strength this week after the bear raid. The market has always been stimulated by great disasters, famine and war, and prices moved rapidly in all markets under the present development. There is, however, less reason for such advance than there would have been had the floods occurred in other European countries, as France is seldom a factor in the world's markets, whether its crop be large or small. The sentiment remains. Of course, the drowning-out of an immense winter wheat acreage and destruction of large stores creates a probability of a call upon the rest of the world. The floods in Italy are more important and some damage to growing wheat has occurred in South Germany. Our domestic situation has not been changed and it will take some time for a clearer insight into the spring markets. The movement thus far from the farms confirms the previous estimate of an exaggerated Government crop report. Before the final word can be said on the old crop we are apt to hear of damage to growing wheat by the alternate thaws and freezes that have been occurring the past two weeks. Liverpool will give the signal each morning of the flood damage and trade expectations. An advance around the high prices of the opening of the month is about the best that can be expected.

Corn—Corn has been sluggish on the old theory of larger deliveries of grain with improved weather and transportation facilities, but the market will not weaken materially, as farmers shut off sales on all declines and they make the price of corn. The Government report on farm animals was not as bearish as expected and the decline in cattle and hogs was but half of the general belief. The agitation against high prices of food stuffs has been the chief depressive influence on corn and that is wearing away. The quality of the corn has not improved and winter feeding has been much heavier than usual. The heavy marketing usually ends with January and prices advance with the decline in shipments. A nervous market will continue and purchases on all breaks is more advisable than selling on the advances in view of the attitude of the producers.

Cotton—The cotton market this last week has experienced less fluctuations than at any time for months. It might now be well to size up the situation and realize just what is the contention of those who bring in higher prices and the views of those that feel that cotton is not worth over 15 cents. Those contending for higher prices claim that owing to a very small crop, the supply will be grossly insufficient. In opposition to this, the bears claim that there will be enough cotton to meet all demands. According to precedent, after any strong bull campaign, there has been a shrinkage in demand. So far, for the year, the shrinkage has been 500,000 bales less than last. On September 1 the visible supply in the United States was about 575,000 bales. Putting the growth of this crop at 10,000,000 and allowing 250,000 bales for linters and re-packs and the movement of the new crop during August to September 1 to the amount of 100,000 bales, we would get a total of over 12,000,000. Spinners' takings last year were about 13,300,000 bales which would leave some visible supply on the first of coming September. If an amount of 1,000,000 decrease in consumption be taken in consideration, on these figures they claim that there will be enough cotton to meet all demands. The increase in the Russian Asiatic crop will counter-balance the decline in the Egyptian crop and there is an increase of 1,000,000 bales in the present India crop. China will take 50,000 bales this year against 250,000 last year. Then again, precedent shows us that nothing equals the unbending obstinacy of the spinners to economize their stocks and buy no more than urgent necessity demands. In addition to this, there is much talk in the daily press of increased cost of living, Government investigation, strikes, boycotts and a weak stock market, and they feel that people cannot bull cotton at the present prices. Is it not more likely that under the shadow of a bumper crop everybody will be shy of cotton and that the obstinate holder will be left stranded high and dry? And there is an old maxim which might well appear now—"Never bull the tail of a small crop."

Copper—Speculation in copper securities developed a fair activity this week. After a generally good market, with strength in spots, there was a reactionary tendency in sympathy with the stock market. It was claimed that the rally was merely a short covering and that the process of liquidation would be continued whenever the market would take the stocks. This view has become prevalent enough to make one suspicious that the professional trading element was ranged on the short side. Then there is something to be said as to the effect of the Taft policies as embodied in the administration bill, when, or if, they become a law. Copper was stronger in London, and the statistics at the end of the month show a continued decrease in visible supply. The break in the prices for copper shares has carried them down to a point where many are very cheap and should be bought for handsome profits irrespective of speculative conditions in the big market. The dissolving of the injunction restraining the consolidation of the Utah and Nevada Consolidated Copper Companies as not being in violation of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, should mean that the proposed copper merger will be pushed through, and this should tend to strengthen the copper securities market. An unsettled market may be looked for until the merger becomes a fact; the wide fluctuations in Lake, Colorado and Arizona, North Butte, Nevada Consolidated and other good standard copper stocks tends to prove this. Our opinion on Giroux, Greene-Cananea, Miami, Inspiration, Homestake, Cactus, Nevada Consolidated, Shannon, Arizona Commercial, Old Dominion, Copper Range, Ojibway, East and North Butte has not changed, and in fact from the showing these mines make, we look for handsome profits to anyone having a little patience.

Local Securities—As was predicted in these columns last week, the local market for stocks and bonds has ruled quiet and without much feature. Spring Valley Water has been a strong spot among the listed stocks and has risen several points during the week. Associated Oil has remained steady and so has Alaska Packers. Sugar stocks continue strong with Hawaiian Commercial, Honokaa and Paauhau the leaders. Pacific Telephone and Pacific Gas and Electric issues are very much neglected at practically last week's prices. The feature of the bond trade has been the steadiness of the general list with the possible exception of Peoples Water 5s. These latter bonds have been very irregular and have shown a decline.

A Public Service Corporation's Contribution to a City's Wealth

One million dollars a year is paid in wages by one concern in this town to its fifteen hundred employees in San Francisco.

About 7500 men, women, and children in this city trace their regular support to wages or salaries paid here by the San Francisco Gas and Electric Company and its parent corporation, the Pacific Gas and Electric Company. That means that fifteen hundred families get their livelihood from the manufacture and distribution of gas and electricity in this city, or that one person in every fifty in this community is at present dependent for a living upon the local employment required by this company.

This company also pays one hundred thousand dollars a year in repairing the streets of San Francisco. Every time it disturbs the pavement it has to make repairs at its own expense. And besides this, it has to pay the city several thousand dollars in taxes on a franchise privilege, not for using the pavements, but for laying pipes underground or stringing wires overhead along the streets.

Companies or individuals using drays or wagons for their delivery system are not charged anything for using the city's streets. If gas and electricity could be delivered in wagons that $100,000 a year for street repair work would be saved, and so would the franchise tax.

The gas and electric company pays taxes on all its property, just the same as any other business enterprise. Then part of those taxes are taken by the city to repair streets used by all the concerns that deliver by wagon.

These things help to establish the selling price of gas and electricity.

A Suffragette Row at the Century

Behind its cold and classical exterior the Century Club frequently frivols. A recent frivolity took the form of a costume party. The members appeared as characters from literature, and history past and contemporary. There were colonial dames and revolutionary daughters and clever representations of well-known personages. The Century Club must be conceded cleverness with its conservatism. Its erudition is well known. In fact it is a pioneer, locally, in erudition, being the first women's club in San Francisco to produce papers on Jane Austen, Felicia D. Hemans and Ruskin. Which, however, is wandering from the costume party. One of the members essayed caricature and with an indiscrimating sense of humor, chose Mrs. Elizabeth Pankhurst, the militant English suffragette, for her victim. The result was distinctly funny. Mrs. Pankhurst's portraits had been carefully studied and the militant expression faithfully copied. The burlesque promised to be the success of the occasion. But it was not. Among the Century Club members are Mrs. John F. Swift and Mrs. Austin Sperry, both zealous suffragettes whose devotion to the cause is sincere and uncompromising. To them the estimable Mrs. Pankhurst should be above caricature and they took exception to their fellow member's portrait of her. "Why should Mrs. Pankhurst be held up to ridicule in this club?" they demanded. "Why?" jointly echoed the directors, and the reason is now seriously under investigation. Factions have developed and there is much discussion of the affair within the club's precincts. Both Mrs. Swift and Mrs. Sperry are influential members and while the lady with the misdirected sense of humor may not be asked for an apology, she will receive an intimation that no such martyr to the emancipation of women as Mrs. Pankhurst may be held in light esteem within the walls of the Century Club.

Heart Interest in "Professor Napoleon"

Considered as an essay in amateur theatricals "Professor Napoleon" more than justified the enterprising spirits who organized it. I am not of those whose enthusiasm causes them to discount professional talent in awarding praise to our society amateurs. But while I do not think that the participants could step into the limelight of the workaday stage without additional training, I am full of gratitude toward them for giving us an entertainment superior to the general run of amateur attempts. From a financial viewpoint I am given to understand that the extravaganza is regarded as a great success. I am glad of it. Equally glad am I that the intimate communion necessitated by participation in this entertainment—the easy familiarity it superinduced between maids and youths who do not ordinarily meet on such facile footing—gave Dan Cupid an opportunity to practice his archery at close range. It may not be known that the pudgy divinity is at times an indifferent marksman; yet such is the unhappy fact. His arrows always wing their way into the flesh of his selected victims, but not infrequently they miss the vital part and cause only temporary embarrassment. But a god who couldn't hit a heart in the restricted space behind the scenes would be open to suspicion of blindness and that, notwithstanding the statements of Bullfinch and Gayley, is an affliction from which Dan Cupid does not suffer. So I welcome the intrusion of Cupid into the "Professor Napoleon" revels. 'Twas the very place for him to range. The bars were down; the various sets failed to preserve their icy exclusiveness; and it is just possible that the best of results matrimonial may follow. By all means let us hope that the sweet insinuating sentiment of love may temper the asperity with which the exalted ones of the social elite have heretofore treated those in an inferior position.

Some Cardiac Symptoms

I am disposed to the opinion that Dan Cupid did pleasant execution during the progress of this charitable affair. For instance there are Dorothy Van Sicklen and George Wilcutt. Ask them and they will return the delightfully inconsequential answer: "We have been friends from childhood." Bless you, what has Cupid to do with friendship? I have it on good authority that during the dance of the milkmaids when the capacious sun bonnets concealed two heads, Miss Van Sicklen and Mr. Wilcutt were the only two who did not avail themselves of this truly rural opportunity. Experts tell me that this is a plain symptom of cardiac affection, but just what stage the malady has reached I do not pretend to know. In this case I infer that there is a complication of disorders because when Fred Tillman stepped from his box across the footlights and presented a bouquet of orchids to Miss Van Sicklen, Mr. Wilcutt seemed to suffer a pang. There was reason, for the young lady flashed a bewitching glance at the doer of that gallant deed. The case of Miss Innes Keeney and Joe Rosborough was also interesting. Miss Keeney is one of the most elusive—and therefore one of the most fascinating—belles of the city. She was queen of the witches and enacted her role with such verisimilitude that she cast a spell over Mr. Rosborough. I am told that he is head over heels entangled. Let us not forget Miss Constance Cummings either. This charming girl is the affianced of Lieutenant Joerns of the navy, but nevertheless she witched it so daintily that Mr. Griffiths, the singing director of the extravaganza, is loth to leave the town and Miss Cummings.

Mr. Clark Crocker Van Fleet will entertain his friends at a four o'clock tea this afternoon in the home of his parents, Judge and Mrs. William Carey Van Fleet. His mother will assist him in receiving.

Emil Bruguiere's Gloves

Across a dun day last week flashed Emil Bruguiere's gloves. It was in a crowded thoroughfare overflowing with ungloved provincialism that a sudden flare of orange appeared. Such color I have seen in rainbows, but never before in gloves. It was cleverly heightened by the creamy brown of Mr. Bruguiere's suit. Followed by the dazzled stares of the populace, Mr. Bruguiere passed on his way debonair and unconscious. Bright lemon tinted gloves he also wears with an equal insousiance, but these are pale and insignificant after the flaming effect of the others. Mr. Bruguiere's friends are keenly interested in the duel between the Prince Braganza and James Gordon Bennett which, according to the Paris press, is bloodily impending. It will probably remain impending for some time since Mr. Bennett has departed France for a long cruise on his yacht. The local interest in this threatened encounter, of course, centers in Mr. Bruguiere's alleged connection with it. It was the coupling of his name with that of the Princess in the Herald's Paris edition which provoked the wrath of the Prince.

Talk About Emil Bruguiere

Gossip in the East has concerned itself to a great extent with the Bruguieres since Emil Bruguiere incurred the double notoriety of a divorce and connection with the Braganza-Bennett imbroglio. I notice that one of the eastern papers says that there has been a confusion of names and that it was Louis and not Emil Bruguiere whose friendship for Anita Stewart excited the jealousy of Braganza. This is not correct. Louis Bruguiere who lives in Paris was for a long time the friend of Miss Stewart, but when Emil paid a visit to the French capital, Louis introduced him to the charming young lady who was then affianced to Braganza and Emil became much more devoted with her than Louis had been. It is natural that the eastern smart sets should be interested in anything affecting Emil Bruguiere for he made quite a hit in Newport when he sojourned there. He was never impressed with the golden veneer that conceals the vulgarity of that stamping-ground of millionaires and his independence gave him distinction. But in the end, through no fault of his own, he came a cropper. During his visit to New York and Newport his musical comedy, "The Baroness Fiddlesticks," was presented on Broadway and all Newport from Mrs. Fish to Harry Lehr went to the opening performance. The stage manager, without the knowledge of the author, had interpolated a number of topical songs in which the frivolities of Newport were ridiculed. Of course that was too much for the frivols to stand and as they insisted on holding the playwright responsible for the insult, Emil came home, a little more scorntul of Newport than ever before.

Raphael Weill's Grief Over Paris

Raphael Weill's friends have been sympathizing with him in his grief over the catastrophe to his beloved Paris. The homes of his brother and other relatives are there, and apart from these associations, Mr. Weill loves the city on the Seine as only a Frenchman can. His distress over the menace of the flood has been very genuine. It is rather a sad coincidence that in his later years the two cities Raphael Weill has called home should be visited by great calamity. His loyal devotion to San Francisco through the earthquake days is local history. It is strange that again in his life disaster should come to the city which is second in his affections.

Mrs. Wheeler at the German Court

Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, with her niece Miss Sprague, had the honor of being presented to the Kaiser, the Kaiserin, the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Germany, at the last schleppencour. I learn from a correspondent in Berlin that the occasion was notable for two interesting reasons. In the first place a score of American ladies were presented, more than had ever received this honor before; and in the second place, the loveliness of the dresses and the wealth of jewels displayed outshone all previous spectacles of this nature at the German court. The schleppencour is an introductory function preceding the court ball and is quite brief. It begins at half past seven at which time those to be presented enter the White Hall and pass before royalty, making the courtesy which must be practiced beforehand in order that no faux pas may mar the affair. Mrs. Wheeler wore a gown of white satin with a court train of white velvet while Miss Sprague wore white satin with a train of blue satin. Elaborately jewelled hair ornaments matched the gowns. A number of the court dresses worn by the presentees on this occasion were made by Worh of Paris and Hertz of Berlin. I am told that none cost less than $400. It is usual, after the schleppencour, for those presented to dine at a big hotel and once there, the ladies divest themselves of their court trains with sighs of relief. On the recent occasion when Mrs. Wheeler was presented some of the trains were so heavily embroidered with jewels that the wearers could scarcely lift them.

Originality at the Bal Masque

Originality was rampant at the so-called mardi gras ball at the Hotel St. Francis the other night. Many of the buds made their own gowns out of dresses originally worn by their mothers and grandmothers. Little Gussie Foute wore her grandmother's wedding gown, a satin and lace affair made in the bouffante mode of the ante-bellum days, with overskirt looped up on the hips over a skirt of ankle length worn over hoops. With this she wore a light blue "basque" of old blue satin, and carried a Leghorn hat bent up to form a basket and filled with daisies and roses. She called herself a "Florentine Flower Girl." Miss Mildred Pierce sported two old Spanish shawls of blue satin embroidered all over in roses and draped over a skirt of old blue satin. Perhaps the most picturesque gown was that worn by Miss Maud Woods who posed as a "Dolly Varden." The material of her gown was blue taffeta, with tiny roses in prim lines brocaded on it. The full gathered skirt was edged with several quillings of frilled old rose ribbon put on in a graceful waving design. From beneath the coquettish bonnet hung long curls and on her arms she wore lace "mitts" and old-fashioned jewelry. Everyone said that the most original pair were Suzanne Kirkpatrick and Maud Wilson who came as two fluffy powder puffs, one pink and the other pale blue. The skirts, very full and fluffy like those of a ballet dancer, only a bit longer, were of pleated tulle trimmed with swansdown and the tight bodices were of the colored satin. They wore wigs of snowy white out of which stuck dainty powder puffs. In place of a fan, each of the girls carried a huge puff of swansdown.

When Mrs. Edgerton Forgot Her Lines

In a recent memoir of Modjeska written by her one-time leading man Howard Kyle is a paragraph of interest to San Francisco theatregoers who will readily recall the event described. During an engagement at the old Baldwin Theatre Modjeska took into her company a young society amateur of this city who played Elizabeth to the star's Mary Stuart. On the evening of her debut the new recruit's lines completely deserted her, and in a scene when she should have been hurling invective at her beautiful cousin, Queen Elizabeth stood dumb and lowly. Modjeska cleverly covered the lapse and later graciously accepted the apology of the would-be actress who vowed she couldn't storm at anyone so lovely as Mary Stuart. The actress whose name is not given in the magazine article was the late Mrs. Frances Edgerton whose essay at a professional career was brief and of uncertain brilliancy. She was a beautiful woman, prominent in society, the sister of Mrs. Homer S. King, and had displayed much talent as an amateur but the art that served in charity performances failed in the coldly critical atmosphere of a theatre. Her appearance with Modjeska contributed to a brilliant season, for Mrs. Edgerton's friends were loyal and many, but I believe she played only one part and withdrew from the company when the Polish actress left San Francisco.

A Local Musical Center

Believing that the music of a country is the embodiment of its progress toward higher civilization and realizing that here in America creative talent in music has been at work without due recognition for many years, an organization known as the American Music Society has undertaken the task of exploiting the masterpieces of American composers. Their efforts have been crowned with gratifying successes. The society has established centers in all the large cities including San Francisco. The local center has as its secretary Miss Rita Slater to whose energy and persevering efforts the high standing of the society in this city is largely due. Miss Slater is one of our prominent local pianists.

Miss Kemble to Interpret Dukas

The second of a series of interpretative studies in modern opera will be given on Monday afternoon, February 7, at the St. Francis Hotel by Miss Margaret Kemble. Miss Kemble's subject will be "Ariane et Barbe-Bleu," the opera written by Paul Dukas on the Blue Beard story as developed by Maurice Maeterlinck. Dukas calls this work "Conte Musical, Poeme de Maurice Maeterlinck." It was first produced three years ago at the Opera Comique and proved a great success. That rare artist, Georgette Leblanc who is the wife of Maeterlinck, sang the title role and with her subtle, mysteriously magnetic art, seemed Ariane's self, the bearer of light to the unfortunates imprisoned in the dungeon of Blue Beard. Miss Kemble, during her last visit abroad, conferred with Dukas on the proper interpretation of his

A PLACE FOR BEAUTIFUL HOMES

Something about the Reserved and Restricted CROCKER TRACT

IN THE PIEDMONT HILLS

We have set aside the most beautiful tract in Alameda County to be cut up into villa sites and sold to people who intend to build homes costing from $15,000.00 to $50,000.00 each.

This is the CROCKER TRACT at Piedmont—a tract of about 150 acres of rolling, oak-studded hills.

The homes already built and the gardens already laid out on this tract show the eye just the character of improvements that will be maintained on it.

Our restrictions of sale guarantee the maintenance of this high order of improvement, as the purchaser of a home-site must agree to spend at least $10,000.00 on his home. This will insure a neighborhood entirely free from undesirable structures.

This firm has developed and marketed many tracts, but this one was reserved and restricted for a special purpose, the building up of a neighborhood that would become one of the show places of the country.

There is no tract in all the San Francisco bay section that is so attractive in the present or that can offer such assurances and guarantees for the future.

The tract is fully developed. That means that the streets are macadamized, the sidewalks laid, the gas and water mains are in, the electric light and telephone wires are strung.

Electric cars give quick connection with the business centers.

The view is the finest in all the west.

The climate long ago made the Piedmont hills famous for salubrity.

The restrictions of sale insure a beautiful, quiet, harmonious community.

We will not sell to mere speculators. Our appeal is to those who want home-sites larger than 50 foot lots and who intend to spend large sums in home building and ground improvement.

This is the time to buy while there is the widest opportunity for site selection—150 acres to choose from.

Even if you do not intend to build for a few years, buy now and plant at once your trees and shrubs. Then, by the time you are ready to build, Nature will have greatly improved your property for you. Others who have purchased home-sites in the tract have done just that thing—set out their shrubs and trees.

We cannot impress too strongly upon those who contemplate the erection of expensive suburban villas, that the CROCKER TRACT offers and insures more than any tract in Northern California.

WICKHAM HAVENS, Incorporated, 1212 Broadway, Oakland, California

work and is therefore competent to present its meaning in the exact sense intended by the composer. This will be the first adequate presentation of the Dukas music in America. Those who heard Miss Kemble's interpretation of Strauss' "Elektra" will undoubtedly avail themselves of the opportunity to make acquaintance with "Ariane et Barbe-Bleu." Among the subscribers are Mrs. J. Leroy Nickel, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Mrs. Francis Carolan, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Henry Ferguson, Mrs. Henry Crocker, Mrs. Emma Shafter-Howard, Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Mrs. William Fries, Mrs. Truxtun Beale, Mrs. John D. Hooker, Mrs. William Cluff, Mrs. Samuel Schwartz, Miss Alma Levison and Miss Georgia Hammon.

In the Social Spotlight

Among the distinguished guests at the Fairmont are M. and Mme. Carreno Taghapetra of Berlin, the latter more familiarly known as Teresa Carreno, the talented pianiste.

Mrs. Leslie Carter is the guest of the Fairmont. Mrs. Carter is accompanied by her husband William Colin Payne.

Major and Lady Evelyn Collins of London are registered at the Fairmont, having arrived on Monday from the south where they have been spending some weeks. Major McHussey and Captain F. W. Best, the former arriving from India and the latter from Burmah, were also among the arrivals on the Manchuria and are at the Fairmont.

Other distinguished foreigners now at the Fairmont are J. H. T. Beit, Amsterdam, A. Egmael, Brussels, G. A. Arreins Kappers and I. Wolff of Amsterdam.

Mr. H. W. Metzger, a prominent merchant of Portland, accompanied by his bride, is spending the week at Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Martin were at Del Monte for the week-end, visiting the J. Downey Harveys.

Mr. C. A. Smith, a lumberman of Minneapolis, will arrive at Del Monte shortly, accompanied by his family and some friends, to spend the winter.

Eclipsing in lavishness the notable "orchid luncheon" came the "golden luncheon" last Saturday afternoon at the Hotel St. Francis. The table was massed with jonquils, daffodils, and freezias arranged in graceful baskets and vases, according well with the gold service. After luncheon bridge whiled away the afternoon hours. Mrs. Belshaw's guests were Mrs. Charles Clark, Mrs. Forrest Carey, Mrs. W. R. Cluness Jr., Mrs. A. S. Baldwin, Mrs. J. A. Black, Mrs. R. I. Bentley, Mrs. Charles Bonte, Mrs. Charles Deering, Mrs. W. D. Fennimore, Mrs. Harry Gray, Mrs. Adolph Gartenlaub, Mrs. Howard Holmes, Mrs. H. J. Morton, Mrs. Leroy Nickel, Mrs. Charles Slack, Mrs. Frank Somers, Mrs. William Shotwell, Mrs. Bush Finnell, Mrs. William Lennon and Mrs. Charles Halley. The prizes were exquisite vases, fashioned in a design of silver and gold.

A number of society people from all parts of the State have been spending the past week at the St. Francis, most of them having come to see the extravaganza. Buckley Wells, the dashing polo player, is here from Colorado; Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Foster came over from Fairhills at San Rafael; Mr. and Mrs. Earl Rogers came up from Los Angeles; and Vicomte and Vicomtesse de Tristan came over from San Mateo to entertain their friend Count de la Londe of Paris, who is a guest of the St. Francis. Many courtesies have been offered to the Count, a particularly pleasant affair being a theatre party and supper at the hotel, at which the de Tristans were hosts to a dozen friends.

Among recent arrivals at the St. Francis who have been warmly greeted by society are Colonel C. E. Maud and Mrs. Maud, who with Mr. G. C. La Montagne, have just returned from the East; and Captain and Mrs. Charles G. Lyman and their son who have taken permanent quarters in this hotel.

The members of the Entre Nous Cotillon Club will give an elaborate Mardi Gras Ball and Cotillon to be followed by a supper on Tuesday evening at the Palace Hotel.

One of the largest, as well as prettiest bridge parties and teas, of the many recently given at the Palace, was that of Mrs. R. S. Browne. Mrs. Browne received her four score guests in a luxurious parlor suite on the second floor of the hotel where tables for bridge were arranged. Prizes were given for each table and among them were large handsome French plate mirrors. After the play the party went down to the great court where tea was served.

Mrs. Arthur Lewin will give an affair at her suite in the Santa Barbara apartments on February 19 in honor of Miss Bertha Kramer, whose engagement has just been announced.

Mrs. John P. Young was hostess at a handsomely appointed bridge-tea at the St. Francis on Wednesday afternoon at which she entertained over one hundred guests. The Red Room and adjoining reception rooms were artistically decorated and the tea tables at which the card games were prettily arranged and carried numerous original conceits of the decorator's art. Handsome prizes were awarded the winners, and some of the most elaborate gowns seen at any affair this winter were donned for the occasion. Mrs. Young is a charming hostess and the affair on Wednesday was conceded to be one of the most enjoyable of the season.

The marriage of Miss Sevilla Hayden of Oakland to Mr. Clarence Shuey is set for April. It will be a large and brilliant affair as both the Hayden and Shuey families are among the oldest and most prominent in Oakland. Mr. Shuey is building a handsome home in the Claremont district.

Mrs. J. F. Sullivan and her daughter Miss Helen recently made Mrs. Edward Eberle the guest of honor at a daintily appointed luncheon at their home in Pacific ave. Mrs. Eberle is the wife of Captain Edward Eberle, U. S. N.

Mrs. F. W. Morris entertained at a dinner party of twelve in honor of Mr. A. Sutcliff of Manila at the Hotel Victoria recently.

Mr. Edward Hamilton, Frank Unger and C. J. Foster spent the week-end at Ross Valley as the guests of Mr. Foster at his handsome country home, The Hacienda.

Among the bridge parties of the week were those given by the Misses Helen and Bessie Ashton on Thursday and Mrs. C. J. Stoval and Miss Adele Martel on Friday.

Mrs. Carter and a Tinctcure of Peple

By Edward F. O'Day

I am awfully sorry for Edward Peple but I haven't the suspicion of a tear for Vasta Herne. Peple, it strikes me, must be totally unaware of his descent into the slough of bathos and therefore Peple is a legitimate object of commiseration. But Vasta Herne is so tremendously sorry for herself that the sympathy of a mere stranger like me would be an unwarrantable intrusion. Vasta Herne can take care of herself in the sorrowing line, there is no doubt about that. Through four acts, four long wordy feverish acts, she heaps herself with pity, shedding oceans of tears over her own unhappiness; beating tattoos upon her ample breast over the unkindness of fate, shrieking metaphors and similes, to say nothing of hyperboles, against the contriver of her destruction. A woman who can do that would scorn my little tribute of condolence, so I am not going to offer it. I am going to save it for Edward Peple. Remembering the many-wise delightful "Prince Chap," I am convinced that he needs it. If you don't believe me, consider the circumstances in which he makes us acquainted with Vasta Herne. This lady is of sumptuous proportions. She is distinguished by her carmine coiffure, her pectoral embonpoint and her clinging draperies. Almost as flamboyant as these physical characteristics (which are contributed by Mrs. Leslie Carter and not by the author), are her mental qualities. You see, the poor lady has been ruined—"destroyed" is the term she prefers—by a publisher. Now there are possibilities of villainy in publishers which authors with desks full of rejected masterpieces have never fathomed. Vasta Herne had the misfortune to meet the greatest villain of them all. Mark you, this publisher not only "destroyed" her, but he also encouraged her to write and when he discovered that she wrote best-sellers only when stupefied with laudanum, he encouraged her to take laudanum. One wonders how many best-selling authors have publishers of this horrid sort. At this point it is cheering to note for the comfort of poor human nature that having been "destroyed" by her publisher, Vasta recovered from her destruction and when the drama opens she is a very respectable person indeed, living in luxurious apartments with plenty of servants, entertaining people of social standing with champagne suppers, listening to their praise of her latest book and—when they have departed—getting herself jagged on laudanum. There is a peculiar thing about this latter process. Vasta has a Buddha in her writing room and although it surprises the audience, it does not in the least excite the wonder of her guests to see her make passes at the god and hurl long interrogative sentences at his stolid head. But this is explained when she is alone. The laudanum bottle is concealed beneath his capacious stomach. But even then another surprise is in store for the audience; for when Vasta begins to see things, as the result of two stiff slugs of laudanum, and when she takes her lily-white quill in hand to write a novel out of what she sees, Budda gives her the ha-ha. It is a most extraordinary thing for a Buddha to do and its effect on Vasta is extraordinary. She shrieks out that she will conquer Buddha who is not in the least aggressive, and cries out that she is willing to pay the pound of flesh for her indulgence. Vasta, as played by Mrs. Carter, could easily spare more than one pound. As it turns out, Vasta does not conquer Buddha, meaning the laudanum habit. Having taken one last dose to write that novel on, she finds that she is a slave to the habit, that she craves it, not for her books but for herself—a hairline distinction. The villainous publisher is not sorry, for he has made up his mind that if Vasta sticks to the laudanum and the novel-writing, he will get her back into his power and have a chance to "destroy" her again. But he reckons without the virtuous physician who loved Vasta before she wrote novels and—mirror of chivalry that he is—still loves her in spite of the novels. While the publisher is trying to "destroy" Vasta, the virtuous physician is trying to make her his wife and, when he discovers that she is addicted to laudanum jags, is trying to cure her. It is a charming duello but it comes to an end in the third act when the publisher tells the physician that he has "destroyed" Vasta. The physician, being a virtuous physician, promptly quits, whereupon the publisher makes mean insinuations about the relations of the physician and Vasta and gets a slap in the face which makes him quit too. That slap in the face is the end of the third act and the climax of the play. It would have been a stronger climax if Vasta had slapped him harder; it would have been an overwhelming climax if she had put him down for the count. I am sure Mrs. Carter could do it if Edward Peple were exigent about it. She is the huskiest victim of laudanum I have ever seen. But that is neither here nor there. The point is that Vasta goes back to the luxurious apartments to be very ill and to conquer the laudanum habit. It seems that she does overcome the habit but her conquest makes little difference in her behavior, except that she neglects the lily-white quill. In other respects she is just the same old Vasta, making passes at Buddha from a very handsome peignoir and seeing sights that would rouse the envy of the most practiced dipsomaniac. The virtuous physician returns, kneels on the trailing edge of the peignoir and begs forgiveness. For a sign of her beatific long-suffering Vasta tucks his head under her arm for all the world like a fullback on the first down, and proceeds to see a pretty vision of an imp of the Gunga marshes who slew his wife when she was eleven years old. At this point Buddha should have given her the ha-ha, it seems to me; but he didn't and Vasta rose up, yelled for lights and passed on to a world where the laudanum that jags and the publisher who "destroys" are equally innocuous. If I have not made it plain why I am sorry for Edward Peple it would be impossible to elucidate my attitude by further explanation. As a sermon on the evils of laudanum his play is a crass failure; it is rather calculated to drive one to drink, if not to the seductive tincture which Vasta tippled. As anything else than a sermon it is impossible; as a serious drama for serious people or as a diverting drama for tired people, it is unthinkable. The only class which I can conceive as enjoying it is that which has been starved since Morosco's burned. The Central never presented anything like it. Of Mrs. Carter it is not necessary to say much. I am convinced that she luxuriates in the possibilities of the impossible Vasta; that she sees beauty in the lines on lines of rigmarole which she hurls between the eves of her audience; that all her dramatic intensity throbs to the undramatic situations with which the play abounds. This is to say that Mrs. Carter mistakes rhetoric for vital language and that she knows no difference between artificiality and nature. Is it saying too much? Perhaps I should be sorry for Mrs. Carter instead of for Edward Peple, but Mrs. Carter has never made any appeal to my sensibilities. I will say this much, however grudgingly: it is too bad she has exchanged Belasco for Peple; Belasco never made her ridiculous.

Mantell's Amazing Repertoire

Robert Mantell comes to the Columbia next week with a dramatic festival which promises to outshine any three weeks of drama known to this city. His engagement opens Monday night, February 7 and in the course of three weeks he will undertake the presentation of fourteen great plays, each of which will receive the most perfect production possible. Assisting Mantell will appear a group of players well known through their splendid efforts in the interpretation of classic roles. including Miss Marie Booth Russell, Fritz Laiber, Alfred Hastings, Guy Lindsley, Henry Fearing, George Stillwell, Casson Ferguson, Edward Lewers, Miss Genevieve Reynolds, Agnes Scott and Doris Kelly. The first week of the engagement will be made notable by a repertoire of seven plays. The opening bill on Monday night is to be Casimer Delevigne's historical romance "Louis XI." This drama has not been presented here in a number of years and from all accounts has become one of the greatest productions in the Mantell repertoire. "Macbeth" is announced for Tuesday night with Mantell as Macbeth and Miss Russell as Lady Macbeth. The matinee on Wednesday will be "Romeo and Juliet" and Wednesday night "Hamlet" will be staged. The bill for Thursday and Saturday nights is "King Lear," the greatest of all Mantell's efforts during his former engagement here. On Friday night "Othello" will be played and "The Merchant of Venice" is announced for Saturday matinee. Special prices are to prevail at the three Wednesday matinees to be given during the Mantell engagement.

BLANCHE WALSH

Who appears at the Van Ness Theatre in "The Test" next week.

Blanche Walsh at the Van Ness

Miss Blanche Walsh who will open a fortnight's engagement at the Van Ness Theatre on Monday evening, has found in "The Test," we are told, one of the most powerful dramas ever written for the American stage. It is claimed that the author, Jules Eckert Goodman, has not only treated conditions of today in a forceful, intelligent and highly interesting manner, but has woven into four acts of heart interest and action, a phase of modern life which appeals to men, women and children in every walk. The play is said to deal with sociological conditions that are the topic of the world today, and to run the gamut of human emotions. The claim is made for the author that he has gone into the very soul of men and women, their passions and their emotions, and has drawn a picture which stands out in splendor, as one of vital and gripping importance. If all this be true, we are about to enjoy an epochmaking drama. The scenes are laid in the east side of New York. Miss Walsh declares her part to be the greatest of her career as an emotional actress. She is supported by a large and capable company headed by Geo. W. Howard. for years Mary Mannering's leading man. Others in the company are C. Jay Williams, Katherine Bent, Nicholas Judels, Harriet Sterling, George Manning, Maurice George, Thomas Shakelford and William Travers. Matinees during the Walsh engagement will be given on Saturdays.

Carreno's Last Concert

For her farewell concert at the Garrick Theatre this Sunday afternoon Mme. Teresa Carreno will offer a program of exceptional interest. For the first time in many years a visiting star will be heard in ensemble work, for Carreno is to play the beautiful "Quintette," Op. 44 for piano and string by Robert Schumann, with the assistance of our own "Lyric Quartette" of native daughters. This work is one of the most beautiful compositions of the great romanticist and the piano part is as effective as that of a "Concerto." Bach's "Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue," Beethoven's seldom heard "Sonata," Op. 109, a group of three Chopin numbers including the "Fantasie Polonaise," Op. 61, "Nocturne," Op. 15 and "Waltz," Op. 42 and three of MacDowell's gems, "Barcarolle," "Witches Dance" and "Etude de Concert" complete the offering.

"Sis Hopkins" at the Savoy

A rural comedy in which there is nothing even suggesting caricature of the Posey type of people, is "Sis Hopkins" which will be the attraction at the Savoy Theatre for one week starting with the matinee next Sunday. Miss Rose Melville who first gave the quaint and lovable character of the Posey County girl to the stage, will again be seen in the title role. This is Miss Melville's eleventh year of continuous success. The play has been given an entirely new production this season and the company supporting Miss Melville is the best she has ever had. In the famous seminary scene there are many new specialties introduced, and Obidiah, the old undertaker's assistant, has written a new set of epitaphs for the characters of Posey County. There will be a popular priced matinee on Thursday and the last two performances will be given Saturday matinee and Saturday night. "The Virginian" will be the next attraction at the Savoy.

Florence Roberts at the Novelty

"The Transformation," the play in which Miss Florence Roberts will be seen on Tuesday evening, February 8, at the Novelty Theatre, has met everywhere with great success. Miss Roberts plays a dual role. The first act shows the interior of a poor cottage in the outskirts of Paris where live Colinette, a seamstress, and Philippe Norbet who has run through two fortunes, ruined a brilliant life, and finally found peace and love with this sweet and gentle seamstress. Even this is taken from him by the death of his beloved Colinette in a scene that reaches the depths of pathos. In the second act Philippe has become rich, is living under his right name and after two years in America, has returned to Paris to find in Elika Marescot, a notorious ballet dancer, the physical image of his lost love whose portrait he wishes to finish. The dancer's regeneration begins and during the hours while she sits as a model she learns that pure love is the greatest thing in the world. Philippe still clings to the memory of Colinette and in a scene that taxes Miss Roberts to the utmost, Elkia realizes that her own regeneration has not touched his heart. It is not until he is wounded in a duel and she nurses him through serious illness that he discovers a new kind of love. The staging is worthy of the play and the star and the second act, a supper scene at the salon of the grand opera buffet, is elaborate.

day morning. Manager Greenbaum has secured the refurnished Garrick Theatre, but for the farewell concert is holding Dreamland Rink in reserve. The dates of the Schumann-Heink concerts are Sunday afternoon, February 13, Thursday night, February 17 and Sunday afternoon, February 20. Complete programs for the first two concerts are to be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's and other prominent music stores. On Friday afternoon, February 18, Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse, presenting the great program for her opening concert in San Francisco. The St. Francis Musical Art Society will hear her on Tuesday night, February 11.

Venus at the Orpheum

"Seldoms' Venus" which will be the headline attraction at the Orpheum next week has proved a sensation in Europe and this country and is the most remarkable exhibition of "living marble" in the world. It is the central figure of a series of groups representing the greatest works in plastic art of which such masterpieces as "Samson Bound," "Reaching the Winning Post" and "The Fountain" form a conspicuous part. The Five Mowatts will introduce a club juggling act. Kate Watson, Gus Cohen and their company which includes three other comedians will present a one act pastoral called "The Hoosier Girl." In this sketch Miss Watson introduces a new character type which promises to be as popular as the "Sis Hopkins" of Rose Melville. Madame Panita, the European flute virtuosa, is gifted with a splendid technique. Her repertoire includes a concerto composed by the famous Tolu and an andanate from a concerto by Mozart, a number by Tellmertz, the suite by Godard, the sixth concerto and the Valse Caprice by Demerssemann. Next week will be the last of Gus Edwards' "Kountry Kids" and Arthur Whitelaw and Prato's Simian Cirque. It will also conclude the engagement of Julius Steger.

"The Man of the Hour" at the Alcazar

"The Man of the Hour," the play that treats of corrupt politics in an American city, will be given its initial presentation by a stock company next Monday evening in the Alcazar. Frederic Belasco secured it as soon as it was released for rent, after it had completed a year's run in New York and three subsequent seasons on tour, four different organizations having simultaneously played it in as many different sections of the country. He promises to give the full strength of the Alcazar company in the cast and several extra people have been engaged to portray character types for which they are exceptionally fitted. The staging will be both artistic and elaborate. John Ince is qualified for the role of the young mayor, and the two opposing aldermen, Horrigan and Phelan, will be well delineated by Will R. Walling and Burt Wesner. Evelyn Vaughan will be impressive as the heroine, and all the other characters are assured of good treatment.

Two Good Shows at the Macdonough

Marie Cahill in the sparkling musical comedy, "The Boys and Betty," will be seen at the Macdonough Theatre, Oakland, on February 7 and 8. Her success on this side of the bay will undoubtedly be repeated with Alameda county audiences. "The Virginian," a stirring play founded on Owen Wister's best-seller of the same title will be the succeeding offering at the Macdonough. It will be presented on the evenings of February 9, 10, 11 and 12 with a matinee on the last date. William L. Gibson will play the title role while Marshall Farnum, a brother of Dustin, will enact the part of Trampas. The other members of the cast are capable players and the staging will be of a high order.

MADAME PANITA
The famous European flute virtuosa who will appear this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum

Revival of "Mizpah" in Oakland

Next Monday evening the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will revive "Mizpah," the celebrated poetical drama by Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Luscombe Searelle. It will be recalled that this play was given its initial production by Manager Bishop at the Majestic Theatre in this city shortly before the fire, and the success it achieved then was remarkable in the history of coast theatricals. Its popularity was equally as great across the bay. Many people believe "Mizpah" to be the best of all the dramas that have their foundation on Holy Writ. Based on the history of Esther, the Jewish maiden who by force of her own virtues rose to the dignity of Persia's queen and the saviour of her people, its story is an interesting one and is unfolded in a most pleasing manner. An elaborate scenic and costume production is required for "Mizpah" which it is certain to receive at Ye Liberty, and as before, the incidental music written especially for the play by Luscombe Searelle will be an attractive feature of its presentation. The play will be given throughout the week after which comes "The Girl of the Golden West."

The Lombardi Grand Opera Company is to follow Robert Mantell at the Columbia Theatre.

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

FAIRCHILD'S, PARIS, SAYS:

In the last Paris letter stress was laid on the fact that one sees only plain cloth cuffs on the fur coats being worn here, while sable is now seldom used for the collars. On a recent Sunday there happened to be a more than usually large number of French society men and women in attendance on the races at Auteuil, on account of the presence of his majesty, the youthful king of Portugal, and President Fallieres.

From a point of vantage just in front and a little below the president's box an excellent view of its august occupants and their attendant suites was gained. One was immediately struck by the fact that King Manuel was wearing not only a sable collar to his coat, but also deep turn-back sable cuffs, and although the Portuguese monarch is not the same recognized leader of men's fashions as are King Edward of England or King Alphonso of Spain, nevertheless it was conceivable to imagine a mistake in identification. Such, however, was not the case, as, after a careful inspection of the smart crowd, both in the paddock and on the grand-stand, it was noted with satisfaction that not another sable fur-trimmed coat was to be seen on the race-course, while the following day fears were entirely set at rest by the manager of Messrs. Hill Brothers—from whom information on the subject was sought—with the reassuring statement that the firm had not made a single coat of this description during the present season.

Besides his sable overcoat, King Manuel had on a silk hat with a fairly flat brim and a deep black cloth band, dark gray striped trousers—presumably with a cutaway coat—a large white-ribbed silk Ascot tie, a somewhat high stand-up collar with a slight opening at the front, brown tan English driving gloves, and patent leather boots, over which he wore a pair of fawn-colored spats.

Of his suite the most striking personality was the dapper little Marquis de Soveral, Portuguese minister to Great Britain and a close friend of King Edward, in a fur-lined overcoat with a deep astrakhan collar and plain sleeves, very stylish silk hat, worn rakishly on one side, patent leather boots, with tan uppers and pearl buttons, a black satin four-in-hand tie, winged collar, white kid gloves (a favorite item among continental men when attending any function where royalty are present), and, of course, his characteristic gold-rimmed monocle.

As to the French president, who shares with the Duke of Norfolk the reputation of being the worst-dressed man of note in Europe, it is unnecessary to mention the various details of his apparel. Of the Frenchmen present, Prince Murat and Le Duc d'Orleans were the most notable. The former, a great sportsman and equally prominent figure both on the race-course and in the hunting field, was dressed in typically English fashion, with top hat, plain, well-fitting black laced boots, and a well-made dark gray Chesterfield overcoat; while the latter, who is an uncle of King Manuel—being a brother of the Dowager Queen Amelia—wore a high hat, a tight-fitting gray frock overcoat, a very large cream four-in-hand tie, and those lemon-colored kid gloves which were once so popular among Frenchmen, but among fashionable men are happily now fast disappearing.

It has been mentioned that the young Portuguese sovereign wore spats, which articles are also frequently favored by the Prince of Wales. This is a mode one could have wished had permanently vanished from sight a decade back, but such does not appear to be the case, as recently quite a number of well-dressed men have been seen wearing them, while they are displayed in the windows of all the best bootmakers. This resurrection of a useless and ungainly item of male attire will doubtless have but a passing vogue, as the patent leather boot with gray, fawn or tan upper and mother-of-pearl buttons is far smarter and much less cumbersome.

An article which is having a tremendous sale over here at the present time, and which is unquestionably very useful, is the knitted wool or silk muffler. Now that a particularly sharp spell of wintry weather is being experienced, almost everybody is wearing one. They are made in all colors and combinations of colors, though plain white is the most popular with the better classes, who only use the colored variety for motoring or driving. These mufflers are about a yard long and five to twelve inches wide, with a fringe at the ends, and vary in thickness according to the weight of the material of which they are made and the closeness of the texture, which is usually rather loosely woven, like the once so fashionable knitted tie.

Several of the shop windows recently show some particularly nice dressing gowns and smoking coats. They are expensive articles, being made of the best quality silk in a variety of colors of the darker shades and usually with an elaborate pattern, often of floral design. These goods, it is said, are having a very bi~ sale, and this can readily be imagined, as a really smart-looking and comfortable dressing gown is one of the most useful items in a dressy man's wardrobe, especially if he be a bachelor. Most of those seen have had quilted silk collar and cuffs of lighter color than the rest of the garment, while a piping of twisted silk cord, the color in keeping with the remainder, runs around the edge of the sleeves, collar, pockets and front. In the case of the dressing gown a silk rope is worn round the waist, while in the smoking jacket, hussar fastenings, usually four or five in number, are used in place of buttons.

"As a matter of fact, when I made this decision, it was less for the purpose of obliging Postic than in the hope of finding some clue to this tragic event. The sea establishes a sort of intimacy between those who dwell in its frightful realm. Lighthouse keepers are like children, and in the affection we bear them, there is something more than the interest of the superior in his subordinate. The death of Quere and Talabardon had affected me as a personal misfortune. I suspected a crime and was not disposed to let the criminal escape. But how could it have happened? All at once I thought of the keeper's journal, in which are entered hour by hour the slightest incidents that occur during the night watches. If the key of the mystery was to be found at all, it was in that journal. I hurried into the keeper's chamber: the journal was upon the table. I opened it with a fluttering heart. My signature on page thirty-four gave me the date of my last visit. The pages immediately following contained only entries of no interest, the lighting of the lamp, temperatures and winds that prevailed. Then came a blank: eight pages, one after the other were torn out. Except for that, the record was intact."

"Evidently," said Archibald, "there had been a third person in the lighthouse."

"Someone," added I, "whose name had been entered in the journal and would have been the key to the mystery if it had remained there."

Lemale shook his head. "That was what I thought at first. A castaway, a fisherman or a smuggler might have been rescued by the keepers during that tempest, but how explain what drove them to kill each other?"

"Perhaps the unknown person carried a fortune. The keepers may have robbed him and then quarreled as to the division of their spoils."

"That theory also was considered," said the inspector, "but neither in the lighthouse, nor in its vicinity, nor in the pockets of Quere or Talabardon was found the least sum of money. Moreover," he added after a moment's pause, "a singular discovery which I made that night upon retiring demonstrated the absurdity of these theories. I was to sleep in the chamber of the lighthouse especially reserved for transient guests. Postic was busy changing the bed linen when I saw him open his eyes in astonishment.

"'Well, what is it, Postic?" I asked.

"'Oh, Monsieur l'Inspecteur,' said he in a faint voice. 'See —a hair!'

"'A hair?'

"'Yes, and so long, so fine and so yellow!'

"'Let me see it—so it is, a golden hair—a woman's hair!'

"'A woman's!' said Postic, shaking his head. 'Indeed, I wish it were, but no woman has hair like that!'

"'Then what do you think about it?'

"'Ah, Monsieur l'Inspecteur,' said Postic almost in a whisper as if afraid he might be overheard, 'is it not as clear as the water around the rock? Quere and Talabardon must have caught a mermaid and kept her imprisoned in this chamber. Then, as always happens, both men fell madly in love with her, and for her fair face they killed each other. That is the explanation.

"'You are a fool, Postic," said I severely. 'How can a sensible man believe all that nonsense about mermaids?'

"'But all the same, Monsieur l'Inspecteur, if this accursed hair belonged to a woman, she would still be here. We should at least have discovered her body. So you see it must have been a mermaid. Ah, a mermaid is quite a different thing! She is at home in the sea, and it did not take the fiend long to get back to it after she had disposed of her lovers.'"

"I have repeated all this conversation," continued the inspector, "to give you an idea of the strange mentality of some of the lighthouse keepers in the year of grace 1903, and to show you that no hypothesis, however crazy, however improbable, had been set aside by us or by the magistrates who continued the investigation. From this investigation, however, nothing clear resulted. For several days the lighthouse must have sheltered, besides Quere and Talabardon, a third person whose hair, found by Postic, showed clearly enough the sex. But it needed more than a hair to bring us out of that labyrinth. It was necessary to find a woman with hair like this, as long, as fine, as golden. But that woman, after three years' search, I have made up my mind, does not exist. There remains Postic's theory."

"The mermaid?" asked Maude, with that indescribable smile upon her thin lips, which harmonized disconcertingly with the cold, virgin clearness of her eyes, green as a sea-nymph's.

"Yes, the mermaid, the siren, as you please," answered Monsieur Lemale nervously.

"And have you renounced the mermaid theory?" asked Archibald in his turn.

"I have and I have not; every mermaid does not have a fish's tail; she sometimes wears a woman's petticoat."

"Monsieur Lemale is a Norman," I explained to Sir Archibald.

"I don't understand," said Archibald. "But have you still that extraordinary hair, Monsieur Lemale?"

"I am never without it," answered the inspector, springing the catch of a little antique silver locket he wore on his watch chain. "This is it."

It seemed to me that, for a moment, Mrs. Macleod's eyes lost a little of their serenity. A shadow dulled their calm brilliancy. As for Archibald, his hand no sooner lighted upon the inside of the locket, than he cried:

"It is exactly like Maude's: that's strange! Will you allow me to take the locket a moment? I should like to compare it more closely."

"Willingly," said Lemale, as he detached the trinket and gave it to Archibald.

As luck would have it, Mrs. Macleod, at this very moment, took it into her head to seize her husband's arm; and this movement, whether calculated or involuntary, (it is true that the boat was rolling heavily), caused Archibald to relax his hold and the locket dropped into the sea. There, five fathoms below the surface, it was safe from any attempt at recovery.

I looked at the superintendent; he had become extremely pale. The deep had swallowed up, before his eyes, the only piece of evidence against the instigator of the death of the two keepers. Maude, on the other hand had entirely recovered her composure, and there seemed a tone of defiance even in her excuses.

"Oh, what a pity! Such a pretty trinket! Archy, you must make that up to Monsieur Lemale. Really, my awkwardness was inexcusable!"

Captain Pasquion, an old sea-wolf, red and squat as Triton, from the bridge, apprised us of our approach to the sinister rock. Upright, gray, metallic, the tower of the lighthouse outlined itself against the horizon with the rigidity of one of those great mortuary candlesticks which are placed upon catafaques; its sight evoked in us only thoughts of murder and mourning.

"For myself," said Mrs. Macleod to Lemale, "this is how I should explain the affair. I do not believe in mermaids. I am too practical for that. I should say that a young, charming and perhaps coquettish woman—like myself, if you wish—was rescued from a wreck by your keepers whose life she shared for a whole week. Was it her fault, if those rough, uncouth men, who had never come in contact with any but ugly women, became infatuated with her—if the old one became violently jealous of the young one because she appeared to notice him with a little interest—if, one night, the two engaged in a savage and merciless struggle before her very eyes?—if both of them, at last, meet a tragic death? Do we not hear such stories every day? The woman remained in the lighthouse alone after the death of its keepers. At night she lit the lamps as she had seen her companions do. She did not wish any ships to perish through her fault. Fearlessly, she awaited the coming of the inspector and the inquest of the French magistrates. Nevertheless, she preferred not to be the point of interest in a sensational judicial drama. It always reflects upon one's reputation to be even a little splashed with mud; so, when an occasion presented itself for her quietly to leave the lighthouse, she eagerly seized it, first taking the precaution to tear out the leaves of the record that would betray her identity. It was a fisherman who saw and responded to her signal. She had plenty of money in her purse. This she promised him if he would keep silent and land her at a neighboring port from which she could arrange to return to her own country. The fisherman proved trustworthy, and the conditions of her return were as favorable as she could desire. And so you see, Monsieur Lemale, how I, without the intervention of the myths of the sea, arrive at a perfectly clear explanation of what you call the mystery of the Roches Douvres. Oh, that would be a good title for a novelist —'The Mystery of the Roches Douvres,' by Wells or by Conan Doyle. But you are not a novelist, Monsieur Lemale; you are a practical government engineer. Yours is a practical profession, Monsieur Lemale."

The inspector bowed his head without answering. Mrs. Macleod passed lightly to another topic of conversation and asked Archibald if the oysters and the sauterne we had brought from Lazardieux had been set to cool. A little later, when the others were descending to the small boat, I found Lemale in a lonely corner leaning against the larboard railing.

"Are you still thinking of the mermaid of the Roches Douvres?" I asked him with a smile.

He looked at me reproachfully.

"What now! are you angry with Mrs. Macleod?" I persisted. "That's not good manners! You were plagued by a hair; she has freed you from it."

"I was thinking," answered Monsieur Lemale with emphasis, "of that strange force that drives all criminals, mermaids or plain human beings, to come back and prowl around the place where they have spilled blood."

"Has he a mind of his own?"

"If he has it's in his wife's name."

Auto Notes

Driving a little Six Winton, George F. Young, Winton agent at Modesto, arrived in the city the latter part of last week. Mr. Young states that the roads are indescribable. His little Winton plowed through mud, sand and chuck-holes without the slightest mishap but he says that he would not advise any one making the trip in the present condition of the roads.

Charles A. Cooper whose home is in New York but who is spending the winter in Pasadena, took delivery of a Little Six Winton here recently. He left immediately for Pasadena in his new purchase. Although the roads are bad at this time of the year he does not anticipate any trouble in making the trip.

That a little "Hup", can walk up steep hills despite the fact that it is a small car, was shown at several severe demonstrations of hill-climbing this week. The way the little Hupmobile negotiated the steep grades astonished many, some of them owners of much larger cars.

The Howard Automobile Company have delivered to their Oakland agent, Mr. Carl Christenson, a 1910 Buick 40 Touring Car and a 1910 Buick White Streak. These cars will in turn be delivered by Mr. Christenson to their respective purchasers, both having been sold at the Oakland Automobile Show. The Buick exhibit at the Oakland show attracted a lot of attention, especially the racing car which was shown, as this Buick "40" was the only regular racing machine at the show.

With two carloads of Oaklands shipped the latter part of last week, according to advices from the factory, those who have had their order in for some time for this popular car, will soon receive their machine.

The number of new cars on the row this season has caused it to be invaded by several of the eastern factory officials, but none has displayed a more lively interest in the local automobile situation than F. A. Babcock Jr. of the Babcock Electric Carriage Co. of Buffalo. He is a recent arrival and is making his headquarters with the Pioneer Automobile Co., local distributors for the Babcock electric. Mr. Babcock has been visiting agencies all over this country and Canada this winter, and he expresses himself as highly pleased at finding himself in a city where there is no snow and ice. He is here particularly to study local conditions from the standpoint of the electric car maker, as there has been more or less of a prejudice against the electric automobile in this city which he is determined to dispel. In speaking of the electric business he said, "The electric business is booming in the southern part of the State and the experience of the users of electrics there ought to convince anyone of their practicability. Los Angeles has set the pace and it is now up to her northern neighbors to get into the game. The stock argument of those opposed to the use of electrics in this city is to point out the hills with the declaration that the electric cannot climb them with any degree of satisfaction. In answer to this I would point out that we have found the best markets for our cars in Kansas City, Seattle, Duluth and Cincinnati and every one knows that San Francisco has nothing on those cities in the way of hills. In all of these cities the electrics are giving the utmost satisfaction."

Harry Bogen has completed arrangements whereby the H. W. Bogen Company has secured the coast territory for the Empire and Black Crow cars. In Los Angeles he placed the Black Crow agency with Corsins and Bushnell, one of the best known auto firms of the southern metropolis. Cousins became known to the coast trade as sales manager for the Durocar. The Empire agency was placed with the Munn Auto Co.

The Howard Automobile Company report the delivery of 1910 Oldsmobile Specials to Charles H. Sawyer and J. T. Casper. Both of these gentlemen have been owners of Olds cars in the past, and they both bought their cars completely equipped. Mr. Casper, whose home is in Walla Walla, Wash., is taking his car to Los Angeles with him. He will tour around the southern part of the State for the next couple of months, and then intends to drive up the coast from Los Angeles through to Walla Walla.

In order to look over the northwest territory which he controls for the Empire and Black Crow cars, H. W. Bogen has left this city to attend the automobile show at Portland.

The term, "anti-skidding," is applied to a variety of automobile tires having a rough treading surface of rubber or other material, designed to resist the side slip which now and again has been known to result in an automobile driver suddenly finding himself facing squarely about, on some slippery street. One trouble encountered with the original development of anti-skidding tires having a treading surface of steel studs, or rivets, was to make that tire resilient enough not to be a drag on the power of the machine, or uncomfortable to ride upon. The Diamond Grip Tire is of the style mentioned but the manufacturers have succeeded in so incorporating the tread of steel and leather, as to overcome their tendency to materially reduce the tire's resilience.

With the first appearance in this city of aeroplanes has come the necessity for airship repair shops, the first one of which is established in the mechanical department of the Standard Motor Car Company. Ivan L. deJongh, manager of the Standard Motor Car Company, reports that owing to the thorough equipment of his repair department the company has already received a commission to make certain repairs on one of Paulhan's aeroplanes. "We had two experts at Tanforan," said deJongh, "to assist the mechanical corp of experts of Paulhan's and we will make arrangements to equip our repair shop to take care of any work necessary to aeroplaning." DeJongh also stated that he expected that aeroplanes would be made by automobile manufacturers and would be eventually sold for $1000. "The present fight between Wright and Curtiss will result in another Selden Patent Contest," said deJongh, "and it will be several years before the practicability of the heavier than air machines is proven."

Severe Tests Prove Its Superiority

Although a comparatively new product, Zerolene has been more severely tested under all conditions than many other lubricants, and, distinctly better than any of these, has triumphed in every test.

ZEROLENE

Auto Lubricating Oil

lubricated the winning Thomas car in the famous New York to Paris race, also the Protos and Zust cars which ran second and third. Zerolene proved its perfect lubricating and non-carbonizing qualities, and its zero-working ability in the most severe tests to which a lubricating oil has ever been put.

Zerolene is the only "all round" oil that serves all types of cylinders and bearings. There is only one kind of Zerolene, produced in only one place in the world. Put up in sealed cans with patent spout that cannot be refilled. Also in barrels for garage trade.

Letters

The Life of a Virginia Gentleman

Though the Biography of William Fitzhugh Gordon described as a Virginia gentleman of the old school, will most naturally appeal first to the Gordons and their numerous connections, it is not without interest to the general reader, if only for the demonstration of the persistence of good blood and the inclination of like to seek like. Born in 1787 and living until 1858, the subject of the biography, active in his participation in both state and national government, was associated intimately with the many statesmen of the early years of the republic. He knew Jefferson and Calhoun, Jackson, John Randolph of Roanoke, Henry Clay, John Marshall, Houston, Crockett and a host more, and the pen pictures of these worthies as described in letters home are extremely interesting. The doctrine of States Rights, the early discussion of the slavery question, the national banks, the establishment of the University of Virginia, were all new topics in his day, and it was William Fitzhugh Gordon who devised the Sub-treasury scheme. One gets curious side lights on customs and manners, when the head of the household is commissioned to buy bonnets for the adornment of wife and daughters, "unsight unseen," and when Shelley's lack of conventional morality is deemed a sufficient reason for banishing his poems, and Byron's Life of Moore was characterized as an amusing book but licentious and wicked in many passages, this not by a narrow and bigoted prude but by a man well versed in literature and accustomed to associate with his fellows in military camps and legislatures. There are some amusing and characteristic anecdotes incorporated in the biography which, being written by Armistead C. Gordon, Rector of the University of Virginia, and dedicated to Mason Gordon, a son of its subject, is naturally of a laudatory description. Published by the Neale Company.

"Race Adjustment"

Professor Kelly Miller ranks with Dr. Booker Washington and W. E. B. DuBois as one of the three distinguished negroes who are to be regarded as authorities on the condition of their race in the United States. His "Race Adjustment," therefore, calls for serious consideration as a candid study of facts by one who sees them from the inside and asks for a square deal for his people. Evidently he has none of the animosity which seems to pervade so much of the discussion of the race matter, and there is no question but that he is able to state his facts forcibly and clearly. We, on the Pacific Coast, know virtually nothing of this from our own experience for even our sporadic uprisings against Chinese and Japanese immigration are purely labor questions uncomplicated by other considerations, and we have been, for the most part, content to leave the settlement of the problem in the hands of the southerners who have it to deal with. Naturally Mr. Miller takes issue with Thomas Dixon, but, for the matter of that, so do the Southern whites and the conservatives on all hands who see nothing to be gained by stirring the members into a fierce flame. It is a little singular that all these writers, white and colored, make such a point of the fact that slaves were not schooled in book knowledge. It is, of course, indisputable that it was regarded as against public policy to educate them, but they were no worse off than the Irish who, under the penal laws of Great Britain, were virtually forbidden to educate their children, to practice their religion or to own property above a nominal value. Much is made of the miserable accommodations of the post-bellum negro schools, lacking in all the essentials save pupils, teachers and a roof, but such deprivations excite only the laughter of the Pacific Coast rural teacher of the last generation, whose summer school house was often only a bush shed and whose winter "academy" was constructed on the lines of a refugee shack minus the coat of green paint, while each parent furnished the seating accommodations for his own brood. Privileges are valued in proportion to the difficulty of enjoying them, and the "old field" schools of the south and the six-weeks-in-winter of New England turned out better scholars than our palatially equipped schools of today, for the older generation at least gathered a respect for learning and were well grounded in the elements. Lincoln studied by the light of a pine knot and "cyphered" on the back of a wooden shovel. Henry Clay set his book up before him and snatched a sentence when his work brought him within eyeshot, but the pampered youths of the twentieth century spend their time in organizing strikes and conducting mass meetings whenever there is an attempt to divert enough time from their activities to give a little of it to study. The country farmer still harnesses his team on Sunday morning and takes his family to "meetin'" but his city brother, with a church around the corner, cannot spare the time from his newspaper, and the probabilities are that if negroes had been schooled from that distant day four hundred years ago when they were first landed in America up to the present, they would not have been further advanced relatively, while they would be deprived of their plea of lack of chance. The plain truth is that above a certain point the mass of the people irrespective of color are ineducable and it is a waste of time and effort to attempt the impossible. Much sport as is made of the bombastic misuse of language by the negro preacher and politician, he is not so far behind his white brother. It is a little singular that no negro of the pure black blood has ever risen to eminence, and it is likewise noteworthy that when the theorist comes to put his theories into actual practice he usually abandons the field. Apparently the negro of the philanthropic stranger, the average child of the professional educator and the general horse of the book-farmer are three of a kind and all come under the same classification as that made by Mark Twain in speaking of Cooper's Indians, "an extinct race that never existed." If all those who take part in the debate of the race problem were as temperate and judicial as Professor Miller there would be more light cast upon the question and less heat generated. The solution of it is yet a long way in the future. Neale Publishing Company.

NOTICE OF GUARDIAN'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE AT PRIVATE SALE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 8722, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate and Guardianship of PETREA RASMUSSEN, an Incompetent Person.

Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of an order of said Superior Court duly made on the 3rd day of January, A. In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 19,392, Dept. No. 4.

ANTONIO DEVOTO, Plaintiff,
vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANTONIO DEVOTO, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PIECE NO. 1

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Westerly line of Powell Street with the Southerly line of Green Street and running thence Westerly along the said Southerly line of Green Street sixty-eight (68) feet; thence at right angles Southerly and parallel with Powell Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and thence at right angles Easterly sixty-eight (68) feet to the Westerly line of Powell Street; and thence at right angles Northerly and along the said Westerly line of Powell Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine inches (9) to the point of beginning. Being a part of Fifty (50) Vara Block No. 156.

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Northerly line of Francisco Street with the Easterly line of Stockton Street, and running thence Northerly and along said Easterly line of Stockton Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; thence at right angles Easterly forty-one (41) feet and eight (8) inches; thence at right angles Southerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches to the Northerly line of Francisco Street; and thence at right angles Westerly forty-one (41) feet and eight (8) inches to the Easterly line of Stockton Street and point of commencement. Being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot No. 1515.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 9th day of December, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 4965, Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, Deceased.

Mary A. Barry, the administratrix of the estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, deceased, having filed herein her petition, duly verified by affidavit, praying for an order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her, as such administratrix, to mortgage the real property of said deceased therein and hereinafter described, for the purpose set forth in said petition; and it appearing that it will be of advantage to said estate that said mortgage be made;

It is here ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, deceased, do appear before this Court on the 28th day of February, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the real property of said estate, hereinafter described, should not be mortgaged for the sum of four thousand and five hundred ($4,500) dollars, as prayed for in the petition of Mary A. Barry, the said administratrix, this day filed, or for such lesser amount as to the Court may seem meet. Reference is made to said petition for further particulars. Said real property, the property to be mortgaged, is situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and is more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Parcel "A"—Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Eighteenth street with the easterly line of Noe street, running thence easterly along the southerly line of Eighteenth street thirty (30) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.); thence at right angles westerly thirty (30) feet to the easterly line of Noe street, and thence at right angles northerly along the last mentioned line one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) to the southeasterly corner of Eighteenth and Noe streets and the place of beginning; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

Parcel "B"—Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Eighteenth street, thirty feet distant thereon easterly from the easterly line of Noe street, thence along said southerly line of Eighteenth street easterly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.); thence at right angles westerly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles northerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

Parcel "C"—Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Noe street, distant thereon one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) southerly from the southerly line of Eighteenth street and running thence southerly along said line of Noe street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles easterly one hundred and five (105) feet; thence at right angles northerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles westerly one hundred and five (105) feet to the easterly line of Noe street and point of commencement; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

It is further ordered, that this order to show cause be published once a week for four successive weeks before the day of hearing in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation, published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated, this 21st day of January, 1910.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Filed in the office of the County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, January 21, 1910.

British Schoolboy "Howlers"

The University Correspondent, London, recently got up a competition for schoolboys. Some of the "howlers" found in their disquisitions have already come to print, but not all of them. Here is a choice selection:

Women's suffrage is the state of suffering to which they were born.

Lord Raleigh was the first man to see the Invisible Armada.

Shakespeare founded "As You Like It" on a book previously written by Sir Oliver Lodge.

Tennyson wrote "In Memorandum."

King Edward IV had no claim by geological right to the English throne.

Henry I died of eating palfreys.

Louis XVI was gelatined during the French Revolution.

The Rhine is boarded by wooden mountains.

An angle is a triangle with only two sides.

Algebraical symbols are used when you don't know what you are talking about.

Geometry teaches us how to bisex angels.

Parallel lines are the same distance all the way, and do not meet unless you bend them.

The whale is an amphibious animal because it lives on land and dies in the water.

A parallelogram is a figure made of four parallel straight lines.

Horsepower is the distance one horse can carry a pound of water in an hour.

The press today is the mouth-organ of the people.

A vacuum is a large empty space where the pope lies.

Martin Harvey invented the circulation of the blood.

A deacon is the lowest kind of Christian.

The isles of Greece were always quarrelling as to which was the birthplace of Homer: Chaos has the most right to claim him.

A Lover's Envy

I envy every flower that blows
Along the meadow where she goes,
And every bird that sings to her,
And every breeze that brings to her
The fragrance of the rose.

I envy every poet's rhyme
That moves her heart at eventime,
And every tree that wears for her
Its brightest bloom, and bears for her
The fruitage of its prime.

I envy every Southern night
That paves her path with moonbeams white,
And silvers all the leaves for her,
And in their shadow weaves for her
A dream of dear delight.

I envy none whose love requires
Of her a gift, a task that tires;
I only long to live to her,
I only ask to give to her
All that her heart desires.

You look tired out, old man.
I should say so! My wife has just given birth to twins.

Swinburne and Joaquin Miller

"Joaquin Miller was an American of whom I saw much in London. He tells this characteristic story of Swinburne. Swinburne was very susceptible to boredom, it seems, and suffered a good deal of it at the hands of inquisitive strangers who intrduded upon him out of mere idle curiosity, and took up a good deal of his time, giving nothing in return. One of this kind of bores, an American and friend of Miller, was anxious to be taken to Swinburne's house. Miller was under obligation to Mr. Lion-hunter and did not like to refuse him. He knew Swinburne's peculiarities and dreaded the result; still he went and sent his card to Mr. Swinburne—'Joaquin Miller and Friend.' After a little delay the maid-servant returned, but in such evident confusion that Miller knew at once matters were not smooth up-stairs, and that she had a message she did not like to deliver. This, with some persuasion he got out of her, and it was to the effect that Mr. Swinburne would be very glad to see Mr. Miller, but his 'friend' might go to hell!"—Laurence Hutton.

Victor Hugo on Immortality

One day Schoelcher, an old friend of Victor Hugo, who did not believe in a future life, expressed this opinion rather forcibly. Victor Hugo was not slow to retort: "You are right, Schoelcher," he said; "everyone is not immortal. One day Dante, having written two verses on a sheet of paper, went out for a little walk. Then the first verse said to the second: 'It is very nice to be a verse of Dante, for we are immortal.' The second verse in return replied: 'It is not at all sure; do you really believe we are both immortal? Whereupon Dante returned, re-read his two verses, found the second worthless, and erased it!"

How on earth does Scribbler grind out so much verse?
With the wheels in his head probably.

H-O The Nation's Breakfast

The great American Nation is representative of every country on the globe; consequently there is a variety of tastes and preferences; but everywhere you will find that the universal breakfast dish is Oatmeal porridge.

But when you ask for oatmeal—be sure to specify "H-O"—the only steamed-cooked oatmeal.

Breakfast is the prelude to the day, and you want a food—appetizing, tempting and nourishing—to put you on your mettle to cope with the strenuous emergencies. H-O oatmeal supplies muscle-making and brain-building material. It is a concentrated oat product, complete in nutriment.

If your health is below par and your digestion faulty, eat H-O oatmeal and increase your health dividends.

A dainty dish for the breakfast table!

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the Oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling, and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats."

Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

A Banker and a Prophet

The central bank scheme which has Senator Aldrich for its chief sponsor, and which is to have the United States Government for a backer, does not meet with the approval of our most worthy citizen, the Hon. James D. Phelan. He has said so in a public address, giving reasons, which, unfortunately, are altogether in the nature of conclusions and therefore somewhat unsatisfactory. "The central bank," he says, "would be a menace to the independence of our banks"; it would "tend to damage the commerce of the States"; it would "create fictitious prices"; it would "seriously interrupt the ordinary course of business," et cetera. How Mr. Phelan knows these things he does not condescend to disclose. His sagacity is of course profound, he has a great mastery over the abstractions of political economy, to him the "commerce of imperceptibles" is an open book, as an authority on finance he makes Ricardo, James Mill and Adam Smith look like pawnbrokers; but unfortunately he has lost the Socratic gift of instantaneously exciting and impressing the minds of the common herd. Doubtless he is able to perceive all the evil consequences that he has pictured with the air of a prophet, but we fear that he will not be taken seriously in Washington. There is a well authenticated tradition that Mr. Phelan is the enemy of every dollar that isn't his own, and it may have reached the ears of Eastern financiers who are inclined to favor the central bank scheme on the theory that it will make panics impossible. Moreover Mr. Phelan's warning may be discounted by the report, which tends to confirm the tradition, that he is in favor of all other kinds of government control. The circumstance that he is himself a banker may cause his opposition to the central bank scheme to be regarded as significant of an inspiration wholly selfish, particularly in view of the fact that he is one of the principal stockholders of the First National Bank which enjoys a monopoly of federal government business in this city and which may lose this business in the event of the central bank scheme going through. We believe that it is only Mr. Phelan's intimate friend (if any there be) who know that his views as a publicist are never inspired with self interest.

The President and the Press

President Taft has been treading on the toes of the magazine publishers. All publications, legitimate in character, intended to give news, instruction or pleasure are permitted to go through the mails at one cent a pound. As it costs about nine cents to carry this class of matter the President is in favor of raising the tariff with a view to reducing the deficit in the postal department. Consequently the publishers are up in arms. They have organized opposition at Washington, and they have all joined hands in a propaganda against the projected reform. The staple of their argument is that the deficit in the postoffice is due in a large measure to the exorbitant prices paid to the railroad companies and the abuse of the franking privilege by public officials. Of the truth of this there is no question. This is a matter that should engage President Taft's attention, and probably it will now that he realizes that the postoffice should be conducted on business principles; but because the railroads are favored at public expense it does not follow that magazine publishers should be similarly pampered. Nor should the President be abused for calling attention to the low rate at which second-class mail matter is carried and demanding that the rate be raised. On the contrary, he should be applauded. In this matter he has exhibited exceptional courage. Seeing what he conceives to be his duty, he has dared greatly in defiance of the despotism of the press. Yet there is nothing of spectacularity in President Taft's attitude toward the tyrannical leaders of public opinion; it is not characterized by any of the vulgar heroics that formerly were symbolized by the shrewdly flaunted big stick, but it bespeaks the true courage that "scorns to vent her progress in a storm of words," the intrepidity that has for her citadel a serene, firm and dauntless mind. Napoleon once said that four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than a thousand bayonets; yet Napoleon was a despot with a despot's power, whereas President Taft is only the servant of a people whose judgment is formed by a free press which he has dared to offend.

Ingenious Journalism

The Examiner assists us to a conception of what President Taft incurred when he advised an increase in the second-class postal rates. In that typical American journal in its issue of Friday of last week was printed an editorial on the subject of mail contracts, from which we excerpt this insidiously worded paragraph:

> So he (Taft) says that the magazines—those that hire the muck-rakers that sometimes venture to criticise Ballinger and others—must pay more.

This is a specimen of what the virtuous publishers who deem their publications "legitimate in character," who protest pharisaically against the awful crime of poisoning the public mind, call artistic invention. It is a sample of the ingenious journalism that makes a hostile newspaper the dread of soldiers and statesmen. Verily the envenomed, unscrupulous pen is mightier than a thousand bayonets! Ever since President Taft advised the raising of postal rates the hostile press has been drawing liberally on the resources of its fertile inventive faculty for subtle imputations calculated to place him in an unfavorable light before the people. Industriously the insinuation has been propagated that his motive was to harass especially the magazines that encourage the insurgents and abuse his Administration. But far be it from Mr. Hearst to confine himself to insinuations when engaged in his favorite style of warfare. That upright patriot scorns half-way measures of reprisal. When on one of his missions of character assassination, no dainty rapier for him, but always the trusty and brutal bludgeon. How puerile to attribute motives by insinuation! How much more effective to fabricate incriminating language and insert it between the victim's jaws! If Napoleon had known the proprietor of the Examiner he would have said that one hostile newspaper edited by a Hearst was more to be feared than a million bayonets.

Substitutes for Catalogues

Let us consider whether the publications that have organized to defeat the will of President Taft are, as their proprietors claim, "legitimate in character." If we admit that in nothing in the nature of subterfuge can legitimacy be conceived then the majority of these publications are not what their owners affirm. This we say because the postal laws exclude from the privileges of second class mail matter all publications that have not a bona fide circulation. The catalogues of mercantile houses, for example, are not admitted as second class mail matter. The law contemplates that there shall be something more than a quiescent receiver of second class mail matter; that a publication shall actually be subscribed for, not that an advertising medium shall be carried at the the rate of one cent a pound for the benefit of advertisers and the enrichment of publishers. If the interests of publishers and advertisers were regarded as of paramount consideration, and it were possible to send a magazine through the mails as second class matter to persons who had not subscribed for it the country would soon be flooded with gratuitous publications. This is not a surmise. The postal authorities have dealt on more than once occasion with publishers who sought to achieve a fictitious circulation by forcing their wares on persons who had not subscribed for them. Now certainly there is not a great difference between a magazine that is sent free to non-subscribers and one that is sent to persons whose subscription has been purchased with a set of books. The circulation of none of the big eastern magazines is either proof of popular demand or evidence of merit. The revenue derived from circulation bears no approximate relation to the cost of circulation. The purpose of these magazines is not as Mr. Hearst, inspired by his interest in the Cosmopolitan, tells us in the columns of his Examiner, "to give news, instruction or good reading to the public." Their purpose is to establish a basis upon which to command an enormous advertising patronage. Incidentally they enable advertisers, who otherwise would have to solicit trade through the medium of catalogues, to evade the postal laws. They are distinctly advertising mediums. They are in the worst sense of the term commercial journals designed not to instruct or to edify the people but to coddle the mob by truckling to its ignorance and its prejudices. The only interest which they have in their readers is that which proceeds from their zeal for advertising patronage. Their policy, however, is subject only to criticism. The principle of a free press insures them the privilege of prostituting themselves in the manner which has given them distinction in an epoch of journalism of their own making, but they are not entitled to any subsidy from the government; they are not privileged to violate the spirit of the postal laws.

Rockefeller Asked to Foster Genius

Despite Mr. John D. Rockefeller's liberality and the multifarious objects of his philanthrophy he finds it hard to spend his money in ways that suit everybody. He is constantly receiving sage advice and shrewd suggestions from persons who though they have not had the patience or taken the trouble to accumulate as much superfluous coin as he has, have stored up much wisdom richer than Peruvian mines, which they dispense with that princely liberality characteristic of men who find it easier to be wise for others than for themselves. Mr. Rockefeller, it is said, always gives ear to these rivals of his in philanthropy, and he is reported to have under consideration at this moment the suggestion that he smooth the way for genius by establishing an institution in which youthful talents may be relieved of the burden of breadwinning pending development. He is advised that such an institution would increase the artistic production of this country. If this theory is sound then genius is not what men of genius have believed. It has always been supposed that one of the characteristics of genius is the power of lighting its own fire. Genius is essentially an aptitude to patience. It is developed by infinite painstaking, by unremitting labor and diligence, and it does not find its own road or carry its own lamp until from experience in frequent trials it acquires confidence in itself. An institution that would enable young men of talent to escape "necessity's sharp pinch," might be conducive to artistic production of a certain quality, but that the artificial stimulation of genius would be of benefit to mankind is a theory that is not borne out by the experience of the world. The greatest works of art are those in which there is the most profound depth of feeling, and capacity for expressing feeling is not to be developed artificially.

Dollar Diplomacy

The proposition recently made by the State Department regarding the Manchurian railroads discloses something more than the end toward which American policy in the Far East is directed. Secretary Knox's proposition was to make the Manchurian railway neutral by having China purchase it from Russia and Japan with money furnished by an international syndicate of bankers who would agree to operate it on a purely business basis and not for political or strategic purposes. From this proposition it may be inferred that diplomacy has linked arms with high finance. This is precisely what has happened. The United States has abandoned the old shirt-sleeve style of diplomacy that used to amaze the statesmen of Europe in the days agone when we had no thought of becoming a world power, when it was an article of our political faith that to keep out of foreign entanglements was one of the most sacred duties of the nation. We are now right in the midst of foreign entanglements; and as we have more money than we can find use for at home we are eager to assist in the development of foreign parts and to expand our trade in lands across the sea. So now the State Department is extending its paternal influence to Wall street for the greater glory of all of us. Revolutionary is the new policy, but logical nevertheless, and strictly on the lines of the diplomatic policy of Great Britain, France and Germany. And as it is customary for us to do everything on a big scale we may be expected to take the lead in dollar diplomacy, making Washington the centre of the world's international negotiations and New York the theatre of the world's finance. This, indeed, is exactly the consummation that has been resolved upon by American statesmen and American financiers. Behind the State Department is the American bank syndicate, of which John P. Morgan is the head, representing a capital of $758,000,000. It is this syndicate that has been chosen to co-operate with British capital in effecting the neutralization of railroads in Manchuria, to the end that Chinese political integrity be maintained along with equality of commercial opportunity. The plan originally proposed by Secretary Knox having been rejected by Russia and Japan, another scheme has been hit upon to thwart their monopolistic purposes. American and British capital supported diplomatically by the United States, under a franchise granted by China, will parallel the existing line that Russia and Japan decline to give up. This is not the only coup of dollar diplomacy. Secretary Knox has forced England, France and Germany to let Wall street in on a loan of $30,000,000 guaranteed by the Chinese Government for the building of a railway in the interior of China, and he has also had them agree to put Central and South American governmental finances under the supervision of the United State. European bondholders of Southern republics must do their financiering hereafter through New York. There are features of dollar diplomacy which doubtless will not meet with general approval, though it can hardly be gainsaid that dollar diplomacy is beneficial to the commercial interests of the whole country. Whether the benefits to be derived will be sufficient to offset popular objection to official recognition and aggrandizement of the money trust remains to be seen.

The Hammers

Hark to the merry hammers,
  List to the tune they play,
Nailing the joists and timbers
  On the new house over the way!
Beating the march of labor
  On planks of pine and oak,
Now with a gay glissando,
  Now with a measured stroke.

Hark to the busy hammers!
  Building for love and life,
Rearing the beams and rafters
  To shelter a fair young wife,
Laying the floors and stairways
  For little feet to roam;
For the tune of the cheery hammers
  Is the song of home, sweet home.

The Cost of High Living

A Rather Scolding Article on Extravagance in its Relation to the Current Agitation About High Prices, with a Suggestion or Two for the Benefit of Those Economically Disposed

By Robert McTavish

Prices are still going up and the spirits of the housekeeper are still going down. The daily struggle to make both ends meet without going hungry, seedy and cheerless continues in all parts of the country, although no section is suffering from what we usually call hard times. There are meat boycotts in many States; there are food syndicates in many others; there are complaints, protests, indignation meetings everywhere. Discussion of the high cost of living has become a habit and is conducted in newspapers and magazines, on lecture platforms and street corners with more interest and intensity than were ever given to the tariff or a presidential election. It is a manifestation without parallel in American history.

There have been many explanations of the hard conditions which obtain in the butchershop, the grocery store, the fruit stand and the poulterer's. Archbishop Ireland blames the American woman. Her extravagance, he says, has made it impossible for her husband to square his expenditures with his salary. There is some truth in this, undoubtedly. It would not be human nature for a woman to admit that it was the millinery bill and not the butcher bill which caused the deficit at the end of the month. She is pretty certain to feel that her dressmaker is reasonable while her groceryman is extortionate. But at the same time it is unfair to place all the blame upon the woman. Feminine extravagance would not proceed very far without the connivance of an indulgent husband or father. When a woman brings suit for divorce and swears that she cannot live on less than $50,000 a year, it is safe to say that her husband has let her have at least that much money for her expenditures. It is almost equally safe to say that he has used his generosity as a cloak for his own extravagance. What is true of the wealthy is also true to some extent of the family in moderate circumstances. Archbishop Ireland was correct but he told only part of the truth.

James J. Hill came much closer to the inwardness of the situation than his intimate friend Archbishop Ireland when he declared: "It is not the high cost of living, but the cost of high living which causes all the trouble." "Jim" Hill is our national Jeremias; through some defect of vision he finds it very difficult to see the silver lining of the cloud. But in his pessimistic preachments there is always a strain of hardheaded commonsense; and it looks as though he has tapped the nail squarely on the head this time. There can be no doubt that American life proceeds at a fast pace nowadays. The republican simplicity of the forefathers has become a tradition, theoretically admired but actually despised. Let anyone with a penchant for statistics ascertain how many automobiles are owned in San Francisco at the present time and then find out how much per month it takes to keep an automobile. It is safe to say that about half of those who are maintaining expensive machines in this city can really afford them. The others are exceeding their incomes; buying gasoline with the money which ought to be spent for meat. Yet there is no wail about the high cost of gasoline from our highfliers any more than there is indignation among the ladies about the high cost of bonnets. Men and women are doing without the necessaries of life in order that they may afford the luxuries. What the comparatively affluent man wastes on an automobile, his clerk spends on the theatres and cafes, on the teas and bridge parties given by his wife. Extravagance in a graduated scale runs through all degrees.

Of all the diverse causes of the high cost of living, the high price of meat has come in for most denunciation. Yet the high price of meat can be traced directly to extravagance, if we accept the authority of W. B. Kincaid who is one of the largest cattle raisers in Texas. According to Mr. Kincaid beef on the hoof is selling now for $45 to $60 per head, as against $25 to $30 five years ago. Mr. Kincaid gives as the reason for this big advance the present extravagant mode of life of the cowman as compared with the manner in which he was content to live not long ago. "Not many years ago," says Mr. Kincaid, "the cattleman lived on his ranch, ate his corn bread and beans and drank his black coffee. If he wanted something extra, biscuit and dried apples furnished it. Now we have all kinds of canned goods and all these newfangled things that are advertised. Another thing, we have moved to town to live, have our servants, our electric lights and telephones, our ices, and a lot of us have to have our autos and chauffeurs." Mr. Kincaid, in truly masculine fashion, refuses to let the women off. "Women folks used to be satisfied with good calico dresses and doing their own work, and the daughters helped. Now they all have to have their silks and satins, their plumes, and they have to have their servants and teachers for the children, and parties and receptions." All these things, it appears, have advanced the price of beef on the hoof. The inoffensive bovine takes on an artificial value in order to pay for an automobile and a cowman's wife's reception. It is very pleasant for the cowman, his wife and his children; but it is hard on the ultimate consumer. That unfortunate individual derives no consolation, as he whittles at a tough steak of exorbitant price, from the reflection that the cattleman is drinking champagne instead of black coffee and eating biscuit tortoni instead of dried apples.

But it may be objected that this extravagant cowman or that extravagant capitalist with the divorced wife who costs $50,000 a year is not the "average citizen." That is true, but in a lesser degree the same conditions hold true of the average citizen. Does the wife of the average citizen do her shopping in person nowadays? Very seldom. She shops over the telephone. The art of marketing is a lost art. It was not so long ago that the housekeeper, no matter how high her social position, no matter how large her husband's bank account, took a pride in doing her own marketing. She may have trudged on foot or she may have driven in her carriage, but every morning, bright and early, she made a tour of her provision dealers, pricing, examining, comparing, even haggling. She understood the way to order the best cuts of meat; she knew good fowl from poor; she had a critical eye for vegetables; she appraised fruits at a glance; and knew when the prices were exorbitant. At the proper time she laid in potatoes and flour and sugar, buying by the sack or barrel to save money. There was no complaint of the cost of living in those days. But now, how different it all is! The housekeeper, attired in kimono or house gown, sits at the telephone and orders her daily supplies. She may or she may not ask prices; it makes little difference. The probability is that she does not know what the bills are until the statement is brought at the end of the month. The chances to overcharge are many; the chances of detection almost none. Perhaps if the housekeeper would like to save money by buying a barrel of sugar or a sack of potatoes she lives in an apartment and has no place to store them.

Spartan simplicity seems to have gone, never to return to American life; but it is not too late for a recrudescence of commonsense attention to economy. Undoubtedly the current discussion of the high cost of living will awaken this slumbering virtue in many breasts and the ravening beast of extravagance will be beaten back toward his lair. If this happy event comes of the agitation under way at present, it will not be because man has convinced woman that she is living beyond her means or vice versa; it will be because man and woman will cheerfully acknowledge to each other their equal blame and will sincerely try to assist in the return to normal conditions. The time may come when men and women will economize in the matter of luxuries instead of in the matter of children. It will be a fine day for the country.

Rodin on Religion

An Inspiring Statement from the Great Master

By Paul Gsell

One morning, when I had gone to Meudon to see Rodin, I was told in the corridor that he was ill and was resting in his room. I had already started to withdraw, when a door opened at the head of the stairway and I heard the master call out to me, "Come up! I shall be delighted."

I could not help accepting the invitation, and I found Rodin in his dressing-gown, his hair rumpled, his feet in slippers, before a blazing wood fire.

"This," said he, "is the time of year when I beg leave to be sick. During all the rest of the time, I have so many engagements, so many duties, so many cares that I can harly get a moment to breathe."

As I listened, I observed leaning against the wall a great cross, to which was nailed a Christ, three-quarters life-size. It was a painted image, of noble beauty. "You admire my crucifix?" said Rodin. "Isn't it marvelous? Its realism recalls the one in the chapel del Santissimo Cristo at Burgos."

Seeing my host's devout feeling, it occurred to me to ask him if he were a man of religion. "That depends on what you mean by a religious man," he replied. "If you mean a man bound to certain practices, bowing down to certain dogmas, then I am not at all religious.

"But to my mind religion is something altogether different from mumbling a creed. It is a consciousness of the unexplained and the inexplicable, an adoration of the unknown force that maintains the various types of living creatures, a suspicion of a natural world beyond the reach of our senses, of the whole vast domain that neither the eyes of the body nor those of the mind are capable of seeing; it is the upleaping of our consciousness toward the infinite, toward eternity, toward limitless truth and love—promises that may be illusory, but nevertheless give wings to the soul in this life. In that sense I am religious."

Rodin gazed for a moment into the fire; then resumed: "If no religion existed I should have to invent one. True artists are the most religious of mortals. People fancy that we live by our senses, and that the world of appearance suffices us. They take us for children, intoxicated by flashing colors, amused by forms, as a child is amused by dolls. They don't understand us. Lines and shadows are to us only the signs of realities that lie hidden. Our minds plunge beneath the surface and into the soul of things, and then, when we reproduce contours, we enrich them with their spiritual content.

"The artist worthy the name must express the total truth of nature; not merely the truth of its exterior, but also and particularly that of its inner self. When a good sculptor models a human torso, it is not only the muscles that he represents, it is the life animating them —better than the life, the power that fashioned them and endowed them with grace or vigor or amorous charm or untamed fury.

"Michael Angelo made creative force thunder in living flesh. Luca della Robbia made it smile divinely. Thus every sculptor, according to his temperament, lends to nature a terrible or very gentle soul.

"The landscapist goes further, perhaps. Not only in living beings does he see the reflection of the universal soul; he sees it also in trees, in shrubs, in plains, in hills. What is only earth or forest to other men is to a great landscapist the face of an immense being. Corot saw goodness strewn far and wide over trees and meadows and lakes. Millet saw suffering there, and resignation. Everywhere the great artist hears mind answering his own mind. Where will you find a more religious man?

"Does not the sculptor perform an act of adoration when he perceives sublimity in the forms he studies; when, amid fleeting lines, he discerns the eternal type of each being; when he seems to see in the very bosom of divinity the unalterable models according to which all creatures are formed? Look, for instance, at the masterpieces of Egyptian sculpture, whether figures of men or of animals, and tell me if the accentuation of essential contours doesn't produce the effect of a sacred hymn. Every artist who has a gift for generalizing forms—that is to say, of getting at their meaning without blighting their living reality—calls forth the same religious emotion for he communicates to us the quiver he himself felt when within the grip of immortal truth.

"Mystery," he went on, "is the atmosphere that bathes the loveliest works of art. They express the total experience of genius when face to face with nature. They represent nature with all the clearness, all the magnificence that a human brain can discover. But inevitably they encounter the immense unknowable that envelops that little sphere, the known.

"Every masterpiece has this mysterious character. You always become a little dizzy as you gaze. An interrogation point floats over all Leonardo's pictures. Or take Giorgione's 'Concert Champetre.' It overflows with the joy of living; but to this is added a sort of melancholy intoxication. What is human joy? Whence does it come and whither go? The enigma of existence! Or again, take Millet's 'Les Glaneuses.' One of those women toiling miserably in the blaze of the sun looks up and scans the horizon. And we read the question, 'To what purpose?' Mystery hangs about that picture. What purpose has the law that chains human creatures to life only to make them suffer? What purpose has the eternal glimmer that makes them love life despite its anguish? An agonizing problem!

"And it is not only the masterpieces of Christian civilization that produce this mysterious impression. You have the same feeling when you come into the presence of the masterpieces of antique art—for instance, the 'Three Fates' of the Parthenon. I call them the 'Three Fates" because that is the current designation, though savants believe them to be statues of quite different goddesses. Let that be as it may, they are nothing but three

The Hour of Temptation

By Zygmunt Rozycki (From the Polish)

The president's young widow, exhausted by emotion and many sleepless nights, finally fell into a long heavy slumber from which her maid, after long and frequent knocking, with difficulty aroused her. She arose, and with trembling fingers fastened the collar of her long mourning gown, which had been sent to her a few hours ago from one of the most fashionable establishments in the city. She then caught up an embroidered handkerchief, emitting a strong odor of heliotrope, with which to hide her tear-swollen eyes.

The clergy had just arrived to perform the last rites, and the odor of incense, mingled with the perfume of flowers and burning candles, filled the whole house, creating that heavily charged atmosphere peculiar to the chamber of death.

Below on the first floor of his mansion lay the deceased magnate. His face seemed made of wax; his convulsively drawn lips were covered with a brownish skin resulting from a consuming fever.

In their silver candelabra the tall white wax candles burned quietly and majestically. The magnificent oak coffin was somewhat raised, so that the head of the dead man, resting on its satin pillow, was brilliantly illumined.

The pale young wife stood at the head of the coffin between high palms and dark-green, luxuriant orange trees. Her dry eyes rested on the sharp waxen features of the dead, forming such an unpleasant contrast with the snowy back-ground on which they reposed. Her gaze then wandered to the hands crossed on the breast, in which had been placed a small silver crucifix, and to the flowers and wreaths piled up on all sides, and almost completely concealing the remains of the dead, attired in its rich uniform.

The crowd of visitors increased every moment. Condolences were exchanged in subdued voices, but none had the courage to approach the young widow, standing so motionless and dry-eyed.

The mourners entered the room with lighted torches, the coffin-lid, heavily clamped with silver, was shut and screwed down. There was a grating sound, and the coffin rested on their shoulders. Pitying arms were outstretched towards the delicate, trembling figure of the woman, who sobbed violently as she slipped to the thickly carpeted floor.

In the boudoir of the late magnate's wife burned a lamp beneath a red silk shade, softly illumining the room, which was furnished with every possible luxury and comfort. On a divan lay the young widow—by her side stood a tall young man anxiously feeling her pulse.

He counted "one, two," but smiling to himself was obliged to stop, as the lovely white arm, emerging from the soft black lace adorning her gown, trembled so strangely, whenever the sensitive, vibrating fingers of the man pressed her pulse. Finally he succeeded in counting the rapid, uneven pulsations, and pushing his chair back from his patient's side, he wrote a few words in his note-book.

"Calm yourself," he said. "It is nothing—only the emotions of the last week. A small dose of bromide will bring you quiet and sleep."

"But suppose, in spite of your infallible remedy, I should not be able to sleep?" she said, and the red lips pouted slightly. Then with the voice of a spoiled child, she continued: "I am so frightened—I seem to see those penetrating eyes everywhere. They gaze at me from every corner, so that I dare not lift my eyes. I constantly have his waxen face before me, and feel the touch of his icy fingers." And, as the doctor took up his hat preparatory to leaving, she stretched out her hands to him pleadingly. "Oh, don't go! Please remain a little while longer."

"If you will permit, with pleasure," he answered, placing a slight emphasis on the last word.

Drawing up a low stool to her side, he inquired: "May I ask if you have been married long?"

"Yes—no—that is, it depends how one counts. According to the calendar I have been married only two years."

The young man, somewhat embarrassed, pulled his carefully arranged black mustache; a deep red dyed his energetic face. Then he asked:

"How did it happen that you, so young, so beautiful—the president was old enough to be your father?"

She lay awhile motionless. The warm red glow of the lamp fell upon her small, regular, girlish face, to which an expression of sadness lent an added charm at the same time that it awakened pity. Finally she opened her eyes. They met the doctor's gaze. She looked at him a moment as if frightened by something she read there, and again lowered her lids. There was a moment's silence; then she commenced to speak, with eyes still closed, in short, broken sentences.

"It happened as such things happen a thousand times in life. I was poor—he was rich. To be poor is nothing, but to be poor and at the same time be obliged to keep up the appearance of wealth, that is the most terrible poverty! To bear a good old name, without the necessary means to uphold the family prestige; to entertain sumptuously, but to have hunger lurking at the door; to keep servants and horses, but to tremble at each sound of the door-bell, fearing a creditor has come to claim his own! Debts! Debts! What a series of humiliations and moral torment from all sides! A terrible, hopeless condition of affairs!

"The president was the friend and companion of my father's youth, and was in the habit of spending most of his evenings with us. Then father's health began to fail and physical suffering was added to the torment of seeing the remainder of his slender capital dwindle away. He worried about my future, for as most girls in my position, I was brought up to shine in society, without practical knowledge in any one direction. A superficial musical education, and the knowledge of several languages, fitted me at most to be a governess. But the thought of my becoming a breadwinner was most distasteful to my father.

"One day upon entering his room I noticed two empty champagne bottles on the table. I was astonished at this unusual evidence of extravagance, but was not long left in ignorance as to its cause. Father, whose cheeks were flushed with wine, informed me that the president had done me the honor of asking for my hand, and as he was very wealthy and would insure me a brilliant future, he had given his consent. I cried out in horror and dismay: 'I, a young girl of seventeen, with that?' I threw myself at my father's feet, but he knew no pity. I was told that the president was an excellent match, and that, as a portionless girl, I could ask no more.

"Besides, he loved me. Yes, he loved me—shortly after that he informed me so himself! Despite my opposition, I became his wife.

"But my marriage did not kill the passionate longing of my heart. I still remained a child, whose whole being cried out for love and love's caresses. My husband was extremely jealous, and kept me entirely out of society. His relatives formed the circle in which we moved. But even they regarded me with disfavor, fearing that through me their hopes of a large inheritance would be

The Dislodgment of Irish

To persons familiar with the history of the siege of the naval office of California it will seem incredible that the gallant garrison has at length capitulated. The truth is, however, that Colonel Irish is about to evacuate the sinecure in which, it was believed, he was impregnably intrenched. Many moons have waxed and waned since Colonel Irish took possession of the naval office. His induction was an episode of a former generation, an incident of the triumph of a party that has almost perished from inanition, that is believed to be beyond resuscitation. Presidents have come and gone since Colonel Irish went into office, with no perceptible effect on his tenure thereof. Repeated assaults made on the Irish citadel served only to strengthen the impression of their futility. In time the Colonel took on the dignity of tradition. In the public mind the thought grew that his term of office was destined to stretch out to the crack of doom. Certain, it appeared to be, that panting Time toiled after him in vain. All these memorable years the newspapers, whose disapprobation Colonel Irish regards as praise indeed, were barking on his trail, hoping to contribute to the dislodgment of him. Incidentally they pictured him as a tenacious jobholder who spent most of his time circumventing hostile politicians. Now the truth, which looks well in print occasionally, is that Colonel Irish during his whole official career never stood on the order of his going.

Some Historic Interviews

The supposition is that all office holders are jobchasers. The office that seeks the man is believed to be a poetic conception. Nevertheless it was not the instinct of office that led Colonel Irish to his sinecure; nor was it by wire-pulling that he protracted his hold thereon. Few men were held in so high esteem by Grover Cleveland as was Colonel Irish. Grateful for services rendered on the platform by Colonel Irish, Grover Cleveland urged him to become a member of his official family. First he offered him the Mission to Chile, then the Mission to Japan, then the Superintendency of the Census. All were declined with thanks. Colonel Irish told the President that he did not want any office. Shortly after his return from Washington he received a letter from the President asking him to take the naval officership and he took it. Now for the story as to how he held the job. A solid money advocate, he stumped the Middle West for McKinley. Some months after McKinley's election Colonel Irish attended a convention in Washington, and one day he met the President in the company of several friends. The President grasped him by the hand, saying, "Colonel Irish, I believe that I owe more to you for my election than to any other man in this country." The Colonel blushed. The California delegation heard the news, and when they failed to persuade the President to appoint a Republican to the naval office they knew the reason why. Next came Theodore Roosevelt; also another demand for the Colonel's removal. One day the two Colonels met. Said Roosevelt: "Colonel Irish, all the Californians in Congress insist on your removal." Colonel Irish made reply: "Mr. President, I realize that it would be embarrassing for you to ignore their demands. My resignation is at your disposal." Thereupon, Teddy: "Colonel, I like embarrassment." Now the question is, If Taft and Irish had met would the latter still be the beneficiary of a large and salutary neglect?

An Unspendable Fund

There is still a little money in the fund that was raised for the celebration that was given on the occasion of the return of California's heroes from the Philippines, and it is causing trouble. That was a great celebration. It came up to expectations without consuming all the money contributed by a prodigal public. Mr. M. H. De Young attended to the raising of the money, and gathered $65,000. When the last gun was fired and all the bills were paid there was enough money on hand to inspire Douglass Tilden, the sculptor, and to pay for the casting of the bronze monument that now gives delight to lovers of the beautiful as they pass the intersection of Van Ness avenue and Market street. Nor was the money that was spent on the statuary all that remained in the hands of the trustees. They had enough to give Jim Smith a banquet when he first returned from the islands, which was some years after the disbanding of his regiment. As Mr. De Young was not in town at the time, the other trustees, the Hon. James D. Phelan and Mr. Martin, were unable to obtain his consent to the spending of the money on the Smith banquet, but on his return he approved what had been done. And still there was money in bank drawing interest, and the trustees did not know what to do with it. When money was being raised for the fleet celebration and Mr. Phelan as chairman of the executive committee was experiencing difficulty in persuading local capital that patriotism should overcome the repugnance excited by his personality, it occurred to him that in the enthusiasm of the moment he might induce De Young and Martin to part with the two thousand dollars in the California Regiment fund. But much to his disappointment they turned his proposition down. Untouched the money went on drawing interest. No meeting of the trustees occurred again until a few weeks ago when Mr. Phelan had another proposition to submit. He had a little bill of $996 which he would like to settle. It was the bill for the reception which he gave to General Jim Smith at the Fairmont. Martin and De Young looked at him in amazement. That reception was distinctly a Phelan affair. Mr. Martin had not even been invited to it. And although Mr. De Young had heard something about it, never for a moment did he suppose that it was in the nature of a public function. Again Mr. Phelan was turned down, and again he went blithely on his way clothed in all the purity of his vestal modesty.

His Need of Relaxation

Mr. Phelan, by the way, is soon to take himself to Europe, there to soothe the melancholy of his political ambition amid restful scenes congenial to the poetry of his nature. Mr. Phelan is a great lover of foreign parts; not because home has lost its hold on his affections but because the burdens that his aspirations impose are enervating. Bathed unremittingly in the limelight, ever mindful that the eyes of a fickle constituency are upon him, as fearful of being understood as some sensitive souls are of being misrepresented, he feels periodically the necessity of unswitching himself from his surroundings, going in quest of emotions, and bathing his spiritual self in refreshing waters. He relates of himself that when he gets aboard an Atlantic liner with glad gasps he takes the air of freedom into his lungs; and his friends say that in the bracing atmosphere of the Old World he chases about in pursuit of pleasure like a young bull. But this time he is not going abroad for any exciting whirl.

A Pilgrimage Planned

Rumor, which is always busy with our foremost citizen, gives out that he will spend most of his time on this trip in the atmosphere of literature and the arts. It is said that he will be introduced as the protege of Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, and that the distinguished novelist will lead the way on a pilgrimage to the shrines of notable children of the muses. Mr. Phelan has long enjoyed the distinction of being Mrs. Atherton's most constant reader as well as her best entertainer. When she is in San Francisco he is always doing something in her honor. The homage that he pays to this talented woman is as great as any homage that he could wish to be paid to himself, which, of course is saying a great deal. In the circumstances it is perhaps quite natural that the friends of the novelist and the millionaire should speculate as to whether the friendship that is rooted in a lively appreciation of genius might not eventually have a delightfully sentimental efflorescence. For the gossips still insist that Mr. Phelan is not hopelessly a bachelor.

Religious Differences in Families

When I read a few days ago that the daughter of the Rev. Mr. Hitchcock, the Protestant clergyman who conducts the well-known military academy, had made her "profession" as a sister of the Holy Name in Oakland, I was reminded of the striking differences in religious belief which may exist in families without arousing feelings of alienation or bitterness. This I take to be one of the signs of the times pointing to a charitable tolerance which is far from being an indication of indifferentism. Those who are most sincerely attached to their faith are always willing to admit that others, even their own kin, may find consolation in dogmas radically different. This is a kind of broadmindedness which has nothing to do with latitudinarianism. One of the most striking instances of this condition with which I am familiar is that of Judge Joshua B. Webster of Stockton and his son Father Royal B. Webster of Menlo Park. Judge Webster, besides being one of the best known lawyers in the San Joaquin Valley, is a strict Methodist and has always been prominent in the activities of his church. Yet when his son expressed a desire to join the Catholic church and enter the ministry as a Sulpician, Judge Webster interposed no objection but simply told his son to follow his conscience. Father Webster is a professor in the seminary at Menlo. Another son of Judge Webster, by the way, rose to great distinction in the Steel Trust before his death and left his father an interesting bit of jewelry. It is a gold locket presented to him by Mrs. Langtry and containing on the cover a charm made up of seven splendid stones. These are, in order, a Diamond, an Emerald, an Amethyst, a Ruby, another Emerald, a Sapphire and a Topaz. The initial letters of these words spelled together indicate that the Jersey Lily held the dead steel man in high regard. Judge Webster wears in the locket a photograph of his baby grandson and applies the charm to the child.

The Renascence of Morehouse

From Nevada comes the news that Harry Morehouse, a distinguished citizen of the Sagebrush State, is likely to succeed Senator Nixon in the sober and sedate upper house of Congress. This Harry Morehouse is no stranger to us. This Harry Morehouse is none other than the statesman who was wont to point with pride to his stainless heart. He hailed from San Jose, and by the good citizens of that garden of the valley he was elected to the Senate of the State, where he became a conspicuous figure. A lawyer of some talent and a friend of the people, he bravely championed the people's cause and brought confusion upon its enemies. But unfortunately right in the midst of his virtuous activities, just as he was becoming infatuated with his own sterling qualities somebody broached a barrel of drachmas, and then was the mighty fallen in the midst of battle. The barrel was one of the moving accessories of the senatorial contest which ended in the squelching of Colonel Dan Burns and the election of a harmless old gentleman by the name of Bard. It was an ending that surprised Bard more than anybody else. The fact is that Bard was elected with the aid of the barrel without his own knowledge. The barrel was the personal property of a San Francisco millionaire with no love for Bard but with that intense hatred toward Burns that none but one of his blood could indulge. When the contest was over Senator Morehouse, who voted for Bard, came to San Francisco under a cloud and undertook to create a drouth along the cocktail route. From the pace he set it was evident the devil was driving. The Down and Out Club opened its hospitable portals and h[illegible] it was thought, had seen his star set fo[illegible] til after the earthquake did any of h[illegible] get track of him. Then they heard th[illegible] himself together and was pushing [illegible] self-reclamation in Goldfield. As a practicing attorney, the lines have fallen unto him in pleasant places. He has made a lot of money; enough, indeed, to be able to run for the Senate in opposition to millionaire Nixon.

Flint is After Figures

From one of Senator Frank Flint's friends I learn that before the edge was worn off the young statesman's appetite for more glory at Washington he gathered some interesting data touching the cost of making a senatorial fight under the beneficent direct primary. It is absolutely reliable data, for it was obtained from two gentlemen who have had experience under the direct primary. One of them is Senator Raynor of Maryland. His seat was not contested, but in complying with the law which requires the circulation of petitions and other things that are not to be had without money he spent $18,000. Senator Bourne is the other man by whom Flint was supplied with data. This gentleman is a reformer of the millionaire brand. He professes great love for the people and great scorn of wrongdoing. He had to fight for the job, and it cost him $80,000. Most of the money was spent in the promotion of publicity. Bourne found that publicity was best obtained by oiling the press. He piped the oil through the interior of Oregon, and wherever he could do so he contracted not only for publicity but for exclusive publicity. Thus he kept the names of his opponents out of many rural newspapers and created the impression in some sections of the State that a man by the name of Bourne, the idol of the masses, was the whole show. He heartily commends his method to all jobchasers. That the wise ones will adopt it there is not the slightest doubt. The direct primary is certainly a great boon for the palladiums of our liberty. By them it was recognized as such even befoure Bourne began the promotion of publicity.

McNab for Governor

Some weeks ago I reported that the McNabs were coming—particularly Gavin and James. Now, looking into the seeds of time, I discern signs warranting the prediction that the political ambition of John of that clan will bear fruit before the end of the year. Keep your eye on the youngest of the McNab brothers, and watch him as he dances down the middle. I don't keep a card index, but I am in touch with political weather bureaus up and down the State, and all of them report a Scotch plaid banner floating in propitious breezes. John McNab has not had much experience in politics, but for that very reason he "looks good," all the other aspirants for gubernatorial honors being political hacks whose days of promise have passed. What vitality they seem to possess is blown into them by henchmen imbued with a lively sense of favors to come. So long have they been in the public eye, doing nothing but gorging themselves at the public crib, that they have become a weariness of the flesh. From the rural districts comes a demand for new blood, and this is significant. McNab himself is truly rural. Raised as a rancher, he educated himself in the law as a diversion while pursuing his labors in the field, and when he was examined for admission to the bar he made a most brilliant showing. If it be asked what service he has rendered to his party the answer is that he stumped the State for Taft and for Gillett and that he proved himself a whirlwind campaigner.

No Call, No Cry

Since Governor Gillett's announcement of his intention to withdraw from politics the Republican organization has not determined upon a candidate, and so far the Lincoln-Roosevelt League has experienced nothing but difficulty in finding a man to make the fight on the assurance of its moral backing. Mayor Mott of Oakland has been deemed almost able to satisfy both the machine and the league of his preeminent fitness for the job, yet he has not been called. Nor is he likely to heed a call from the league if it be unaccompanied by one from the machine. For Mott is thoroughly appreciative of the cost of glory under the direct primary. Phil Stanton of Los Angeles has announced that he is a candidate, accompanying the announcement with the explanation that his candidacy is to be considered as an expression of his devotion to the interests of Southern California. Phil doesn't care for the job; not at all. He is moved by nothing but geographical considerations and a keen sense of the claims of a patriotic constituency on his time and talents. Four hundred persons, not more than three hundred and ninety of whom expect jobs, have petitioned this shrinking violet to emerge from the umbrage of his Arcadian seclusion and lead the charge of the Los Angeles brigade. "On to Sacramento!" cries Phil, but echo answers not either from the holy of holies of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League or the throne-room of his Satanic majesty of the machine. No Macedonian cry summons Phil to the chair of State, but geography must be upheld.

Lawlor's Latest Exhibition

Judge Lawlor's denial of District Attorney Fickert's motion to dismiss the indictments against Patrick Calhoun was precisely what might have been expected. Yet the motion was not unreasonable, nor was it unusual. It is the duty of the district attorney, whenever he considers it futile to prosecute a case to move that it be dismissed. Moreover it is customary for judges to grant motions of this character. Not to do so is to imply a lack of confidence in the judgment or integrity of the prosecuting officer. Judge Lawlor has frequently granted motions on the grounds set forth by District Attorney Fickert in the Calhoun case. Motions of a similar character in graft cases, made by Mr. Heney, were granted without hesitation or comment. Why, then, was Judge Lawlor visibly agitated when District Attorney Fickert moved to dismiss the Calhoun case? Why did he mutter incoherently something about the possibility of the district attorney's attitude being made the subject of inquiry? Finally, why was his decision precisely what might have been expected? These are all pertinent questions. In the right answers will be found an abstract of the causes that led to the repudiation of the Graft Prosecution. Judge Lawlor was agitated because he takes a profound personal interest in the Calhoun case, which renders him impotent to give the defendant a fair trial. His covert threat against the district attorney was the expression of an unbridled partisan feeling that disqualifies him from acting impartially. He makes it clear that he would like to discredit a district attorney elected by the people, yet it is notorious that he co-operated enthusiastically with a conscienceless rascal who prostituted the office of public prosecutor while on the pay-roll of a private individual. In view of these facts the answer to the third question as to why the decision was precisely what might have been expected is obvious.

Rockefeller Wanted to Emulate Spreckels

Let us for a moment leave the court presided over by Judge Lawlor, and through the medium of the Associated Press glimpse the tribunal of Judge O'Sullivan of New York. In the despatches of the 5th inst. it is reported that John D. Rockefeller Jr. has become so interested in the evils of the "white slave traffic" which the grand jury of which he is foreman has been investigating, that he offered the other day to donate $25,000 out of his pocket to prosecute a thorough inquiry and bring the guilty to justice. The proposition was made to District Attorney Whitman and Judge O'Sullivan, by both of whom it was rejected. "Judge O'Sullivan," says the despatch, "informed Mr. Rockefeller that for that sort of inquiry the public should pay." In other words Judge O'Sullivan holds that a public prosecution cannot be converted into a private enterprise. Mr. Rockefeller doubtless made his proposition on the assumption that what is tolerated by the courts of San Francisco is in strict accordance with the principles of American justice.

The Principle That Brought Discredit

That illustrious freebooter of journalism, the Boughten Bulletin, informs its readers with a sardonic chuckle that District Attorney Fickert's motion was what the people voted for last November. This is quite true. The people were sick and tired of the graft prosecution. And if District Attorney Fickert had moved to dismiss the Calhoun case on the ground that he had been elected to make the motion he would have been acting in accordance with the most salient fundamental principle upon which Fremont Older's employers conducted the graft prosecution. This principle, in a nutshell, is precisely what was the matter with the graft prosecution. It was the cause of the nausea that finally revolted the people. The graft prosecution was started not in the courts but in the newspapers. The newspapers organized themselves into a graft prosecution, and they did not go into the courts until they had agreed upon a policy of intimidation. When in time it was found that Spreckels, Phelan and Older were dominating the combination, and that the punishment of grafters concerned them less than the gratification of their spleen and vindictiveness the journalistic sanhedrim was dissolved. But from the beginning until the end the policy of the Graft Prosecution was to achieve results not by enforcement of the law but by coercion of the courts through the medium of public opinion. The courts and the officers of the courts were expected to heed the voice of the people, and the consequence was that the prosecution was resolved into a contest for popular support. As a consequence, too, the people were tormented with frame-ups and with all sorts of theatrical contrivances. They saw muck-rakers brought out from the East to gather material for articles abusive of the community, they witnessed the maligning of their highest tribunals, they saw trials attended by claqueurs, they beheld trial judges behaving like bitter partisans and they heard prosecuting attorneys appealing to the mob. It was inevitable that the people should weary of this continuous scandalous performance. Unquestionably they voted to put an end to it; but District Attorney Fickert is not acting out of deference to public opinion. He does not share the sentiments of Fremont Older, who was urging at one time that the voice of the mob should prevail over the conscience of a judge. He has asked for the dismissal of the Calhoun case because he knows that he cannot conscientiously ask for the conviction of the defendant on such evidence as he is able to produce.

It May Serve For Political Purposes

If Calhoun could not be convicted when "Jim" Gallagher was on hand, when Burns and his spies were attending to the impanelment of juries, and when Judge Lawlor was able to co-operate confidentially with the prosecuting officer, there is surely not much likelihood of his being convicted now. Gallagher having been sent abroad for his health, the records of the district attorney's office having been destroyed, and Fickert being disinclined to pack a jury, the situation is certainly not what Judge Lawlor would term propitious. But all the potentialities of the Calhoun case for political purposes have not been exhausted. Rumor has it that the men who were behind the graft prosecution are taking a lively interest in the coming State campaign, and that they would like to keep the Calhoun case before the people as an object lesson of some kind.

Mantell and the Corporal

Corporal Hamilton H. Dobbin of the park police station is the proudest man in town this week, and he has no hesitation in explaining that Robert Mantell is the cause of his superexalted state of mind. Corporal Dobbin and Robert Mantell were born and raised together in Belfast, Ireland, and have always maintained the friendship begun in tender years. Corporal Dobbin's whole interest in the theatre centers in the career of Mantell and for the past year he has been supplying his friends with the Eastern papers in which Mantell's productions have been reviewed. For the opening performance at the Columbia Corporal Dobbin engaged a proscenium box and occupied it with Judge Cabaniss, Lewis H. Bvington, Thomas M. O'Connor and J. McNamara as his guests. After the performance Corporal Dobbin escorted his party behind the scenes and presented them to Mantell. The actor was as glad to see Dobbin as Dobbin was to welcome the actor.

Beardslee for Lieutenant-Governor

While other republicans ambitious to hold high State offices are pulling all the wires they can lay their hands on and sitting up nights devising political combinations that will facilitate their quest, Robert L. Beardslee of Stockton has announced himself a candidate for lieutenant-governor and is making his campaign in the spirit of the direct primary law. Beardslee has not asked permission to run for Warren Porter's job; he has simply jumped into the fight without consulting anything or anybody except his own desires. Whether the performers will look upon his candidacy with favor, Beardslee so far has had no opportunity of learning; he is equally in the dark regarding the attitude of the reformers. The reason is that he has not asked either side for an indorsement or a sign of encouragement. Interpreting the direct primary law in its simplest sense he has started out to let the voters know what he is after. He has begun with Stockton and San Joaquin county where he is immensely popular and ere long will be embarked on a rattling campaign. Aside from Charley Curry and John McNab I cannot recall any other aspirant for State office who has adopted the true spirit of the new election law in applying it to his personal canvass. All others are willing to circumvent it by starting with the indorsement of an extra-official convention of some sort, just as was done during the election in this city. Beardslee will prove a formidable candidate. He was city attorney of Stockton for one term and served through three legislatures in the lower house. He was speaker of the assembly in 1907 and chairman of the ways and means committee afterwards. During his chairmanship, for the first time in our legislative history, the general appropriation bill did not have to be amended in the assembly. Beardslee would make a thoroughly competent president of the senate. But Warren Porter is still to be heard from.

The Vaughan-Lytell Engagement

The announcement of the engagement of Miss Evelyn Vaughan, the beautiful leading woman at the Alcazar, to Bertram Lytell who used to be the leading man in the same theatre and who is now at the head of a stock company in Rochester, New York, is a source of melancholy satisfaction to the girls and boys who make up the matinee audiences at the Sutter street playhouse. Month after month the rumor crept from lip to lip that Bertram Lytell had captured the heart of Miss Vaughan and that their frequent love passages behind the footlights were not merely mimetic in character. Denied with every ingenuity of emphasis known to the press agent, the rumor persisted. Among the matinee youngsters it was the transcendent topic of conversation. The girls rather hoped that the handsome Bertram whom they worshiped with heart and soul would not forsake the state of single blessedness, although they admitted that Miss Vaughan was a worthy object of his affections. The boys were intensely jealous of Lytell and swore that he was not worthy of Miss Vaughan. The absorbing theme was debated at dances, at parties and in every candy store in town. Girls have been known to let the fudge burn while engaged in the discussion; boys, to have snubbed their cotillon partners when a difference of opinion arose in the matter. The query editors of the daily papers grew weary announcing to "old subscriber" and "high school girl" that Mr. Lytell and Miss Vaughan had not been married. And then Lytell went away, leaving the mystery behind him. It was whispered that he had been jilted and would bury himself in Broadway to assuage his grief. Some of the more knowing hinted that the marriage had already taken place and that it did not square with the Alcazar tradition to have a married man playing leads, because it destroyed the glamor in which the matinee girl lives. But it's all over now; the engagement is announced. The girls are free to confess that Mr. Lytell was very nice but that Mr. Ince is perfectly adorable.

PRODUCING ELECTRICITY

Where the Cost Counts

Electric energy is like the wind. While the wind is blowing a vessel may raise its sails or a windmill may be adjusted to catch the breeze. While the wind lasts they both move. When it stops they stop.

While the electric generators are whirring under the impulse from water forces high in the distant mountains or under the spell of steam-driven machinery down in the valleys the mysterious current thrills unseen through the miles of wire to the limits of the system. The instant the generators stop the electric energy ceases. While it is flowing the consumers may take it or leave it. They pay only for what they take. The rest is wasted unless used.

Whether any of them or none of them use it at a particular moment the company must make it; must have the costly equipment for the maximum demand, must pay taxes on the whole outfit, and bear the depreciation, although the full capacity of the plant is taken by consumers only two or three hours a day.

The Return of Two Favorites

The Novelty Theatre was crowded on Tuesday night by an audience which looked exactly like the audience which used to gather of a Monday night at the old Alcazar in O'Farrell street. This was not remarkable because the occasion was the return to San Francisco after an Eastern success of Florence Roberts and White Whittlesey. Miss Roberts is not so fleshy as when last seen here and White Whittlesey is the same old White except that—whisper it softly—there is a tiny round bald spot on his left temple. What a tragedy the first insidious touch of the imp of baldness must be to a matinee idol like Whittlesey! It was difficult to determine which of the two favorites the audience was more pleased to see. Both received ovations of almost equal enthusiasm, Miss Roberts, I think, having a shade the better of the welcome. Mayor McCarthy with Mrs. McCarthy and a party of guests occupied a box. The Mayor arrived during the first act when the theatre was darkened and took his seat unobserved but after the first act, when he was noticed, a voice yelled "McCarthy" from the rear of the theatre, there was handclapping and the ever ready executive arose and made a brief oration.

Did Rex Beach Crib from Hughes?

The first presentation here of "The Transformation" gives rise to an interesting question of plagiarism or unconscious cerebration, to use a fashionable euphemism. In the fourth act of this play the hero becomes blind and the heroine is made aware of his condition when he attempts to cross the stage and walks into a chair. Later the heroine starts to leave the room but stops at the door. Thinking that she has departed the hero speaks aloud and for the first time she discovers that he loves her. Now these identical episodes figured in a story by Rex Beach published in Collier's two or three weeks ago. "The Transformation" is the work of T. Ciconni, an Italian playwright presumably, and was adapted for the American stage by Rupert Hughes. It was produced long before Rex Beach's story appeared. Was Beach indebted to the play for his inspiration? It is interesting to recall in this connection that Beach was threatened with snow-blindness as the result of his long stay in the white north.

"That man couldn't make a success of anything."
"What makes you think so?"
"Why, he actually made a failure of a butcher shop."

The Halsey Case

Judge Dunne has succeeded in creating the impression that a deception was practiced on him by three reputable physicians who, he would have us believe, perjured themselves in the interest of Theodore Halsey, the official of The Pacific States Telephone Company who is under indictment for bribery. As a result of Judge Dunne's attitude and conduct in this matter, I am told, the physicians who have suffered a grievous injustice at his hands are considering the advisability of resorting to some means of obtaining a vindication. The fact is that their diagnosis of Halsey's condition had not been disproved; nor has their testimony been contradicted to the extent

Judge Dunne would have his audience in the gallery believe. For example, the fact is not disputed that Halsey is suffering from tuberculosis. The disease is said to be quiescent as a result of the treatment which he has been undergoing, but that he has so far recovered that his life is not to be endangered by a long, tedious and debilitating trial is something to which no physician will testify. But even admitting a disagreement among doctors it does not follow that some of them are lying, as Judge Dunne assumes. Some years ago several doctors of high standing testified in a local court that a woman who was suing a railroad for damages for personal injuries had a tumor which had probably been produced by the accident in which she had figured. She won the suit, and a few months later was delivered of the tumor which proved to be a twelve-pound baby. Now even admitting that the doctors in the Halsey case—Gallwey, Shumate and Williamson—have erred in the very slight degree in which they have differed from three other physicians it does not follow that they have prevaricated. Professionally they are men of much greater experience than the gentlemen who have given Judge Dunne occasion to bloviate, and certainly there are not many men in the medical profession in California whose reputation for honesty is to be compared with theirs.

The Doctors Are After Him

Now, as I have said, these gentlemen whose honesty has been impugned, are not disposed to remain under a cloud. They believe they are entitled to vindication, and from what is said by their friends, in seeking it they may make Judge Dunne's court-room the storm-centre of another scandal. These physicians are not to be awed by magisterial frowns. They are in an aggressive mood, and if their indignation does not cool the situation may take a curious turn. How dramatic it would be if Judge Dunne as a result of his efforts to disparge medical opinion should find himself under the scientific examination of expert alienists! Now as a matter of fact this thought has been seriously indulged. Many years ago Judge Clough whose aberrations were by no means as offensive as Judge Dunne's was examined by physicians and pronounced insane. As a consequence he lost his job. So the situation does not lack a precedent. But there is one thing to be said for Judge Dunne: his mental condition is the same now as it was when he was elected to the bench. Ever since his elevation to the bench he has been crotchety, capricious, querulous and peevish; all of which, however, may be accounted for on the hypothesis that lacking a serene, judicial temperament and the capacity to master the intricacies of the law, whenever he finds himself in a maze of technicalities he experiences brain storms. But from these a man may suffer without going daft beyond the reach of hellebore.

Chinese Lotharios and White Girls

The body of a Chinese was found cut to pieces in the picnic grounds at Lodi a few days ago and investigation by the sheriff of San Joaquin county showed that the murder had been committeed by another celestial who was jealous of the dead man's attentions to a white girl. The further the authorities went into the case the blacker were the details which they uncovered. It may seem incredible that a Chinese Lothario should be able to fascinate white girls, but though the supposition does violence to some of our preconceived notions about the gulf which separates the white and yellow races, it is amply borne out by documentary evidence in the present case. One of the officials who had charge of the investigation following the murder told me that the dead Chinese had a bundle of letters from white girls of San Francisco and elsewhere. The letters contained endearing expressions and indicated that the most intimate relations had existed between the Chinese and the unfortunate girls who wrote them. The letters of course will never be made public, for no good purpose would be accomplished by such an exposure. The murder, however, has called the attention of the San Joaquin authorities to an unusually shocking state of affairs and without undue noise measures will be taken to deal with the situation.

Father—So you've failed again in your examinations. How was that?

Hopeful—Because they asked me the same questions as before.

Goldsmith's and Swift's Birthplaces

All lovers of English literature with a touch of sentiment in their makeup will rejoice to learn that a movement is on foot to restore the birthplace of Oliver Goldsmith in the village of Lissoy. Pilgrims who have visited the original of "Auburn, loveliest village of the plain" must have been saddened by the ruin which neglect has spread over this historic home. It is indeed a deserted home in "the deserted village." Now that the Westmeath County Council has taken steps to save it from destruction it will be a more cheering landmark for travelers to visit. Poor old "Nolly" had so much of melancholy in his hard career that as much brightness should be shed over his memory as possible and the restoration of his birthplace is a move in the right direction. There is another birthplace of a distinguished Irishman which has been crying aloud for the hand of the restorer for more than a century. This is the wretched hovel in Hoey's Court, Dublin, where Dean Swift first saw the light. A dirtier spot than Hoey's Court it would be difficult to find in the region of slums near Dublin Castle and the house which is pointed out as the birthplace of Swift is probably the most uninviting spot in the court. The visitor need not be reminded that Swift's parents were desperately poor, for Hoey's Court has evidently been a dwelling place of the poor for centuries; but imagination refuses to picture its present squalor in connection with the abiding there of the proud and well-connected Swifts. Why the authorities of Dublin have never done anything to make this landmark presentable is a mystery that defies solution. A bust marks the home of Thomas Moore, Balfe's birthplace is kept in good condition and other natives of Dublin have been honored in the streets of their childhood, but one must go to St. Patrick's to find a memorial to Swift. Why does not Dublin follow the example of Westmeath?

The Retirement of Warships

Does the average utility of a cruiser extend only over a period of fifteen years? Will the fighting ships whose keels are laid this year be antiquated in 1925? These questions may seem preposterous, yet they are amply warranted when attention is given to the fate which has already overtaken vessels that were the pride of the navy during the war with Spain. Some of these cruisers have been dismantled, others have been condemned to retirement as out of date and several have sunk to the inferior position of reserve ships whose utility is confined chiefly to affording practice ground for naval recruits. The building of a big cruiser is a costly undertaking and its life is by no means in proportion to its cost. The rewards for improvements in the implements of war are so much greater than those offered for improvements in the tools and instruments consecrated to peaceful industry that new guns, new armorplates, new explosives are constantly superseding others of recent invention. If these improvements could be applied to the old vessels of the navy, ships of war would not age so quickly, but in most cases it seems that the new gun or the new explosive can only be utilized in a larger vessel or at least in a vessel of different pattern. Hence the dreadnaughts of today are not supplementing the cruisers and battleships of yesterday but are replacing them; the strength of our navy is not increasing in the direct ratio of the number of new vessels launched. The elder vessels become decrepit more rapidly than the new vessels can be built.

Eighteen Antiquated Cruisers

It may seem surprising that eighteen cruisers which were adequate for offense and defense in the war with Spain should now be out of date and practically useless, yet that seems to be the case. It was only a few years ago that the cruiser Brooklyn was considered the pride of the navy. Launched in Philadelphia in 1895, only fifteen years ago, boasting a speed of 21.9 knots, the Brooklyn came into prominence during the war with Spain. As flagship for Rear-Admiral Schley she was first identified with the flying squadron at Hampton Roads but later she became famous as the vessel picked out by the Spanish admirals for their concentrated fire when they made their sortie from Santiago, and she led the pursuit of the Cristobal Colon. Today she is lying, partly dismantled, at the yard where she was built and will probably never see active service again. Her hull is perfectly sound, her engines are in good condition and she seems to be in every way as seaworthy as she was a dozen years ago. But the navy department has ruled that the Brooklyn is out of date and she will be allowed to go into disuse. The Olympia was Dewey's flagship at Manila Bay; now she is held in reserve at Annapolis. The Baltimore is out of commission at the New York yard; the Boston at Puget Sound; the Chicago will be turned over to the Massachusetts Naval Militia to be used as a practice ship; the Atlanta is used as a barracks for the torpedo men at Charleston. The cruisers Minneapolis and Columbia are out of commission at Philadelphia; the old flagship New York is in reserve at the same place; the Cincinnati is out of commission at Mare Island; the Detroit at Boston; the San Francisco at Norfolk; the Denver and Galveston will be retired at Mare Island and Puget Sound respectively; the Milwaukee and St. Louis are in reserve at Bremerton; the Philadelphia is used as a receiving ship at Puget Sound. It is a melancholy list and is eloquent of the terrific cost of naval protection.

Beerbohm on Dale

Max Beerbohm, dramatic critic of the Saturday Review of London and a literary artist of distinction, has been discussing, apropos of the exhibition of temper into which Alan Dale provoked Lawrence Irving, the ethics of dramatic criticism, and incidentally the manners of Mr. Dale. He says: "I doubt not that Mr. Irving, as he bowed himself off the stage, felt he had dealt the enemy a deadly blow. I wish he had. For that enemy I have no regard whatsoever, and will not by naming him add my quota to the fine advertisement he has received from Mr. Irving. His gibes at Mr. Irving and at Mrs. Irving were vulgar and unjust. Again I judge by cabled fragments; but these are in exact accord to the manner which I have sometimes, with gloomy curiosity, sampled at full length in the newspaper which it adorns. I can construct from them the quality of the whole article. The writer is a man not endowed with humor and cleverness. But he has made his reputation by using these gifts mainly in the cause of crude insolence, and by the elaborate process of going out of his way to give such offense as right-hearted critics try to refrain from giving even when they are bound to blame. The matter of what he says is sometimes right enough; more often it is shaped to fit the manner; and always the manner is deplorable. Criticism of acting differs from criticism of other arts, in that it is necessarily far more personal. You can condemn or ridicule a book, or a painting, or a piece of music, in terms which, while they would be brutal and indecent as applied to the work of an actor, leave personally unscathed the writer, or painter, or composer. Art and honesty demand that the actor shall not be judged more leniently than other artists. The actor himself, in common self-respect, demands this though always, of course, he would rather it were denied him. Humanitarianism, on the other hand, demands that our judgment of the actor shall be so worded as not to wound him. It is very difficult and delicate, this task of telling the truth innocuously. It is not impossible, but it takes a lot of time and tact."

His Strictures on American Journalism

Mr. Beerbohm has also taken occasion in connection with the foregoing to discuss American journalism. His views on this subject are expressed in the form of a speech which he thinks would have been more effective than the one delivered by the actor. "Mr. Irving," says Beerbohm, "should have stood surveying the house, and then, very slowly, have said, 'I have spoken strongly about this man. But I do not hate him. Rather do I pity him. He delights to bark and bite. It is his nature to. One does not hate a mad dog. But, if I came to a city where mad dogs were allowed to be at large, it would be not enough for me that the citizens should say 'Yes, aren't these dogs a nuisance?' I should blame these citizens for their incivism. The critic whom I have named tonight is an extreme case, no doubt. But the fact remains that a great part of American journalism is unseemly, a peril and pest, unworthy of a civilized nation. Why do you stand it? Do you wish me to be forced to the conclusion that you are not yet civilized? You deplore the corruption of your politics, just as you deplore the vulgarity of your 'yellow press.' Why don't you stop it? You could. No one has ever accused you of lethargy. You are a very vital and vigorous people. I have an immense admiration for your immense potentialities. If we in England had such politics as yours, or such a 'yellow press' as yours, I should feel desperate indeed. For we in England are growing old: our organism might not be able to cast off such maladies. But you, the young and buoyant, the aquiline and star-spangled, very surely you have the power to set your house in order. Apparently you have not the will. I pray you, be calm. Resume your seats. There is no use in your attempting to storm the foot-lights. I need but raise my hand and there would appear from the wings a strong force of armed police whom the Mayor has very kindly placed at my disposal for this evening, with orders to shoot if you show the slightest disposition to tear me limb from limb. I ask you to ponder well what I have said to you. Ladies and gentlemen, I wish you a very good-night.' If Mr. Irving had said something of this sort . . . but no, Mr. Irving would have been best advised to say nothing at all."

The Robert Burns Anniversay Banquet of St. Andrews Society was the auspicious occasion at which the Dewar prize bowls were presented for contest on the green of the Golden Gate Scotch Bowling Club. Mr. Jas. S. Webster, to whose efforts the success of the Harry Lauder week and St. Andrews' banquet is largely due, made a suitable reference in his address at the dinner, to the friendship of Sir Thomas Dewar for Mr. Harry Lauder and to Sir Thomas' handsome trophy of a box of prize bowls to be contested for on the green of the Golden Gate Scotch Bowling Club.

A BOY'S BELIEF

It isn't much fun a-living
  If grandpa says what's true,
That this is the jolliest time o' life
  That I'm a-passing through.
I'm 'fraid he can't remember,
  It's been so awful long.
I'm sure if he could recollect
  He'd know that he was wrong.

Did he ever have, I wonder,
  A sister just like mine,
Who'd take his skates or break his kite,
  Or tangle up his twine?
Did he ever chop the kindling,
  Or fetch in coal and wood,
Or offer to turn the wringer?
  If he did, he was awful good!

In summer, it's "weed the garden";
  In winter, it's "shovel the snow";
For there isn't a single season
  But has its work, you know.
And then, when a fellow's tired,
  And hopes he may just sit still,
It's "bring me a pail of water, son,
  From the spring at the foot of the hill."

How can grandpa remember
  A fellow's grief or joy?
'Tween you and me, I don't believe
  He ever was a boy.
Is this the jolliest time o' life?
  Believe it I never can;
Nor that it's as nice to be a boy
  As a really grown-up man.

WE ALL KNOW HER

She warbled the soprano with dramatic sensibility,
  And dallied with the organ when the organist was sick;
She got up for variety a brand-new church society, and Spoke with great facility about the new church brick.

She shed great tears of sorrow for the heathen immorality,
  And organized a system that would open up their eyes;
In culinary charity she won great popularity, and Showed her personality in lecturing on pies.

For real unvarnished culture she betrayed a great propensity;
  Her Tuesday-talks were famous, her Friday-glimmers great.
She grasped at electricity with mental elasticity, and lectured
  With intensity about the marriage state.

But with the calm assurance of her wonderful capacity,
  She wouldn't wash the dishes, but she'd talk all day on rocks,
And while she dealt on density, or space and its immensity,
  With such refined audacity, her mother darned the socks!

Man wants but little here below,
  He is not hard to please;
But woman—bless her little heart!—
  Wants everything she sees.

Odd Things in the World

Levi P. Morton, now in his eighty-sixth year, sits at his desk in the Morton Trust Company from 10 o'clock to 3, and before leaving for the day calls Harry Francis, the company's secretary, and asks:

"Have you anything more for me to do?"

"Nothing until tomorrow morning, Governor," replies Mr. Francis.

The same question and the same reply have concluded Mr. Morton's business day since his term as Governor of this State ended more than a decade ago.

What became of the Duke of Cumberland's sword, which was lost or stolen at the Haymarket Theatre on January 16, 1749? It was on the night of the great "Bottle Hoax." According to advertisement a man was to "play on a common walking cane the music of every instrument now used to perfection; get into a quart bottle without equivocation, and while there sing several songs," besides doing other things only a little less marvelous. More marvelous that the theatre should have been packed with spectators, including many of the nobility and the Duke of Cumberland—of Culloden fame. The conjuror did not appear, but one of the theatre officials did and informed the house that all money would be returned at the doors. "Cumberland was the first that flew in a rage," a contemporary account tells us, "and called to pull down the house. He drew his sword and was in such a rage that somebody slipped in behind him and pulled the sword out of his hand, which was as much as to say, Fools should not have chopping sticks. This sword of his has never been heard of, nor the person who took it. Thirty guineas of reward are offered for it."

There is no city on earth where the tip system is more deeply rooted than in Paris; and yet, if we are to believe M. Jabouyant, secretary of the Chambre Syndicate Ouvriere des Limonadiers, the cafe and restaurant waiters desire nothing better than to see the abolition of the pourboire. "When that day arrives," he says, "our comrades will realize the necessity of grouping themselves together for the purpose of obtaining a fixed salary from their employers. Today we receive no salary, only the pourboire, and not always that. Some employers, finding that we make too much, deduct as much as 40, 50 and even 60 per cent of our tips. I could tell you of one cafe where eighteen employes hand over to the house over $12,000 a year. Most employes are paid for working; we others pay for the privilege."

A Government poultry expert who has just completed an extensive tour of the several States of the Australian Commonwealth has issued a report containing certain recommendations designed to increase and cheapen the production of eggs. The expert's idea is, briefly, the creation of "egg circles" in the States which have not yet adopted that plan. One of the States has already twenty-one of these centres, consisting principally of small farmers. The secretary of each centre receives, tests and grades the eggs, pays cash for them at the current market rate, and sends them to the Government cool stores. The Government does the marketing, and at the end of each quarter any profits are divided among the suppliers. The secretary of each centre receives one cent a dozen for the eggs he handles. Under this method there is no middleman's profit. The grading and testing is very strict, and no egg under two ounces in weight is passed. The expert claims for his scheme that it will increase the production of eggs and table poultry throughout the commonwealth by 300 per cent.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The market has experienced during the week a vast amount of liquidation by pools, commission houses, short selling and manipulation by important market interests, with the result that transactions have been on a heavy scale. Low prices on the present decline were recorded in the middle of the week with a strong rally in values at the close of business. Some of the leading railway stocks have shown a distinct accumulation by bankers on weak spots in the market, and this is an excellent and hopeful sign that the decline in securities is nearing the end. There is also reported some heavy buying of speculative issues by interests who are credited with making the important swings of the market; hence it would appear that stocks may go somewhat lower on manipulative drives in the immediate future, yet we are drawing to the point where we believe that any of the good dividend payers can be bought for much better prices in the coming spring months.

Wheat—Markets were lower and popular sentiment bearish. Disappearing sales of cash wheat, continued enormous receipts at primary centers outside of Chicago and much uneasiness on account of the unsettled conditions of the market for securities were decidedly against confidence in the present values of wheat. Thus far in February the cash demand is much poorer than probably anyone in the trade had anticipated. With spring-like weather only a short distance off it is no wonder that the trade has begun to think about weak spring markets. Bearish sentiment continues to run ahead of actual conditions, nevertheless. The Chicago market for futures is hammered on the first excuse, although prices here are relatively lower than elsewhere, and all contract grades of wheat are at a large premium over deferred deliveries. The trade, of course, knows full well that if it waits until the large marketings of cash wheat have wiped out premiums at the other smaller centers and started the stream of wheat this way, there will be little chance to sell wheat around current levels. Speculators, therefore, are constantly trying to anticipate the conditions that they expect. It remains to be seen what the first hand owners of wheat, the producer, will do with it.

Corn—Further heaviness in corn was apparent last week. Prices at the lowest were almost precisely 5 cents below the high prices reached in the recent bulge. The weather has been good, railroads have made great progress in moving the grain to market, and the arrivals at primary centers, and particularly at Chicago, have been enormous. Demand from consumers has not kept pace with the marketings and heavy accumulations of supplies are being made.

Cotton—The news of the past week concerning the spot situation was more encouraging and contracts advanced in consequence. The spot markets of the South have been and are very firm, and even in some parts it has been said that holders are selling at concession and have been buying futures as a hedge. Cotton cannot be bought in the South as cheap as in New York and this certainly has looked strange. Futures have been too far below the parity of spots. What has been or is to be the upshot of all this? Reflective men are pondering the question with a great deal of interest. The spinners have been buying futures in New York and even Liverpool liquidated straddles by also buying in New York.

Some advices are to the effect that there has not been enough rain to put a good "season" in the ground. If, as is generally claimed, it is a case of supply and demand it would seem that the crop is totally inadequate and we would certainly have no surplus to carry over to the new crop. Yet, on the other hand, there has been and will continue to be such economy on the part of the spinners that this situation may be met, especially as to the far months. There is no question that the sentiment in the trade is bearish, while that of the statistically posted speculative crowd is most bullish. It is safe to wait until more reliable reports as to the weather conditions in the cotton belt are received before any heavy commitments are made and we advise a careful study of such reports and the possibility of an increased acreage. Prudent information should be the guide. For the present, at least, we continue to see the best kind of a scalping market and advise taking advantage of the dips and bulges which the present conditions of the stock market will go no little way to help.

Copper—It is apparent to everyone that there has been liquidation in the copper market in the past week, but this has been a naturally sympathetic drop with the New York Stock Exchange securities superinduced by selling by very large interests and it seems improbable at the time of going to press that the depression is yet completed. At any rate, the time is not yet a propitious one to look for an immediate bull movement. The seeming attitude of the administration against corporations in itself would preclude any hope for an immediate revival, even one based on the supply and demand of the staple. Yet it is more than probable that this phase of the situation has been misrepresented and made to serve as a scapegoat. At any rate, confidence has been severely shaken and the tariff troubles among foreign nations do not make for a feeling of security with exporters. We prefer to take the position that the coppers should now be bought on any further declines, but despite our wish to take a favorable view, we cannot feel that the time to put this into general practice has arrived. Of the Boston coppers the Lake stocks have had a particularly sharp break, though, by comparison, no more so than Anaconda and Amalgamated on the big exchange. There have been some false reports put out in regard to different Boston coppers, such as Calumet and Hecla, but on good authority we may state that there is no truth in them. As soon as conditions on the Stock Exchange become normal, the Boston coppers will show an improvement. The basic condition of the spot market strengthens our belief that the purchase of any of the dividend paying or good standard copper stocks will soon prove a remunerative investment.

A Sensation in Pink Tights

The Mardi Gras was a revel. Society went in for a good time regardless of the lines that divide and subdivide "sets," and the result was a hilarious success that recalled the old Art Association balls and went them one better. No one denies that the palm for popularity was carried off by the two ladies in tights. Who they were remains a mystery, but most of the men in the room followed in their train. Even the dignified Joseph Sadoc Tobin was interested. Toward the end of the evening there was a shocked exclamation from one of the boxes: "Look at Joe!" Every one in hearing looked, and there, waltzing happily with the pink tights, was Mr. Tobin. Ned Greenway also succumbed to her well revealed charms and that the judges recognized them was evinced by their awarding her the prize for the least striking costume and this should be explained. There were necklaces and jeweled pendants to be given to those wearing the handsomest and most original costumes. Florence Roberts, the actress, suggested a "booby prize." She donated one of her photographs to be awarded the least striking. The literal minded judges could find no one who wore less than the lady in pink tights and to her the picture was awarded. At supper the fascinating unknown was the center of a group of six devoted admirers. and through the popping of corks was heard to say: "Stop, I'll be black and blue." Another unknown was the flag lady whose extremely short skirt and rotund figure created a sensation. She and her interesting legs disappeared at unmasking, because as one man said, "She didn't have the courage to own up to them."

Prize Winning Costumes

Mrs. Jack Spreckels who was voted the one wearing the most original costume certainly merited the distinction. She was "an auction" in a white gown hung with red flags which bore the legend "Tonight at 12." About the bodice and skirt were hung tiny chairs, cook stoves and other household furniture and from her tight Sis Hopkins braids hung small tin cooking utensils. Mrs. Vincent Whitney was an adorable kitten, and calls of "Here puss" followed her. Her tight-fitting black gown was covered with small white cats and on her head was a furry white puss, its long tail curled about her neck. Mrs. Alexander Douglas who won the pearl necklace for the handsomest costume was an Oriental princess in bouffant bloomers and satin overdress all heavily embroidered and jeweled. She wore the face veil of the harem and a wonderful jeweled head dress. Miss Alice Hager's flag costume which won the second prize was a long trailing robe fashioned from a huge American flag and Miss Hager wore it with stately grace. The clever idea of going as a pint of Mumm to Mrs. Gus Taylor's quart, was elaborated by Miss Jennie Crocker. Miss Crocker is petite and bubbling over with spirits and while Mrs. Taylor is of stately height, she is equally effervescent. No one had a better time than these two in their bottle green and white gowns, covered with gold net. Miss Crocker, by the way, donated most of the pearls that went to make up the necklace given as first prize. It is made in three strands from which hang pendants of pearls set in clusters. The necklace won by Royden Williamson is a valuable ornament of many gems given by the patronesses of the ball and fashioned in beautiful designs. For this Miss Crocker gave several of her rings and each of the other members of the auxiliary donated some jewel from her collection.

How the Mere Men Masked

Royden Williamson won the oriental necklace valued at $1200, which was raffled during the evening and there is no end of speculation as to its ultimate disposal. For the most part the men wore dominos over their evening clothes but one cheerful coon enjoyed his disguise. He proved to be Harold Bingham, famous as the author of "Wont You Be My Buster Brown." Roderick Macleay who won a jeweled cigarette holder for the handsomest man's costume, came from Portland to be present. He is the brother of Mrs. Joe Grant and belongs to an old Scotch family. It was the plaid of his clan that he wore and he made a hit with his kilts. Cyrus Pierce was given a cocktail set for his Italian organ grinder. The judges felt he deserved a reward for his trouble with the monkeys. They proved unruly and threatened to make Mr. Pierce unpopular.

Lenten Penitence in Society setting a good example for the unfortunates who have never penetrated the sacred circle. The excluded polloi, never having experienced the delights of the fashionable corral, find it easy to renounce the world, the flesh and the devil for the Lenten season; but think how difficult it is for the exclusive few to do this. Yet are they sternly strewing their brows with ashes, donning sackcloth of the most recent design and tripping it with every appearance of devotion to religious services. It is a splendid exhibition of piety. To tell of all the sacrifices which are being made this season would occupy too much time and might detract from the merit of our devotees who realize that good should be done by stealth and not heralded abroad. Yet I must mention what some of our best people are doing in this holy season. One dame of the Burlingame set has resolutely vowed that she will not swear at her maid, no matter how awkward Marie may be. Another of the same section has retired one of her automobiles and if it be true, as some have said, that she has dispensed with the machine in which her husband is wont to joyride, that does not argue a lack of self-sacrifice, for hubby needs to do penance and it is penance for her to suffer his society. One of our charming matrons has resolved that she will drink no highballs during Lent and confine herself to one cocktail before dinner. Another has reduced her allowance of cigarettes to six a day. Still another is denying herself the solace of a box of novels which she brought over recently from Paris. I could name half a dozen of the younger girls who are making it a practice to walk to church during Lent instead of driving in their motor cars.

MISS GEORGINA SNEATHAN

One of Oakland's most beautiful society girls who won applause by her singing of the Swiss Song in the Oakland Kirmess.

Piety Not So Rare

Let it not be thought that I am sneering at the sincere piety which is to be found among the elite of our gaiety-loving town. There are plenty of instances where girls of apparent frivolity are actually observing the Lenten season with sincere but unostentatious devotion. One beautiful belle with a host of admirers who regularly embower her home with orchids and other precious blooms, has arranged to have the flowers transferred every morning to the altar of a certain church. Another is devoting her entire allowance to the poor and is doing good in this way that could not be accomplished by a regular charity worker. You see, she has the instinct for gentle deeds and she not only helps but edifies her beneficiaries. The maids and matrons who have told me that they will not indulge their love for bridge, the theatre, sweets and other innocent diversions in Lent are so many that I could not readily count them. At least half of them, I am assured, will persevere in their good intentions. Piety is not dead in society, the scoffers notwithstanding. The best of it is that these fair penitents will be the gayest of the gay when the season of repentance is over.

About Miss De Sabla

Miss Vera De Sabla and Gerald Halsey—these are two members of society who have been talked about with the greatest interest in the gatherings of the past week. At the last Greenway ball the charming heiress of El Cerrito danced no less than nine successive dances with the popular young fellow and of course that was more than enough basis for the rumor of an engagement which immediately sprang to life and has been growing ever since. As a matter of fact Mr. Halsey has been very devoted to Miss De Sabla ever since the famous De Sabla ball. He is a very eligible young man, his family connections including Dr. and Mrs. Emmet Rixford. Many of Miss De Sabla's friends think that an engagement will be announced before the young lady leaves for her European tour. By the way, Miss De Sabla leaves this week for a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Hope and Miss Dunsmuir of Victoria.

Miss Bourn's Engagement

The bavardes were much upset when the announcement of the engagement of Miss Maud Bourn to Frederick Vincent followed on the heels of their announcement that this charming young lady had given her heart to Richard Tobin. As a matter of fact the erroneous story published by the bavardes was responsible for the official announcement of the disposition of Miss Bourn's affections much sooner than had been planned. It was Dick Tobin who played fairy godfather to Miss Bourn's romance. On the occasion of Miss Bourn's last visit abroad Dick Tobin gave her a letter of introduction to the Vincents. In New York Miss Bourn met Fred Vincent and they crossed the Atlantic on the same steamer. On that trip he proposed and was accepted, so that when they reached the other side it only remained to tell the interesting news to the Vincent family. Young Vincent is the son of a colonel in the British army.

The Comte Housewarming

Mr. and Mrs. A. Comte Jr. welcomed thirty-five of their friends last Saturday evening at a housewarming in their beautiful new home at 3851 Clay street. Two hours or more were devoted to cards, the winners receiving handsome prizes. A musical entertainment followed and later an elaborate supper, the guests all seated about a huge round table. The decorations in the dining-room were scarlet carnations, making a striking effect against the ebony paneled walls. The beautiful hostess was radiant in white silk. Many clever speeches were made felicitating her and her distinguished husband on the happy occasion.

Miss Burns Entertained in the East

Miss Marguerite Burns, the strikingly beautiful daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. F. Burns, has been spending a month or so with Lieutenant and Mrs. Cassidy in Providence, Rhode Island, and has been extensively entertained in the naval set there. On her way back to this city Miss Burns will stop in Los Angeles as the guest of her uncle, James P. Burns, a prominent merchant of the southern city. Miss Burns is a graduate of the Sacred Heart Convent of this city and is a young lady of unusual culture, possessing many interests outside the social world which claims much of her time. Before her departure for the East she was at most of the season's big functions and on her return many delightful affairs will be given in her honor.

The Norris-Preston Wedding

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Preston are spending their honeymoon at Portola Hall, the Preston country place at Woodside. On their return they are to live in Devisadero street near the Worthington Ames home, and not in Santa Barbara as reported. The wedding last Monday was a small affair but it loomed large in interest. There has been a certain atmosphere of romance about the personality of Mrs. Frank Norris as the widow of the brilliant young novelist, and on her own account she is clever and fascinating. Then Frank Preston was one of the popular bachelors of the younger set who might have been expected to select a bride from the debutante assortment. Instead he supplied society with the surprise of the season in the winning of Mrs. Norris who had perversely remained unwon by any number of eligibles. Altogether the wedding was one of unusual importance to society. Only eight guests witnessed the ceremony in St. Luke's church and these included Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson and Mrs. Isobel Strong who accompanied Mrs. Norris from Santa Barbara. Mrs. C. V. Ferguson, the bride's mother, gave her away and there were no attendants. The others present were Mr. and Mrs. Worthington Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Willard Droun, Mrs. Preston, little Miss Jeanette Norris, the bride's daughter and her sister Miss Black. Later there was a jolly wedding breakfast for thirty at the Ames residence at which Mr. and Mrs. Jack Spreckels, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Oliver Tobin, Miss Kathleen De Young, Joe Rosborough and Charles De Young were among those present.

Polo at the Potter Country Club

Society in general from Monticito and Santa Barbara, with a goodly sprinkling of San Francisco social folk, gathered at the Potter Country Club polo field to witness one of the most exciting contests of the season. La Monaca's band played on the club house verandah and there were a number of beautiful luncheons given there before the game. The Hotel Potter was also the scene of many brilliant dinners given after the game and prior to the ball of Saturday night. Among the polo players in this game were Earl Graham, E. J. Boeseke Sr., E. J. Boeseke Jr., J. I. Colby, Ernest Winchenden, F. W. Fraser, F. D. Leadbetter, Edgar Park, J. M. Warren, R. Cameron Rogers, Reginald Rogers, Ed. Boeseke and C. E. Perkins. The prizes were handsome cups donated by Mr. Sam Perkins, proprietor of the Tacoma Ledger who spends his winters in Santa Barbara at the Hotel Potter. Because of the warm and delightful climate of Santa Barbara the Potter is a favored resort for San Franciscans and there will be a large colony of them there during Lent. Among those who usually go down are Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mrs. J. D. Peters and Miss Anna Peters, Mayo Newhall and family, Mrs. Francis Carolan, Eugene De Sabla and Mrs. De Sabla, Mrs. Barron, Ward Barron and many others.

The Sharons in Flooded Paris

Letters from Mr. and Mrs. Fred Sharon who are at their home in Paris have reassured their San Francisco friends who have been concerned for their welfare. The Sharon residence was not damaged by the flood although for several days the danger was great. Mrs. Sharon has subscribed $4000 to the relief fund and has given much assistance to Ambassador Bacon in his work of distributing the contributions of American residents of Paris. Miss Mary Eyre is in Paris but will soon join Mrs. Walter Hobart in Italy. Admiral and Mrs. Swinburne who are well known in this city were also among the Americans who passed the trying days of the flood in the French capital.

Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Goodwin were at Del Monte last week on their bridal tour. Mr. Goodwin is the secretary of the Alexandria Hotel company.

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst entertained twelve guests at dinner on Tuesday at the Fairmont. William R. Hearst and his wife were guests of honor. The Hearsts have been staying at the Fairmont prior to the completion of their home.

Lift Up Your Eyes to the Hills---
The CROCKER TRACT Is the Fairest Sight for Them to See

The firm of Wickham Havens Incorporated has developed and put on the market many tracts of land. We are developing and marketing other tracts at this time.

But we have set aside our choicest property for a special purpose. We have called this property the Crocker Tract. It consists of about 150 acres of the most desirable part of the Piedmont hills.

We have reserved this section for men who wish to buy tracts larger than 50 foot lots and who intend to build homes costing between $15,000 and $50,000.

To all such people we can flatly say that there is no more desirable situation anywhere in the bay section.

The view is unexcelled.

The climate long ago made Piedmont famous.

The tract of rolling, oak-studded hills is fully developed. Electric cars give quick connection with the business centers. The gas and water mains are laid and the electric light and telephone wires strung.

Sites already occupied and improved show just the character of improvements to be maintained under our restriction of sale, which requires a definite expenditure in home building—the minimum limit being $10,000.

And we have a suggestion to make to those who are not yet quite ready to build but who contemplate building in a few years. That suggestion is:

Buy now; plant your tract with trees and shrubs, and let Nature do your improving while you get ready to build your house. Others who have purchased sites in the tract are doing this now.

But whether you are ready to buy and build, or whether you do not intend to build for a few years, we feel confident in saying you cannot find anywhere about San Francisco bay a home site that possesses so many splendid features as a site in the Crocker Tract.

We will not sell sites in this tract to mere speculators. Our appeal is solely to those who intend to build exceptionally beautiful suburban homes. To all such, our advice is: Buy now, while you have the widest choice in making selections.

WICKHAM HAVENS INCORPORATED, 1212 Broadway, Oakland, California

Henry entertained his guests at a luncheon at Pebble Beach Lodge.

Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Purdy, accompanied by their three charming daughters, have taken apartments at Del Monte for an extended visit. Mr. Purdy will leave his family there until his return from a business trip to the southern part of the State.

Mr. J. C. Ford, president of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company, arrived at Del Monte in his private car recently, accompanied by his wife and several friends. They will spend several days here before continuing their trip through Southern California. Mr. Ford is very fond of golf, and expressed himself as greatly pleased with the links.

Major John A. Garden, U. S. A., was an army visitor in town during the week. He registered at the Hotel Victoria.

Recent arrivals at the Palace Hotel from Los Angeles are Colonel J. B. Lankershim, Bradner W. Lee, Geo. H. Peck, A. N. Childress, Charles Weir, H. J. Marietta and J. S. Riley.

G. H. Holmes of Salt Lake City accompanied by Miss Holmes is at the Palace Hotel. Frank Knox, a banker of Salt Lake City, is also a guest at the Palace. J. V. Lydick and Mrs. Lydick of Seattle are at the Palace on their wedding journey. Mr. Lydick is connected in a prominent way with the Alaska Steamship Company of this city and is making a trip of both business and pleasure.

Under the patronage of the aristrocratic set of San Francisco and with the warm support of discriminating musicians, Ivan Shedd Langstroth will give a concert in the Colonial Ball Room of the St. Francis, rendering a program of his own composition. He will be assisted by Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, Giulio Minetti, Arthur Weiss, and Harold Pracht. Langstroth is one of the most brilliant artists that the city has produced and will be given an enthusiastic reception at this public appearance. Among those who have already engaged boxes are Mrs. Charles Frederick Baker, Mrs. Francis Carolan, Mrs. Homer S. King, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Truxtun Beale, Mrs. Frederick Kohl, Mrs. James D. Fry, Mrs. John Brice, Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. Edwin Newhall and Mrs. Frederick Tillmann.

Miss Margaret Kemble entertained a group of the smart set in the Blue Room of the St. Francis Monday afternoon, with an interpretative musical lecture, "Ariane et Barbe Bleue," a musical story in three acts by Paul Dukas, which is to be given this winter at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. This is the modern version of the old Bluebeard tale, made acceptable to a suffragette period by letting Bluebeard's wife go down into the dungeon and rescue her unfortunate sisters. The opera was sung by Maurice Maeterlinck's wife, Georgette Leblanc at the Opera Comique in Paris.

The Laurel Court of the Fairmont Hotel took on added beauty on Monday when a score or more of the friends of Mrs. G. H. McNear enjoyed her hospitality at luncheon. The great round table was set in the center of the south side of the Court and beautifully decorated with daffodils and other flowers of the spring time. Among the guests were Mrs. Fred McNear, Miss Agnes Tillman, Miss Lurline Matson, Miss McMahon, Miss Augusta Foute, Miss McNeil, Mrs. Thos. Kurtz, Miss McCabe, Miss Gibson, Mrs. Ellinwood, Mrs. Frederick Scott, Mrs. Greer, Miss Florence Braverman, Miss Van Vorst, Miss Mildred Whitney, Miss Page, Miss Baldwin and Miss Jean Tyson.

Miss Suzanne Kirkpatrick whose wedding to Alan McDonald will take place April 14 entertained twenty of her young friends at tea in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont on Tuesday.

Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara who is en route to New York, where it is announced she will study for the stage under the personal direction of David Belasco, is in San Francisco for a few days and as usual is making her home at the Fairmont. Mrs. Graham is always largely entertained when in this city where she has many friends.

Judge and Mrs. Erskine M. Ross of Los Angeles are at the Fairmont where they will make their home during the term of the United States Court over which Judge Ross is presiding.

Mrs. W. F. Dohrman was hostess at a luncheon on Thursday, entertaining twelve guests.

A wedding of interest on both sides of the bay will take place today when Miss Nina Crittenden, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Crittenden, will become the bride of Austin Carrington Scott, son of the late Mr. and Mrs. Henry Harrison Scott. The ceremony will be performed by Rev. M. Bakewell at Trinity Church, Oakland. Only relatives and a few intimate friends will be present. Mr. Philip Landsdale who married pretty Mary Nichols, daughter of Bishop and Mrs. Nichols, will be the best man while Miss Kate Crittenden Scott, the groom's sister, will attend as bridesmaid. Both the bride and groom are members of an old and exclusive southern family. The father of the bride belongs to the family of the late A. P. Crittenden.

The friends of Rosa Hooper Plotner have received letters from her describing her exhibition of miniatures at the rooms of the Kilohana Art League in Honolulu. Mrs. Plotner's exhibit was a social as well as a financial success.

Mrs. Eleanor Doe and her daughter Miss Margaret will spend the summer in Santa Barbara, having rented the handsome new home of Mrs. Harriet P. Miller.

Mrs. Harriet P. Miller and her son Earl will spend the summer abroad.

The Fairmont is the scene of dozens of jolly informal teas, luncheons and dinner parties. Among those noted the last few days were the following: Mrs. P. E. Bowles entertained at luncheon for a half dozen of her friends, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Moore were hosts at dinner to six guests, Mrs. and Mr. Robert Hayes Smith had a jolly party at dinner, Mrs. Williar had six friends at luncheon, Madame Carreno, the talented pianiste, entertained for eight and Mrs. Arthur Silverberg had a large dinner party in the grey room.

Mrs. Wallace Everson and her daughters, the Misses Marian and Elsie, of Oakland, will leave early in April for a tour abroad. They will be gone for a year. Miss Elsie Everson was hostess at a delightful tea last week. About thirty of her young friends were present.

Among those who entertained at dinner at the Hotel Victoria were Dr. and Mrs. Alexander, Mrs. Cotton, Mrs. H. D. Green of Portland and Commander and Mrs. Blue.

The stork is hovering over the home of the Lathrop Ellinwoods. Mrs. Ellinwood was formerly pretty Miss Louise Stone, youngest daughter of Col. George Stone.

Arabian Justice

By Karl Melite

Si El hadj Ahmed ben El hadj Ahmed was a celebrated personage at Temassin, the sacred city of the great desert of Sahara. Indeed, he was known all over the north African continent, through the Tell region, the great desert, the Soudan, the valley of the Niger, and as far as Bernou, the Kordofan, and many other Moslem countries. The pilgrims on their way to Mecca or simply coming to Temassin to pay their respects to the great Marabout priest had contributed not a little to spread his fame, and the taleb sang his praise in poetry. Everybody called him Si (My lord), in mark of respect and admiration—of gratefulness, I should say. Truly he was a hadji (pilgrim) son of a hadji, and on his hand and his forehead were to be seen the marks in shape of a cross indicating that he had visited the tomb of the prophet at Mecca. His reputation, however, was not based on this point. He was the chief cook of the great Marabout, had charge of the "diffa"—this first meal of hospitality offered to the passing travelers—and his talent as a culinary artist in preparing the couscoussou, the national dish made of mutton, hominy, raisins, figs, chicken and aromatic spices, was responsible for his popularity in the Moslem world. Si El hadj Ahmed had all the qualities of a master cook; his only defect—was it a defect?—consisted in being a gourmand. Possibly he owed to this his talent as a cook; being fond of good things, he naturally thought that the guests of the great Marabout experienced as much satisfaction as he did while licking the sauce dripping from his fingers in the delicate task of ascertaining the degree of perfection of his culinary combinations.

One day there was a great dinner at the Zaouia and some geese had been provided by the great Marabout at a great expense. The guests being very hungry, the cook feared that nothing would be left for him, and therefore he put away a whole goose for his own delectation. Unfortunately the theft was discovered and he ran away to avoid punishment. Swift runners of the desert were sent to capture him.

Si El hadj Ahmed could have easily escaped if he had kept on his way without stopping, but he was a good Moslem, and when he saw a poor Dervish trying to lift his donkey, fallen under the weight of the offerings of the faithful, he offered his services. Taking hold of the donkey by the tail, while the Dervish took the animal by the head, he pulled with all his might to raise the beast. He pulled so hard, indeed, that the tail remained in his hands, but the donkey remained on the ground. The Dervish was furious, and he chased the unfortunate cook, crying for justice. Si El hadj Ahmed could hear his pursuers, and wielding his traveling club to increase his speed, resumed his flight in earnest. He met a Roumi Christian around the curve of the road and inadvertently ran his staff through the infidel's eyes. The Roumi joined the chase, also crying for justice.

"I stole the goose, left the Dervish's donkey without a tail, blinded a Roumi," thought the cook, "I may as well kill myself." Seeing a tower near by, he made for it, ascended the inside staircase, and confiding his soul to Mohamed, jumped from the summit head foremost. Fortunately or unfortunately for him there were two Armenian brothers sleeping at the foot of the tower and he fell on one of them, killing him instantly, without hurting himself. He was soon a prisoner, and brought by the howling mob of pursuers before the Cadi for trial.

For some cause the Cadi appeared to be from the start slightly in favor of the accused. The great Marabout was the first to formulate his complaint.

"The goose fled through the window," said the cook.

"How could that be?" objected the Marabout; "this goose was cooked."

"Oh, man of poor faith," exclaimed the Cadi, raising his hands toward heaven; "do you not know that Mohamed has the power of making a dead goose fly without feathers? Go thou and repent."

The Dervish came next relating his misfortune. What could he do with a donkey deprived of his tail?

"This complaint deserves attention," decided the Cadi. "The Dervish will give the donkey to the cook, who will return it as soon as the tail shall have grown again."

The Dervish would not submit to the decision and went away with the tailless animal.

The Roumi related in his turn how he lost his eye.

"One eye of a Moslem," declared the Cadi, "is worth the two eyes of a Roumi; the Koran says so. Therefore, I order that Si El hadj Ahmed put out at once the other eye of the Roumi, who then will have the right to deprive the accused of one eye."

The Roumi politely declined the offer.

The complainants were dumfounded; they thought, however, that the cook could not escape punishment for the murder of the Armenian.

The brother of the murdered man explained with tears in his eyes how his brother was killed at the foot of the tower.

"This accusation is not denied," asserted the Cadi, after hearing the witnesses; "therefore justice will be done."

The complainants began to congratulate themselves.

"Therefore," continued the judge, "I will apply the law according to the Koran, which says 'eye for eye, tooth for tooth.' The Armenian will go to the top of the tower and jump head foremost on Si El-hadj Ahmed, who will lay at the exact place where the Armenian brother was killed. In this way Si El hadj Ahmed will meet death according to the Koran."

The Armenian went at full speed for the tower, but never reached it. The cook, as a good Moslem, followed, but found no one to jump on him.

Later on it was whispered that Aicha, the good wife of the cook, had left at the tent of the Cadi a good slice of the stolen goose and a little bag full of coin of the realm.

HOTEL GREEN, PASADENA

Robert Mantell in "Louis XI"

By Edward F. O'Day

Readers of "Quentin Durward" are able to fill out the picture of Louis XI painted by historians with vivid details of cruelty, superstition and craft while those who are familiar with Balzac's droll story of the monarch in his frolicsome mood can add to the portrait certain other characteristics that are more human but still repulsive enough. Nevertheless, ordinary familiarity with French history in the fifteenth century and with the Louis of Scott and Balzac is not sufficient to prepare a theatregoer for the Louis of Delavigne's drama as represented by Robert Mantell. This is solely due to defective power of imagination. All the traits of this great monarch shown by the dramatist are to be found in the histories and fictions, but it is only when excellent dramaturgic and mimetic art visualize them for us that we come to know how Louis looked to the people of his court, how he acted and why he was at once the power and the horror of his age. Delavigne's "Louis XI" is a great play, as those of the present generation who attended the performance at the Columbia on Monday night learned with considerable surprise. Robert Mantell they already knew as a great actor of Shakespearian parts, but surely they were not prepared to see him vitalize this old play (for it is nearly a century old) with such transcendent art that it stirred in them feelings seldom touched by modern acting. Our theatre seems almost to have outlived that katharsis or purging of the emotions which, in the teaching of Aristotle, is the chief end of drama. The dramas of today grip the emotions strongly, stir them up, whirl them about but do not purge them. The contemporary playwright deems his effort successful if he sends the audience away with doubt and unrest; he likes to alarm, to unsettle convictions, to excite controversy. That is not what Delavigne aimed to do and most assuredly that is not the effect of his play as given by Mr. Mantell. Here is a king approaching the end of a long and stormy reign. Conscience has played havoc with his mind; evil passions, restless activities and continuous warfare have wrecked his body. His long struggle for the unification of France and the humiliation of its enemies is crowned by the death of Charles the Bold; his mistrust of the dauphin's fidelity is removed. France is safe, the succession is assured and it would seem natural that the aged king who has always feared God and whose faith, clouded though it be by vile superstitions, has never ceased to be a lively influence, would turn his thoughts to penitence and religious preparation for death. The king's first appearance shows how far this is from being the case. His terrible rage, directed characteristically enough at a dishonest taxgatherer, shows what a strong hold his passions still possess and it is only when his physician impresses on him the bodily effect which his anger will produce, that he abates his fury. Louis loves life for several kingly reasons, but paramount is the consideration of religion that to die means to be judged and possibly to be condemned, and he is not ready for the awful ordeal which his faith teaches him that he must inevitably endure. That is the mainspring of the action and with its gradual uncoiling comes that purging of the emotions which makes the strength of the play. We see the king kneeling to recite the Angelus and rising to continue the development of a plan of murder; the hand that has touched with awe the metal images of his cap toys in sardonic glee with the noose of his hangman. We see him working upon the innocence of a girl's trust to encompass the death of her lover and entering the chapel to abase himself before heaven. We see him exulting in the death of his arch-enemy and dispatching his generals to pillage, burn and slay while the auspicious occasion lasts and then ordering prayers and mourning for the dead. We see him begging, cajoling and blaspheming to exact the miracle of long life from a wonder-working friar, confessing the murder of his father and his brother and the barbaric torture of countless enemies, yet refusing to insure forgiveness by an act of mercy. We see him crawling abjectly at the feet of one whom he has wronged terribly, begging for life and then sending out his butchers to kill when his life has been spared. Finally we see him on his deathbed, too weak to resist the importunities of those who demand one good deed from him, and with a last spark of kingliness embracing his son, asking for absolution and commanding his subjects to pray for his soul. These are all terrible pictures of royal perversity; old-fashioned and unnaturally colored, many will call them; but they are founded in history and more important than that, they are grounded in human nature and strike home with unerring certainty to the heart of the beholder. Mantell's impersonation of Louis is a wonderful achievement, consistently appalling, repellant, full of grim savagery and ferocious humor. His makeup is almost unparalleled in its shocking ugliness. The thin dark hair, the black beetle-brows above red-lidded bloodshot eyes, the livid blotches on the unhealthy skin, the loose twisted mouth exposing the yellow fangs, the flabby neck, the clawlike hands, the lean legs stiffened and bent with decrepitude, the whole frame rickety with decay—all these details are presented with a daring insistence on complete physical degeneration which at first gives a distinct shock, and continuously appals but none the less impresses with its absolute necessity to the proper delineation of the fearful character. The makeup is sensational, something to be noted in the annals of the theatre as unusual, an extraordinary challenge offered to an audience. Yet Mr. Mantell carries it so splendidly and fits the gestures, the grimaces, the intonations, the words and actions of the part to this makeup with such consummate care that one feels that a lesser emphasis of the horrible details would be inartistic and lacking in conviction. If there were anything physically attractive about Louis it would decrease the sense of terror inspired by his crimes. At the same time, if there were no redeeming characteristic, the play would be too gloomy for presentation. Mr. Mantell's Louis is redeemed by the fine contrast between his body and his mind. Superstitious, vindictive, cowardly, treacherous though the king be, he is still a king, full of care for the interest of France, eager to crush its enemies, ambitious to guide its destinies to a glorious ascendancy. That is as much the Louis of history as the other is. Mr. Mantell knows this and his fine intellect enables him to show it to the audience. There is a keen brain working through all the infirmities of the body and soul. This is made particularly apparent in the last act when the king is dying. He gives France into the care of his son and when the weeping lad with the crown clasped in his hands bows his head to receive the blessing of a father who has never shown him any love, we behold the living symbol of that wonderful idea of royalty which was embodied for centuries in the French monarchy. Mr. Mantell's Louis is never so much a king as in taking leave of life. After the fitful fever he sleeps well. The spectacle of that hideous physiognomy relaxed in death is one never to be forgotten.

Miss Roberts in "The Transformation"

There are not as many tears in "The Transformation" as there were in "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch" which Florence Roberts used to pilot through an ocean of feminine lacrimation at the old Alcazar, but the opportunities for wet lids are profuse, nevertheless, and the play must be acclaimed a crying success. Miss Roberts has grown used to dying in the last act, but in the latest offering she varies this proceeding by sighing out her soul in the first. Deathbeds behind the footlights are always good for copious weeping and the lace handkerchiefs did their duty. Those unfamiliar with the plot may have experienced some alarm at the unusual spectacle of the star passing away at the beginning of the play, but there was no particular cause for uneasiness. Miss Roberts appeared again in the second act, not as the pure and noble sempstress who died in the first but as her physical double. Colinette was too good for this world but Elika was in no such embarrassing predicament. On the theory that the good, represented by Colinette, die young, Elika should live to a bad old age. There are no tears in the second act wherein the badness of Elika is demonstrated, but in the third plenty are turned loose on both sides of the footlights to the memory of the good Colinette. It is natural that Elika who is taking a vacation from badness to pose for the unfinished portrait of Colinette should resent the chaste memory of her dead double, and she does for a while. It is not quite so natural, perhaps, that she should grow to love the husband who cherishes the memory of Colinette but she does this too. That brings about the transformation of the title. Elika becomes a second edition of Colinette in goodness and demands that the widower marry her to keep her good. Can you blame the poor man for refusing, even when she makes an awful threat that if he persists in spurning her proposal she will return to her badness? 'Tis a ticklish situation and would make any man or any actor ridiculous, but White Whittlesey carried it off very well indeed. In the fourth act the tears are turned on full force again, for the widower is blind and another transformation takes place. The widower has grown to love Elika as much as she loves him, but he will not burden her life with his terrible affliction. It is only when he has sent her away and thinks that she has left the room (though she is weeping against the jamb of the door), that he lets the secret out. Of course the audience smiles through its tears at this happy conclusion. It will be seen that this is the sort of a play in which Florence Roberts should be pretty nearly at her best. I have always thought that she was at her very best in those two very different classics, Wycherley's "Country Girl" and D'Annunzio's "Gioconda." But for her second best the emotional weepy play is the thing. Miss Roberts enacts her dual role very well; the faults are not hers but the playwright's. Forgetting all about the incongruities of the play and regarding it merely as a vehicle for emotional acting I do not see that Miss Roberts' interpretation of the two heroines could be improved on. She has always been a capable actress and experience has brought her a maturity of art which softens the glare of her emotional flame without lessening its warmth. In the scenes wherein Miss Roberts depicts Elika as a primitive woman battling for love, the effect is electric. No doubt an Elika, aroused and transformed, would act in just that way. White Whittlesey has always been a very capable actor, a fact which stands out in strong relief on an occasion like this when he returns after a long absence. We were so used to him that many of us underestimated him; but he was always effective and he has gained additional strength and repose. Homer Miles is a stranger who deserves to be made welcome. He has a portly mein and a very natural manner lending itself to hearty good humor and convincing seriousness. He would be a great man for the Alcazar. —Edward F. O'Day.

Mantell's Second Week

For the second week of his engagement at the Columbia Robert Mantell will offer seven different plays, as was the case during the past week. On Monday night "Richelieu" will be played and as it is remembered as one of the greatest performances of Mantell's former season here, there is sure to be a crowded house on hand to enjoy the great actor's interpretation. The Tuesday night bill is to be "Othello" and at the Wednesday matinee Shakespeare's "As You Like It" will be staged for the only time during the present engagement. On Wednesday evening "Richard III" will be given, and on Thursday "Macbeth" is to be the bill. "Louis XI" will be repeated on Friday night and the matinee on Saturday will have "Hamlet." "Richelieu" is announced for the Saturday night bill. Seats for all the above performances are now on sale.

The Schumann-Heink Concerts

Sunday afternoon at the Garrick Theatre, that greatest of contraltos, Mme. Schumann-Heink will again sing for our music lovers. In addition to arias and scenes from Mozart's "Titus," Saint-Saens' "Samson and Delilah," Meyerbeer's "The Prophet" and Wagner's "Gotterdamerung," the artist will sing songs in German by Schubert, Carl Loewe, Richard Strauss and Felix Weingartner and in English by Ethelbert Nevin (The Rosary),

MISS JOSEPHINE D'ARCY

Who will appear with Bert Leslie in "Hogan in Society" this Sunday matinee at the Orpheum.

George Chadwick, Carrie Jacobs Bond and Rudolph Ganz. Next Thursday night, February 17, a quite different but equally great program will be given and novelties by Max Reger, Richard Sahla and L. Stein will be introduced. A group of five Schubert gems will include "The Erlking" and "Death and the Maiden." Dreamland Rink has been secured for the farewell concert on Sunday afternoon, February 20.

"The Virginian" at the Savoy

Rose Melville will make her last appearances in "Sis Hopkins" at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and commencing at the Sunday matinee "The Virginian," a drama that has always been eagerly welcomed in San Francisco ever since its first production at the Columbia Theatre before the fire will begin a week's engagement. It is said that the better the novel the harder it is to make a good play therefrom, but "The Virginian," as dramatized by the author, Owen Wister, and Kirke LaShelle, is an exceptionally good one and holds the attention from curtain rise to fall. The Kirk LaShelle Company enjoys the reputation of giving the public the very best in stage presentations and this season has an organization of superior players, including William L. Gibson, Marshal Farnum, Charles R. Gilbert, Harry Halliday, J. R. Furlong, Mabel Wright, Eleanor Wilton, Jane Carleton, Marie Dantes and others. The usual bargain matinee will be given on Thursday. "The Right of Way," a dramatization of Sir Gilbert Parker's stirring story of the same name, will follow "The Virginian" at the Savoy.

Another Week of "The Test"

At the Van Ness Miss Blanche Walsh continues in her newest play "The Test," starting the second and last week of her stay on Monday night. Miss Walsh has created no small furore and is doing the finest work of her career. As Emma Eltynge she runs the gamut of emotions, portraying the character of a woman more sinned against than sinning. The play aims to expound the theory that a man who has done wrong in the eyes of the world and society is as guilty as a woman who has sinned no less, and the argument is all in favor of the woman. The only matinees during the Walsh engagement will be this Saturday afternoon and next Saturday. McIntyre and Heath, the oldest team of funmakers on the stage, follow at the Van Ness for a two week engagement. They have been called "Klaw and Erlanger's laughing trust," and certainly merit the title, for as comedians they take first rank. Their production this year is called "In Hayti" and concerns a humorous revolution on the Ethiopian island. The stars impersonate a couple of colored politicians and are said to be funnier than ever.

"The Man of the Hour" Continues

No surprise will be caused by the announcement that "The Man of the Hour" is to remain another week at the Alcazar. That the great American play of love and practical politics would exceed the regulation seven days' run was assured by the opening performance, when the audience demonstratively pronounced it one of the most complete presentations ever made by a stock company anywhere. Indeed the general verdict was that in both acting and staging it was fully up to the original production, seen in one of the local high-price theatres about three years ago. Certain it is that in no instance was the acting inferior, and the scenic investiture had the advantage of newness and greater elaborateness of detail. The Alcazar players have never done better team work than in this "play of today." For next week is announced a revival, in response to popular request, of "The Two Orphans," which was last presented in San Francisco about eight years ago. The pictorial side of the production promises to be worthy of the cast which will be another revelation of the versatility of the Alcazar players.

Slang Artist at the Orpheum

Bert Leslie, the great artist in slang, will give the Orpheumites one of their greatest laughs next week in his classic "Hogan in Society." He is backed by a highly competent company which includes Josephine D'Arcy, one of the prettiest and cleverest actresses in vaudeville. Leslie in the part of Hogan, a Bowery bartender, has great opportunity for his peculiar style of expression and makes use of it at every turn. John T. Thorne and Grace Carleton will appear in a skit called "The Soubrette and the Yap" which is so presented as to draw a laugh at the end of every line. La Veen-Cross and Company will present their second edition of "Roman Sports and Pastimes." It is a beautifully staged act in four scenes in which they appear as Roman gladiators and perform marvelous feats of strength. Charles Kenna, "The Street Fakir," is a monologist with an original idea which is proving an immense hit. The fifth new act will be Emma Francis, one of the most charming little dancers in vaudeville, and her two Arabian boys who will introduce something new in the singing and dancing line. Next week will be the last of the Five Mowatts and Seldoms' Venus.

Another Week of "Brewster's Millions" at Ye Liberty

In response to popular demand the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will repeat "Brewster's Millions" next week. It was in this celebrated comedy success that the transbay stock company achieved what was probably the most pronounced hit since their organization nearly six years ago, the business towards the end of the week reaching such proportions that hundreds were unable to secure seats. The announcement that the play is to be repeated next week will be a welcome one to playgoers of Oakland and the surrounding cities. George Friend and Blanche Hall will again be seen in the leading roles of the play, and the same splendid cast and production as before are assured. After the seven nights of comedy "The Warrens of Virginia" will be be the attraction for Washington's Birthday week.

Three Stars for the Macdonough

Rose Melville will appear in her delightful rural comedy, "Sis Hopkins," at the Macdonough Theatre, Oakland, this Sunday, February 12, giving a performance in the afternoon and another in the evening. Her success in this city was unusual and will probably be duplicated in the sister city. From February 16 to February 19 inclusive, with a matinee on the latter date, Mrs. Leslie Carter will present her extraordinary emotional drama "Vasta Herne" at the Macdonough. This play by Edward Peple, author of the delightful "Prince Chap," made a deep impression on the critics who saw it at the Van Ness and Oakland theatregoers are undoubtedly impatient to enjoy it. On the following Monday, February 21, Blanche Walsh will be seen in her latest triumph, "The Test."

The Well-Dressed Man

What to Wear, When and Where

For the benefit of those men who have neither the time nor inclination to study the art of Dressing correctly, we will publish a series of weekly Fashion Chats.

From a London Letter of "The Haberdasher" We Gather the Following:

Formal dress for day and night wear is much where it was. The overcoat is a single-breasted dark Chesterfield, preferably without pattern. The day coat is a black frock coat with ample skirts and the waist well defined. The waistcoat is collarless and single-breasted, matching the coat, and the trousers are the usual dark striped cashmere. Of course the hat is a silk hat of the prevailing fashion, and the collar is a wing collar of which the points must be small and may be either rounded or sharp at the points. A loose-ended knot pulled by no means tight, and worn without a pin, is the best cravat, though you often see a waterfall secured by a gold safety pin. This is the strictly formal afternoon wear. It is the outfit in which to call upon a family where a man is not absolutely familiar. But it is important to remember that etiquette in the matter of formal dress is relaxed a good deal of late years, and no degree of absolute intimacy is implied by a morning coat, which will be worn with a dark striped single-breasted Chesterfield overcoat, a silk hat and a waistcoat of its own material, the waistcoat being cut rather higher in the neck than a waistcoat worn with a frock coat. The same collar will be worn as with a frock coat, but the cravat should be a loose-ended knot. A plain straight-across watch chain may be worn with a morning coat, but should not be worn with a frock coat.

Evening dress similarly does not admit of the watch chain. This year it is best in tone, when quite formal, if the waistcoat is black. The dress coat of the season has the skirts rather long and full. It should be made of a fine black vicuna with the lapels silk to the edge, the collar being of the plain cloth. The trousers are a little looser than those worn in the daytime, and evening shirts are now generally made with square corners to the cuffs. For quite formal evening dress the military upright collar is best, although many people wear a wing collar with sharp points. The overcoat may be a dark Chesterfield, an Inverness, or even a frock overcoat, which is practically not worn at all now except in the evening. The hat should be an opera hat. Silk hats for evening dress are quite out of fashion. This is the evening dress wear for practically every occasion out-of-doors. The dinner jacket is making its usual effort this winter but I never see one at a theatre, even when men are alone, and never see one at a dinner party unless it is a very informal affair confined to men.

The most interesting fashion news in London just now relates to small oddments. For instance, colored silk handkerchiefs are selling very largely and are made very large. The note in this department is the all-over color. I mentioned last month the general invasion of the handkerchief trade by color even in cambric, but the movement just now is toward colored silk handkerchiefs, many of the old bandanna patterns having been revived.

Knitted goods of all sorts again are getting a decided revival. Even the knitted knot seems to be showing some vitality, though the better class of fashion wears its rue with a difference. The large loose and shapeless knot of popular trade has no sanction west of Bond street; instead, very rich silk very finely knitted and selling for anything from half a sovereign—from $2.50 to $5.00 that is—is the only thing. It is best in a plain color, often bright, though a diagonal stripe is not without adherents. Then the knitted waistcoat is making a fight with the blanketlike material which I mentioned last month, and evening-dress mufflers are generally knitted, but in the best trade they are of very fine silk so that the fabric has very little of the knitted appearance. Of course these things are not hand-knitted. I fancy none of the fashionable knitted goods are other than machine-made.

"Yes, especially the road to the Hereafter."

seated women, but their pose is so serene, so august, that they seem to be a part of some enormous, invisible mystery. Above them floats the immaterial eternal Reason, which all nature obeys and of which they themselves are the celestial servants.

"Thus all the masters come to the locked door of the Unknowable. Some of them beat their heads against it very lamentably; others, of a more smiling imagination, believe that through the wall they can hear the singing of birds in the secret garden."

"Master," I said, "you talk of other artists, but not of yourself. And yet you are one of those who have put the most of mystery into their art."

"My dear Gsell," said he, "if I have translated certain sentiments in my works, it is wholly useless for me to try to put them into words, for I am a sculptor, not a poet; people should be able to read them easily in my works; otherwise it would have been as well if those sentiments had never been mine."

"Just so. It seems to me that what especially appeals to you in human beings is the strange unrest of the soul imprisoned within the body. In your Balzac, genius, haunted by gigantic visions, shakes the ailing body like a rag, drives it into insomnia, and condemns it to the toil of a convict. And your busts have often reminded me of Rembrandt's portraits, for the Dutch master has also made us conscious of the appeal of the Infinite."

"What! You compare me to Rembrandt? A sacrilege! He is the colossus of art. Think what you are saying, my friend! But you are right when you see in my works the up-leading of the soul toward the perhaps chimerical realm of limitless truth and freedom. It is mystery that moves me most. Are you convinced, now, that art is a sort of religion?"

"Yes," said I.

Then he added slyly: "But you must remember that the first commandment of the religion, for those who would praise it, is: Learn absolute skill in the modeling of an arm, a torso, a thigh.

In the Limelight

Among the feminine stars to play engagements at the Columbia Theatre in the near future are Hattie Williams, Margaret Anglin, Maude Adams and Ethel Barrymore.

Marie Booth Russell's performance as Rosiland in "As You Like It" has evoked the highest praise in the East and her appearance in that role during the present engagement at the Columbia is sure to attract special attention.

At the second of Will Greenbaum's Sunday "Pop" Concerts Miss Dorothy Pasmore will play a group of rarely heard violincello works. The Lyric Quartette will play Haydn's charming No. 10, and with the assistance of F. M. Biggerstaff, pianist, Edgar Stillman Kelly's "Quintette" for piano and strings.

Myrtle Elvyn, a young American piano virtuosa, will be the next musical star to visit us. She is said to possess unusual talent and has made a success both as a recital artist and with the big Eastern symphony orchestras. Miss Elvyn opens here Sunday, March 6 and will also be heard in Oakland during the week.

Theatregoers will be pleased to learn that Henry W. Savage is to send Mabel Wilber, George Dameral, Oscar Figman and the other people of last year's "Merry Widow" cast to the Columbia Theatre for the presentation of the Lehar triumph.

My dear Bess:—

As I wrote you last week I should, I have been to the foothills not only once but several times. Each time something new appeals to me; each lot I've wandered over offers its own special attraction.

Really it is very hard to decide whether it is hill view, or water, or both without any trees in the ground—or a little higher in the hills with some galuptuous oak trees—I think after all it will be the oaks that will win the day. Have not even spoken to an agent yet, for I wanted to roam over the ground, unhampered as to time, and really choose for myself. This week however will settle the matter I'm sure for I simply can't and wont postpone the joy of acquiring a home of my own any longer. Each time I've been over it has been so warm that the earth was fairly shrieking at me to hurry and put in plants. All about in the lovely Crocker Tract I could see gardeners at work and it made me envious to think they had something to work on—which I hadn't.

Are you too getting interested? But never mind, you will be if you are not already—and then my haste to acquire, will be as a snail compared to yourself.

I'll write you again next week; in the meantime let me hear from you,—what you think of my plans.

Yours as ever,

—Claire.

endangered. Oh! if they only knew how little I cared for money! I would gladly give up all the treasures on earth for one true, loving heart!"

The low, monotonous voice ceased. A soft flush suffused her face, her eyes shone through gathering tears. With a quick movement she stretched out her hand for the decanter, but the young man anticipated her wish, and pouring out some water into a crystal glass, handed it to her. For a moment his dark eyes glanced into hers, and again, this time obviously frightened, her lids fluttered and fell.

The young man bent nearer—the end of his soft beard brushed her face. A deep crimson wave dyed her white, blue-veined neck; slowly spreading over her whole face to the very roots of her golden hair. Her heart throbbed violently, her breast rising and falling with each palpitating breath. Then as if actuated by a great fear, she sprang up and ran to the window.

It was profoundly quiet. The city seemed like dead—only among the branches of the chestnut-tree, whose shadow was sharply outlined on the brilliantly moonlit street, could be heard, as though awakened from their slumber, the soft chirping of many birds. The moon cast its rays over the neighboring roofs, sliding along the walls of the houses to the deserted streets The soft wind played among the lilac bushes, whose fragrance filled the whole room. The refreshing breeze somewhat cooled the burning cheeks of the young woman as she sat in the window-embrasure, completely under the spell of the spring night.

The doctor had followed her to the open window. His senses drank in the intoxications of the night. The proximity of the beautiful love-starved woman made his heart beat furiously. He realized that he was under the influence of a charm of which he had not dreamed the day before, and which the following day might dispel. This young creature by his side was so different from all the women he had hitherto met! A wild, passionate desire took possession of him to clasp in his arms the beautiful form that lay half reclining on the window-seat, with wide-open shining eyes turned towards the moon, whose soft rays seemed to wrap her round as if with a shimmering silver mantle.

"Of what are you thinking?" he asked, leaning towards her as though he wished to read her answer in her eyes.

Without reply, she lowered her eyes. How soft and alluring his voice sounded. It had vibrated with suppressed passion, which seemed to this woman, hungering for affection, like a message from some enchanted, mysterious land, a passionately longed-for world of love and happiness, hitherto unknown to her. Her whole frame trembled beneath his burning gaze. Pressing her hands to her tumultuously beating heart, she sprang to her feet, full of a vague terror.

"Are you angry with me?" he asked. And upon her answering in a gentle, caressing tone, "No, no!" he drew her to him, covering her white neck and arms with burning kisses.

Carried away by his passion, he paid no attention to her despairing entreaties. Firmly but delicately he imprisoned her hands. with which she vainly endeavored to push him away, murmuringly reassuringly:

"But, my dearest, we are no longer children, but grown man and woman, free from prejudices, recognizing as sole master our own will and desires."

Though she did not fully comprehend the import of his words, she was seized with a great fear, and with a violent movement wrenched herself free from his encircling arms.

A large moth flew through the open window and began to circle round the lamp, nearer and nearer the deadly flame, until with a last flutter of its poor, singed wings, it fell lifeless to the floor. Like one in a dream the young woman stood spellbound, regarding this pathetic picture of destruction. The man at her side laughed mockingly.

"You are strangely sentimental," he said. "The death of that insect has unnerved you, as if the same fate did not often befall us human beings. And we are drawn by the glare of light, of love and beauty—and we burn our wings. You have pity for the insignificant little insect, but my passion fails to move you. Be reasonable, dearest. I love you!"

Indignation, terror, disgust and loathing took possession of her. All traces of emotion disappeared from her face. She stood pale and motionless, like an angry goddess, with extended arms ready to repulse him. The veil which had obscured her senses lifted, the charm vanished; she saw clearly. No, a thousand times no! That which she could expect from this man was not the life-giving nectar her starved heart longed for. Only her present unhappiness and solitude could have thus paralyzed her will, making her an easy prey to his brutal passion.

They stood yet a moment confronting each other in silence. Then the young man reached for his hat and gloves and slowly went towards the door. Reaching the threshold, he turned around once more, as if hoping to be recalled, but she placed her small trembling hand on the silver bell. He understood, and without a word left the room.

She drew a deep breath—a breath of deliverance and safety. The enervating, sweet odor of heliotrope had given place to the cool, fresh air of the spring night.

Only the poor little burnt insect lay with outstretched wings, stiff and still on the carpet at her feet.

Auto Notes

An unsolicited testimonial for Diamond Tires has just been received by The Diamond Rubber Co. from Mr. F. O. Baum of Willows who writes that up to date he has received 11,000 miles each from his two Diamond front tires on his Locomobile and that they look good for two or three thousand miles more. Not a puncture has been made in them as yet.

After looking over the anti-skid devices on the market Mr. E. Oppenheim, Sacramento County agent for the E. M. F., has concluded that the new Diamond Grip casings are what he wants for his car and has placed his order for them. Among the many other recent purchasers of this popular type is W. W. Westover of Alameda.

A. R. Mires, Modesto agent for the E. M. F. car, writes that after covering some 20,000 miles over all kinds of roads and trying several makes of tires, he finds the Diamond Mountain Tread to give more mileage and better satisfaction than any other tire he used.

That the country offers the best market for motor cars is the opinion of H. P. Eakle of Woodland who has recently secured the agency for the Ford and Velie cars in that territory. Eakle purchased a late model of a Velie, driving the new car home, and reports having made a perfect score over the rough muddy roads. Besides purchasing a Velie, the Woodland motor agent reports having secured enough inquiries for new Ford machines to warrant his taking an extra allotment.

The automobile dealers' organizations of both Portland and Seattle have taken an important step in effecting an agreement to discontinue the taking of second-hand cars in exchange for new machines. The effect of this move is far reaching, and while it cannot be denied that it works a hardship on the automobile owner, it is the one solution to this most perplexing problem and without a doubt it is only a question of perhaps a very short time until the automobile dealers of San Francisco will be forced to take similar action.

Mr. A. G. Schindler of Fallon, Nevada, has purchased an E-M-F which he is having shipped to Nevada where he will use it in connection with his large land holdings.

Mr. Charles Dumphy of San Francisco has purchased an E-M-F.

J. L. Whitmore, agent for the Pioneer Automobile Company at Stockton, is in this city placing orders for cars. Mr. Whitmore states that there is a heavy demand for cars in and around Stockton and that the prospects for the coming season are excellent.

H. Holman, a retired merchant, has purchased a three passenger Babcock electric coupe from Calvin C. Eib, sales manager of the Pioneer Automobile Company. Mrs. Holman will be taught to operate the car and she expects to use it frequently about her new home near San Mateo.

The Hudson Motor Car Co. plans by the middle of next summer to be manufacturing automobiles in a new factory which it proposes to erect at a cost of $400,000 in the district known as old Fairview. This announcement was made Thursday by President Roy D. Chapin. The move, it is pointed out, will make of the adjacent territory an auto city, as factories to manufacture auto parts are expected to follow the erection of any one large plant. The Michigan Central railroad has promised to build a freight and passenger station in the vicinity.

W. H. Turner, mechanical expert from the Thomas factory, has arrived here after an extensive tour of the Northwest during which he visited the Thomas agencies. Mr. Turner reports that there is a heavy demand for cars in the Northwest and that the outlook for the coming year could hardly be better in that territory.

W. C. Hood, the coast representative of the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Car Company, will not return to San Francisco as he has been promoted to the general sales managership of the company succeeding Lee Counselman, who becomes vice-president of the corporation. During his brief stay on this coast Hood became very popular among automobilists and while rejoicing in his success they will be sorry to lose him.

Sonoma County is buying Buick "White Streaks" these days. Two carloads are being unloaded and delivered simultaneously, one at Petaluma by G. W. Rodehaver, and one at Santa Rosa by the Santa Rosa Garage, agents in their respective vicinities for Buick automobiles. Following their usual custom on similar occasions, the cars were unloaded and all paraded through the streets together, creating considerable interest and even excitement.

The P. & C. Auto Company of Santa Rosa have taken the agency for the E-M-F and Flanders "20" cars. They will get twenty cars for the season, and have already taken delivery of a number of E-M-F cars.

Word has been received by Ivan L. deJongh, manager of the Standard Motor Car Company, from H. W. Schuman of the above company, who made a run to Coalinga, to the effect that he arrived there after a strenuous trip from this city, in a Ford touring car. Schuman made the tour via Oakland and Gilroy and maintained on the trip an average of twenty-seven and one-half miles to a gallon of gasoline. Considering the rough condition of the roads the time made and the absence of trouble with the car is considered a remarkable test of the durability of the new Ford.

The one factor which has perhaps most of all assisted the development of the automobile has been the production, at reasonable cost, of steels that are exceptionally strong. Closely linked to this development of better steels has come the development of the annular ball bearing, which has helped to increase reliability. In the designing of a modern car, such as the new Thomas Model "M," plain bearings are proportioned to have long life, all bearings are of liberal sizes for the loads thrown upon them, axle strengths are in proper ratio to the weights to be carried, and, in a general way, the present day automobile is a combination of parts that are logically designed to take the working stress, so that today when a man purchases a motor car he can expect so many thousands of miles of use with practically no repairs and he can almost know in advance the total mileage that his car, if given reasonable care, will cover.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED TO THE EXECUTOR FOR THE SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5260, Dept. No. 10.

In the matter of the Estate of TERESA MURPHY, Deceased.

Valentine J. Smyth, as the Executor of the Last Will and Testament of TERESA MURPHY, deceased, having this day presented to this Court a verified petition praying for an Order authorizing and directing him to sell, as a whole or in parcels, and at either public or private sale, the real property and the whole thereof belonging to the Estate of said decedent, which is in said petition particularly described, and it appearing to this Court, from such petition, that it is necessary to sell the real estate and the whole thereof belonging to said estate for the purpose of paying the debts against said estate and the expenses and charges of administration, and it also appearing from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate, and those interested therein, to sell the said real estate and the whole thereof, for the purposes and reasons set forth in said petition; and this Court having thereupon and now and here directed that said petition be filed herein, and the same now having been filed accordingly, and being now on file herein:

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court at the Courtroom of Department Number 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, at the Southeast Corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Tuesday, the 15th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said executor for the sale of the real estate, and for the sale of the whole thereof, and for the sale of the same at either public or private sale, as said Executor shall judge to be most beneficial for the said Estate.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published once a week for four (4) successive weeks prior to the said 15th day of March, 1910, in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 7th day of February, 1910.

Letters

Some Good Books for Girls

Amy Brooks has added another volue to her popular "Dorothy Dainty Series." This time it is "Dorothy Dainty in the Country," where the little girl and her dear friend Nancy spend a long summer at a fashionable seaside hotel. Vera Vane, "the weather vane," reappears, and her madcap flightiness is productive of the usual disasters. Dorothy and Nancy make a new friend in a little French maid, the child of a farmer in the vicinity, and the gentle manners and unaffected good breeding of the two little heroines, which never stand in the way of their having the best kind of a time, is a great contrast to the pert rudeness of some of the other guests.

The "grown up" girls will welcome another chapter in the history of "Helen Grant," and regret that one more volume will bring her career to a close. Helen Grant, now graduated from college and having completed her post-graduate year, is spending her first year as a teacher in charge of a newly organized high school in a small town. Heretofore she has spent her time chiefly with girls, and the boys, who are amongst her pupils, are a new species with whom she must make acquaintance. While they are neither tough nor vicious, but "just boys," they manage to give her some disquieting moments growing out of their lack of earnestness and discipline, while the older girls, though less openly indifferent to their studies and opportunities, are decidedly more inclined for social than for scholastic triumphs. Miss Grant discovers, as most teachers speedily do, that the parents are in as much need of restraint as the children, but all's well that ends well, and a somewhat discouraging prospect at the beginning of the year ends in a highly gratifying retrospect with even greater promise for the future. All the old friends are accounted for in this volume and several new ones introduced. Helen Grant has proved a wholesome companion for the girls in their middle teens, and it would be a work of charity to divert the bewildered book buyers from the futile love stories usually presented to them as "girl's books," and call their attention to the Helen Grant Series by the well known author, Amanda M. Douglas.

"American Patty" can be commended to girls of all ages and to their mothers as well. It is another of Adele E. Thompson's patriotic stories and deals with the war of 1812 and the hardships imposed upon a family of Americans who had settled in Canada. They were just beginning to take some comfort in the new clearing when the war broke out. New neighbors, who had come direct from England and taken up a clearing within a mile of them promised companionship for the children, and with the friendship of the Indians and the good will of the other settlers, the Carters seemed to be happily and permanently settled. When war was declared everything was changed. Neither Mr. Carter nor his eldest son, Alson, would take the oath of allegiance to the king, and as both were liable to conscription and forced service, Alson having been actually drafted and taken into the army despite his protests, after which, because of their known sympathy with the Americans, the family was rigorously boycotted, they decided to leave Canada and return to the United States to begin again almost empty handed. The Carters were a real family, and their adventures, when the American fugitives were concealed in the house and the busy mother's little flax wheel played such an important part in securing their safety is a part of history. There are any number of other stirring adventures both before and during the winter journey across the frontier, where Patty, now that her father and brother were gone, though scarcely sixteen, had need for all her courage and wit. Adele Thompson's tales are especially commendatory because she deals chiefly with the domestic life of the women and children in the families of the absent patriotic fathers and brothers, and gives an insight into the trials and fears other than those of battle and siege, and it is in the home life that the history of nations is written. Of particular interest, after the main events in this volume is the contrast between the simple log house which was to be the home of the Morants, the new English emigrants, and the elaborate furniture which they had brought so far, with so much difficulty, only to find that they could scarcely find room for their wardrobes and mahogany tables in their restricted quarters, and that, without the ready, practical suggestions of young Alson Carter, who was only a big boy, though used to frontier existence, they could never have brought much of it indoors at all. There is need for such books as these, now that the older generation has passed away, and children can no longer gather about their grandmothers by the fire place in the evenings to listen at first hand to tales of Indians and wolves, of venison fresh killed from the doorstep, bread baked in the "kettle," herbs gathered from the fields and spices crushed in the mortar. Very few twentieth century children could tell what is meant by a "spider" or a "creepie," and before long we shall need glossaries to help them to understand these other days. All from the press of Lothrop, Lee and Shepard.

Banquets Given to Statues

A Parisian lady who died recently won a certain amount of notoriety in the French capital by entertaining at dinner for over a decade a marble statue of her late husband. From the day of her partner's death until her own decease she always dined with the statue, which was five feet in height, placing it at the head of the table and setting before it food and viands by way of oblation.

The late King of Bavaria always had a bust of Marie Antoinette by his side when he sat down to dinner. He regarded the stone image absolutely the same as if it were the Queen herself, placing the most costly viands for its consumption and speaking to it in tender tones.

There is an old gentleman living near Glasgow who has for several years dined daily with a statue. He is a bachelor, and the statue is a counterfeit presentment of his sister with whom he lived and who died suddenly of heart failure. At her death an exact model of her in a sitting posture was chiselled by a sculptor, and this was attired in her clothes and placed by her bereaved brother in a chair in his dining-room. From that day to this the statue has occupied a seat at his dinner-table, with a maid-servant standing beside it, whose duty it is to place food and drink for it at every meal.

It will be remembered that Mr. Clyde Fitch, the dramatist, gave a banquet once at which there were a number of half-human-size dolls, dressed to represent the female characters in certain of his plays.

Cases of sculptors falling in love with the figures they chisel are by no means uncommon. One sculptor became so entranced with one of his works that he used to worship it in a most extraordinary fashion. Another knight of the mallet chiselled a Venus, and fell in love with it to such an extent that on several occasions he entertained it at dinner-table, inviting his fellow-sculptors to toast it in bumpers of champagne.

Strange Engagement Rings

During the hearing of a breach of promise case tried at the Macroon Quarter Sessions, County Cork, it transpired that the engagement ring which the defendant had presented to the plaintiff was originally made for the purpose of putting through a pig's nose.

In another case heard some time back, the defendant stated that he did not consider himself called upon to fulfill his promise to marry the plaintiff as the engagement ring on which much of the evidence turned came from the interior of a Christmas cracker. The jury, however, while not traversing the truth of this statement, showed by the verdict that they did not consider that the defendant's meanness had invalidated the significance of his gift.

No niggard spirit was it that prompted a young man to have his fiancee's engagement ring made from a portion of an old horse-shoe which he found when on his way to the lady's house to put the fateful question.

Another iron substitute was a section cut from the barrel of a pistol which many years previously had been the instrument of avenging the outraged honor of a member of the bridegroom's family. In this instance, however, the dull hue of the grim memento was relieved by the insertion of a ruby, an opal, a sapphire, and an emerald, the initial letters of which gems formed the bride's Christian name.

By the advice of a lady on whom his affections were fixed, a Liverpool gentleman was rash enough to engage in a law action. Though he gained the day, the nominal damages of one farthing left him a heavy pecuniary loser. When subsequently he became engaged to his fair adviser, he had the small bronze coin that had constituted his legal award made into a ring, which was accepted by his future wife in the same spirit of humor in which it was offered.

Novelist—My dear, before you go out, do you remember which is the unlucky month for marriage?

Novelist's Wife—I don't know, but we were married in November!

The Taft Speech

In his Lincoln Day speech President Taft credited his illustrious predecessor with having by means of "what almost may be compared to a religious crusade, inflamed the people against the aggressions of corporate greed" and put public opinion in "an apt condition to bring about the reforms needed to clinch his policies and make them permanent in the form of enacted law." This is quite true, and doubtless if President Taft had gone no further the average worshiper of Roosevelt would be inclined to applaud, but the President added that we find "as an inevitable aftermath of such agitation a condition of hysteria on the part of certain individuals, and on the part of others a condition of hypocrisy, manifesting itself in the blind denunciation of all wealth and in the impeachment of the motives of men of the highest character and by demagogic appeals to the imagination of a people greatly aroused upon the subject of party and honesty in the administration of government." Thus the President has described exactly the staple ingredients of strong Roosevelt sentiment wherever it is to be found. And consequently no Roosevelt boomer is to be found applauding the President's observations. No man likes to be branded either as a hypocrite or a victim of hysteria. Concurring in the President's views, the only comment that we care to make thereon is that candor unrestrained by the sacred obligations of friendship might have prompted the President to reprobate the systematic frenzy of the astute politician to whom he gave just recognition as the author of the hysteria and the inspiration of the hypocrisy which now infest the country.

A Reformer's Revelation

Once more we are permitted to take a peep into the soul of a reformer; and, as is usually the case, we are struck with the ugliness of it. On the witness stand in Congress Mr. Louis R. Glavis related that when Land Commissioner Dennett was in Seattle he used one Spalding as a stenographer, and that he (Glavis) instructed Spalding, who was his own stenographer, to furnish him with carbon copies of all letters written by the commissioner. Several of these letters, obtained by Glavis in the manner described, were introduced in evidence in the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation. Mr. Glavis gave his testimony without a blush. Apparently he was absolutely unconscious of the significance of his conduct. This is the Glavis who was dismissed from the forestry service by President Taft for suppressing evidence favorable to Secretary Ballinger, against whom he had leveled certain accusations. By his own confession with reference to the Dennett correspondence he has borne out President Taft's estimate of his character. Nevertheless he is still a reformer in good standing. He enjoys the confidence of Gifford Pichot, the esteem of Collier's Weekly and the admiration of all incorruptible guardians of the public weal.

Our Transit Problem

From the dailies we learn that thousands of people have had their spirits depressed by the news that the United Railroads has concluded that it would not be wise to expand its street car system for the benefit of some of our new residential districts. These people have built homes remote from the center of the city believing that extensions of the street car service would soon be made for their benefit. Not to have this service is to these people a calamity; and to the merchants in the downtown district it means a considerable loss. For this deplorable situation who is to blame? It is attributed entirely to our passion for experiment in municipal ownership, a passion artfully and systematically engendered by appeals to popular prejudice. As we have resolved to engage in the street car business and to absorb all street railroads as quickly as the franchises expire, the stockholders of the United Railroads have naturally come to the conclusion that it would not be sound business policy to spend money on property from which they must part before it can be made to produce a profit on the investment. These public service magnates have no philanthropic impulses so far as the dear people who have been taught to hate them are concerned. Realizing that it would be folly from the business standpoint to spend any more money than is absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the roads now in operation, they have resolved to husband their resources. So as a result of our eagerness to teach the United Railroads a lesson we have learned one much to our own disgust. We have learned that municipal ownership has a tendency to discourage private enterprise and stop the flow of coin into the channels of trade. To be sure in the course of time the transit problem of this mighty city will be solved by its removal forever from the sinister shadow of the bloated bondholder. In that distant, millennial day when the straphanger will be enjoying the luxury of an upholstered chair, the pampered proletariat will be pacified, but meanwhile a distressing dilemma confronts us, and we can do nothing more than appeal to the sagacious, omniscient advocates of municipal ownership for advice. They were most generous with their counsel up to the final election at which the people voted to issue bonds for the building of a railroad on Geary street. Since then they have been preoccupied with other matters of vital importance, except occasionally when they could find time to execrate the United Railroads for its indifference to the interests of the dear people. Now it may be extremely edifying to abuse the octopus, but the material advantages to be derived from the pastime are somewhat shadowy. The indications are that unless we can soon have municipal railroads on many thoroughfares we shall be in a badly crippled condition. To be saved from what appears to be our fate is what most deeply concerns us now. We do not believe that redemption is to be effected by means of denunciation or by such silly threats of reprisal as the Examiner has been indulging in. "Spend your money and lose it or we'll take your roads away from you," shrieks the Examiner. Mr. Hearst's paper is on the rampage. Having spanked Judge Murasky for not punishing small boys that steal Mr. Hearst's nickels, the Examiner purposes disciplining Capital in the same way.

Astronomy and Scripture

According to some astronomers there is a possibility of us all being asphyxiated by the tail of Halley's comet. In contemplating a catastrophe of this character the scientists seem to be indifferent to the teaching of Christianity; for we are told by the New Testament that the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, not as a comet whose approach is to be reckoned by mathematicians. Also we are told that in that day "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." Between Scripture and the speculations of astronomers every man may take his choice. Nowadays there are many people who place more confidence in science than in religion and who are under the impression that the attitude sustained toward each other by science and religion is one of hostility and distrust. The truth is that there are not a few men of high and wide culture on both sides, who, above the din and strife, are able to discern a meeting place for the scattered rays of life which fall on either side. Learned men, among them William Gladstone, have reconciled geology and Genesis. They have interpreted the Bible narrative as we have interpreted psalms and prophecies, liberally and often figuratively, and they have seen many points of accord between the story of Creation written in the Bible and the story written on the strata under their feet. Though the principle of evolution is believed to be in conflict with religion Mr. Darwin never admitted that there was any irreligious tendency in his views. And astronomers, basing their reasoning upon ascertained facts, have concluded that the Galilean fisherman knew what learning for thousands of years had failed to discover; that, as Shakespeare expresses it—

"The great Globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve."

But admitting this conclusion to be correct it does not follow that Halley's comet is not about to destroy some life on this planet. Who knows but that this comet is the great epoch maker of the universe? Perhaps Halley's comet played havoc with the earth before the advent of man. Perhaps the comet's tail was what extinguished the lives of those curious animals that roamed the earth thousands of years before Adam found himself in the Garden of Eden. All of which we have suggested with a view of indicating that there is a connection between science and religion, and that science is a means of quickening our curiosity in religion. New problems in science may embarrass us for a time, but they turn our thoughts to God, whip up the reserved forces of the religious nature and keep it from stagnating. More than once in the history of the world science has arrested the decay in religion.

Woman's Dependent Independence

One of those gentlemen, interesting as they are courageous, who deliver afternoon lectures before women's clubs, has been explaining to the cultured members of the California Club the task which woman is destined to accomplish in the twentieth century. From fragmentary reports of his remarks it may be gathered that that task is little less than the general reformation of the world. The accomplishment of this task, however, is not a foregone conclusion, for, according to the lecturer, it depends on two things; the recognition of women's rights as identical with those of men and at the same time, the adequate protection of women by men. Here we have a very interesting statement, one which may be supposed to have made instant appeal to the members of the California Club if those intellectual women share with others of their gentle sex a dislike for the processes of logic. Reduced to its simplest form the statement means that women must be recognized as independent of men and at the same time dependent on them. Surely this is no distortion of the lecturer's position. If women obtain the ballot and other privileges now limited to the masculine sex, they will cease to dominate the world as they do now, by indirection, and will acquire a direct and independent influence over events. But if at the same time they are to insist that their peculiar feminine functions entitle them to the protection of the sterner sex, they will still be to a very serious extent dependent. It looks as though this will be rather an anomalous situation and yet that it is a situation desired by the women of the California Club may be inferred, for none raised her voice in objection to the lecturer's words. It may be that the lecturer intended to convey the idea that women are to be independent during one part of their lives and dependent during another. In spinsterhood and in certain periods of married life, perhaps, women are to exercise all the rights enjoyed by man; that is, they are to pursue the learned professions, devote themselves to the arts and sciences and to the problems of government and even, if they see fit, to the winning of daily bread side by side with men. But during the period of gestation and the subsequent period when the care of the child monopolizes their attention, (provided of course they consent to accept these responsibilities), they will forego the exercise of the rights which they have wrested from man and demand his protection. It would be difficult to determine by the a priori method whether this situation would be less anomalous than that of simultaneous independence and dependence. There is a possibility that in her determination to focus all her activities on her newfound independent rights woman would refuse to accept the responsibilities of marriage or, horrible thought! refuse even to enter into the married state. In that event man would be compelled to hire a housekeeper as he at present hires a stenographer and as for the perpetuation of the human species, that could be accomplished only by an Amazonian arrangement. But the complications are too dreadful to contemplate. Will the ladies of the California Club kindly refrain from suggesting these unpleasant trains of thought?

The Vitality of American Oratory

Once more we are told that for parliamentary purposes oratory is no longer of any value. For proof of this assertion Congress is cited. In the nation's legislature there are several gentlemen who pride themselves on their eloquence, who indulge in verbal cannonading, without having any influence on legislation. They are heard but not heeded. Their speeches are printed in the Congressional Record and nobody reads them. All this is quite true, yet it does not follow that oratory is no longer of any value. To hold that what passes for oratory in Congress is the art that was practiced by Demosthenes, by Burke and by Webster, is as absurd as to confound one of Marie Corelli's sloppy novels with the literature of Balzac and Scott. There is a vast difference between facility in declamation and the power of moving people and bringing conviction to their minds. It is the difference that existed between Cicero and Demosthenes. After listening to one of Cicero's diffuse and published speeches his Roman admirers remarked, "What a splendid speech our orator has made." But when the Athenians heard Demosthenes they were so imbued with the subject matter of his oration that they forgot the orator and went forth breathing defiance to their enemies. In oratory the greatest art is to conceal art, and it consists of something more than fine phrases. The popular harangue may be effective in the passionateness of its outbursts; the mob has been often moved by nothing more than melodious thunders of loquacious wrath, but the greatest orators were men skilled in the unfolding of the didactic process, the aim of which is to appeal to intelligence as well as to feeling, to prove something, to compel conviction. It is not enough for the orator to rouse emotion; he must have dominion over the critical faculty. To be an influential parliamentarian he must be skilled in debate, deft in elaborating set speeches and quick at repartee. In discussion he must be able to exhaust argument, illustration, ingenuity and research; he must have a demonstration to persuade the incredulous, an enthusiasm to inflame the cold and indifferent. If his purpose is to win admiration for his rhetorical powers he will accomplish nothing else. They that hold that oratory is no longer of any value err not only from misapprehension as to the art of oratory; they have embraced the delusion that the people having become much enlightened are quick to detect the smell of the lamp or inkhorn and are immune to the powers of eloquence. This idea is akin to that which is indulged by people who, while conceiving it to be to their credit that melodrama cannot stir their emotions, are easily susceptible to the baldest kind of theatrical balderdash when it is flung at them under the name of comedy drama. These people are of the nil admirari cult, their affectation is the peculiarity of puny minds, the coxcombry of the conceited illiterate. Now as a matter of fact the people at large are not immune to the powers of eloquence. On the contrary, they are susceptible to the appeals of grandiloquent claptrap. That the eloquence which shows nothing more than that the orator can talk has a hold on the people is evident from the money that is accumulated on the Chautauqua circuit by such distinguished bloviators as William J. Bryan and "Battle Bob" La Follette. Measuring success by the pecuniary standard Bryan is the most successful of all American orators, yet it is hardly to be said of him that his tongue drops manna, or that upon the canned honey of it any intelligent man ever hangs as the bee upon the flower. His words are not like syrens' notes, nor yet like notes of dying swans, yet he charms the sense of the mob and commands the loyalty of millions of his enlightened countrymen. He is not a statesman grounded in the science of government, he has not the eloquence of a Burke or a Webster; with all his immeasurable yards of talk he has given us but one sentence that lives in memory and that one does not even deserve to be compared to sounding of brass or tinkling of cymbals. Oratory lives wherever Bryan circulates and his circuit is as the circumference of his country.

Perspective Impressions

A poet has been singing of "The Charms of Cold Storage." That's probably where his Muse belongs.

It is said that the reception to be given to Mr. Roosevelt on his return "will be the greatest thing of its kind ever seen here or anywhere else." Quite natural. Everything that Roosevelt figures in is by virtue of that circumstance alone the greatest thing of its kind. He has a monopoly of superlatives and his trust is above the law.

HE WILL HURT THEIR BUSINESS

—Houston Post.

The Hon. Francis J. Heney scored another characteristic triumph in Portland. It is entitled, "Jury Disagreed."

A poll taken by the Chicago Tribune shows that there are more Republican editors for Roosevelt than for Taft. In view of the election of Gaynor, Fitzgerald and McCarthy in spite of newspaper opposition, what does it avail a man nowadays to have the support of the degenerate daily press?

SYMPATHY

—New York World.

The New York Premiere of Strauss' "Electra"

(Richard Strauss' "Electra" was recently produced for the first time in America at the Manhattan Opera House. This opera has caused almost as great a stir among musicians and musical critics as the same composer's "Salome." "Electra" is founded on a drama by Hugo von Hoffmansthal, a young Austrian author who has treated this favorite theme of the Greek tragedians after the "atmospheric" fashion of Maeterlinck. In preparing a musical setting for the drama Strauss has outdone all his previous eccentricities of counterpoint. He employs forty-three themes with numerous variants and developments and shuffles the orchestral instruments in a bewildering manner. Madame Schumann-Heink who sang in the original Dresden production described the opera as a grand unsweet song of shrieks, groans and sighs, and declared that she would never take part in it again. The following critique of the New York premiere is from the pen of Miss Helen M. Stocking, a gifted musical critic of this city.—Editor's note.)

By Helen M. Stocking

With one's spirit still turbulent with the fever of an enormous excitement, one's nerves tense from an almost unparalleled experience, the first impression of the music tragedy of "Electra," as just given at its New York premiere, seems almost indescribable. At least, one feels justified in using extreme adjectives. For to begin with, the audience was remarkable—as would be expected at the first performance of this most conspicuous of modern artistic sensations. There was more than the customary glitter in the Manhattan Opera House boxes, but nothing so frivolous as the display of jewels or beauty, could hold sway on such a night. Nothing less than the arrival of one after another of the most conspicuous figures of the artistic elite of New York could fix the attention of the restless and feverishly expectant audience. There were those who came full of abhorrent curiosity, bristling with indignation against the composer's morbidity of subject matter. Of those acquainted with the audacities of Strauss' style, there were his over-zealous admirers ready to justify the offensiveness of the drama, and defend him against familiar accusations, and the others with their tirade on the decadence of modern music. Of course, there were, too, the inevitable sensation lovers, excited by a morbid emotionalism. But the larger part of the audience was composed of the greatest musical minds of the city come to judge this most discussed and prodigiously complex and ingenious of all modern scores. But surely those for whom it was the first hearing of the Strauss opera, must have found a calm, judicious critical consideration difficult, for it would seem that only he who could for the moment lose sight of the fiercely waged aesthetic battle and yield to the supreme mastery of emotional effect, could do entire justice to his own judgment or to the opera. For bow as we will or not, to its tyranny, there are some preconceived ideas which must fall before its subjecting force.

From the moment the curtain rises on the one scene and act of the opera, one is under the influence of the dominant mood and atmosphere of the Hoffmansthal version of the ancient Greek tragedy of "Electra," and the music, from first to last, is steeped in the colors of horror, brutality and revenge. Nevertheless, from the snarlings and hissing of the orchestral opening, Electra's intense and passionate apostrophy to Agamemnon, her murdered father, rises so full of dignity and tenderness, that one is made to feel that a certain nobility may underlie even mad revenge, and that the mighty fury which consumes the haggard, disheveled Electra is an intellectual rather than a sensual one. One becomes dimly conscious of some tremendous material power, an elemental force, an inevitable Fate which makes the succeeding tragedy of crime fall short of the anticipated overpowering horror.

For the wild shrieking, the orchestral thundering of horrible dissonances in antagonistic keys, we have been prepared by the sensational stories from abroad which heralded the advent of the work here. And there are many such long, dull, dreary wastes for the suffering ear to endure. But the extraordinary significance and characterization of tone combination which robs some of the most brutal cacophonies of their hideousness, and makes them unbelievably acceptable, must remain undreamt of until heard.

Such memorable passages as the orchestral prelude to the entrance of Klytemnestra, in which are heard the footsteps of the sacrificial beasts, or the lurid orchestral background to the digging for the ax, or the unimaginable effect of those appalling moments of suspense during the murder when one ceases to hear and only feels the throbs of the orchestra as heart-beats; all these must influence one's conception of dramatic music and open a new and unimagined vista.

But no doubt the moments least expected, and of the greatest surprise to many were those of eloquence of orchestral song when a benignity of sweet musical beauty, a radiance of definite humanity illuminates such superb and pathetic passages as that which accompanies the recognition of Orestes by Electra.

The realization is borne upon one how inadequate any analysis of the motives, or description of the method of construction is towards a preconception of the richly-hued orchestral characterizations. Who could attempt to describe the broadly delineative and extraordinarily minute orchestral enforcement of dramatic action; the sardonic satire of Electra's meeting with Aegisthus and his murder, of Klytemnestra's death, and finally of the overpowering and mad emotion of Electra's marvelous dance of death which leaves one gasping, unable to realize how, out of the undeniable morbid horror of it, one has been carried to real inspirational heights of dramatic exaltation.

Trembling from the relaxation of the excessive tension of two hours, the first thought of the audience was for the wonderful woman who had accomplished the seemingly superhuman performance of impersonating Electra with such amazing force, endurance and vivid realism, and whose supreme moments were touched with a genius worthy of a Bernhardt.

Waves of applause swept over the house, men and women stood and shouted bravos as Madame Mazarin appeared with the other artists, the conductor of the orchestra leaped upon the stage and embraced her.

One feels grateful for the cheerful clapping of hands, the smile on that tragic mask of Electra, in those haunting, burning eyes. And then, as the audience cheered, Madame Mazarin swayed, and, amid gasps of sympathy, fell fainting to the floor and was carried unconscious behind the curtain. A hush fell over the standing crowd, and not for some minutes did the people begin, slowly, reluctantly, to leave the theatre, murmuring breathless words of "marvelous," "extraordinary," "astounding" and their equivalent in various languages. Sensations to the very end! Could Strauss himself have wished it more effective?

A Resemblance

You ask me why I smile and sigh
  To watch you as you come and go;
I love you, child, and this is why:
  You seem what I was long ago.

Your shadowed eyes are quick with gleams
  Of changing hope and joy and woe,
And deep with light of inward gleams:
  You seem what I was long ago.

Your head in Grecian marble pure,
  In Attic summers made to glow,
Where snows in azure skies endure;
  You seem what I was long ago.

Each day I stretch my hands and cry:
  "I give you all the love I know!"
Each day you laugh and pass me by;
  You seem what I was long ago.

Philogeorgos, or Concerning Bribery: A Platonic Fragment

By A. D. G.

Going down the other day to the Kerameikos, I met my friend Philogeorgos, who is at present one of those who desire to hold office in the city. And I said to him:

"Philogeorgos, you look sad; is it because you fear lest you should not be elected Archon?"

"No, Socrates," he replied. "It is not that which saddens me; it is the baseness of those who try to prevent the people from choosing me."

"In what way do they act basely?" I asked.

"There is a certain wine-seller," he said, "who is offering what the Hyperboreans call Free Drinks (that is, you know, draughts of wine without payment) to all those who will vote for Misogeorgos, but not for me."

"That is very unkind of the wine-seller. But why do you say that the transaction is base?"

"Why, of course it is base. How can it be anything else?"

"When we predicate baseness of a transaction," I said, "we must also predicate baseness of those who are concerned in it, or at least of one of them. Now, Philogeorgos, let me ask you a question; for you are accustomed by this time to answer questions. When you wish for a pair of shoes or a flute, how do you obtain one?"

"How else," he said, "except by buying it from a shoemaker or a maker of flutes?"

"How else, indeed?" I replied. "So, then, the tradesman gives you something which he possesses; and you give the tradesman in return something which you possess. And this exchange is advantageous to both of you, and honorable; is it not?"

"I suppose so."

"And neither of you becomes base?"

"Neither."

"Then it is not a base transaction?"

"No."

"Now consider in this way: Does a vote belong to the man who possesses a vote?"

"Yes, Socrates; but I am afraid that you are going to quibble, as usual."

"It is only by dialectic," I replied, "that we can arrive at the truth. And the wine belongs, I suppose, to the wine-seller?"

"It would seem so, at least."

"Then, when the wine-seller gets the voter's vote in exchange for his own wine, they simply give each other what each possesses; and such a transaction, as you have said, is advantageous to both parties, and honorable, and not base at all."

"I said," he replied, rather angrily, "that you were going to quibble. Of course, the case is quite different. A vote is a sacred thing; and it ought not to be exchanged for the satisfaction of mere bodily desires, such as the desire for drink."

"Nor for any other material comfort?" I asked.

"Certainly not," he replied.

"Nobly spoken, indeed!" I said. "But I confess, all the same, that you rather surprise me; for only this morning I heard the herald proclaiming in your name that all the citizens would have Free Food if they voted for Philogeorgos. And I remember how some years ago either Phaidrolithos or one of those around him used to promise at elections that everyone should have three acres of land and a cow, on condition that the city kept him and his party in power. You do not mean to tell me that what Phaidrolithos or his friends did was base?"

"No, indeed," he replied. "But surely, Socrates, even you must see that this is a different matter altogether."

"How different? You say that votes must not be exchanged for material comforts; yet Free Food is a material comfort; and so are three acres, because they produce food; and so, I presume, is a cow. And these things were offered to the voter in exchange for his vote, just as the wine-seller now is offering draughts of wine."

"No, Socrates, it is not the same thing at all. When I talk of Free Food, and when men like Phaidrolithos talk of land and cows, we do not give these things immediately in exchange for votes. We could not; they are not ours to give; we have not got them."

"That is very true," I said. "For I remember when Phaidrolithos and his party were put in power many people used to come to those in authority and demand that they should now receive three acres of land each and a cow; and when they did not receive these things they were indignant, as having been deceived. And I daresay that when you are in power men will come expecting to receive Free Food, and will not get it. But, as far as I understand your argument, it is honorable to promise in return for a vote that which you cannot give; but when one promises that which he can give, as the wine-seller does, that is base, and that makes you sad. Is it not so? And the reason seems to be that when the wine-seller offers Free Drinks for a vote, then the vote is sold; but when you offer Free Food for a vote, then it is not the vote which is sold, but only the voter."

"Socrates," said Philogeorgos, "you are a philosopher; and no philosopher ever understood politics. But I am busy, and have really no more time to waste upon you and your dialectics."

"Farewell, then, Philogeorgos," I said; "but please do not be angry with me for being so stupid. And if I were you," I continued, "I do not think I would be angry with the wine-seller either; for perhaps the draughts of wine will make the citizens drunk, especially when they need not be paid for; and when a citizen is drunk he will run the risk of voting for you rather than for Misogeorgos. Do you not think so?"

But Philogeorgos was already out of hearing.

UNION SQUARE SAN FRANCISCO

The Strong-Box of the Humberts

By Maurice Leblanc (From the French)

At three in the morning there were still a few carriages waiting in front of a private house on the Boulevard Berthier. The door of this house opened and a group of guests emerged. The carriages were at once filled and whirled away, leaving on the street only two gentlemen who walked together as far as the rue de Courcelles, where one of them lived, and the other was left to proceed on foot to his home near the Porte Maillot.

This gentleman crossed the Avenue de Villiers and walked rapidly. He found a pleasure in walking on this clear, cold winter's night, and his footsteps resounded gaily on the stones as he advanced.

After a few minutes, however, he felt the unpleasant sensation of being followed, and, indeed, when he turned around he saw a shadow gliding through the trees. He was not a coward, and yet he hastened his steps, hoping to arrive the sooner at the guardhouse of the Ternes. Then his pursuer began to run, and, quite disturbed, the gentleman thought it advisable to draw his revolver from his pocket and face the individual. He was too late, for the man attacked him violently, and a struggle began on the deserted street, a hand-to-hand struggle in which he felt at once that he was at a disadvantage. He cried for help and tried to escape, but was thrown backwards violently upon a pile of stones and seized by the throat while his adversary thrust a handkerchief into his mouth. His eyes closed and his ears began to buzz; he was about to lose consciousness. Then suddenly the grip on his throat loosened and the man, under whose incubus he was suffocating, rose to defend himself against an unexpected attack from a new-comer.

He received a blow from a cane on his wrist and a kick on his ankle, then, howling with pain, he fled, limping and swearing.

Without deigning to pursue him, the new-comer leaned over and asked:

"Are you wounded, monsieur?"

He was not wounded, but badly shaken up and unable to proceed on foot. Luckily one of the men on duty at the guard-house now arrived, having heard the cries for help. He went for a carriage and when it drew up, the gentleman and his rescuer got in and were driven to the former's house on the Avenue de la Grande-Armee.

When they stopped before the door the injured man was himself again and expressed his thanks most effusively.

"I owe you my life, monsieur, and you may be sure that I shall never forget it. I do not wish to alarm my wife at this time of the night, but I shall not be satisfied unless she expresses her gratitude to you this very day."

He begged him to come to the house to lunch and introduced himself as Ludovic Humbert, adding: "May I know to whom I have the honor of speaking?"

"Why certainly," replied the other. "My name is Arsene Lupin."

Arsene Lupin had not at that time, five years ago, the notoriety that came as the result of the Cahorn case, his escape from the prison de la Sante and so many other sensational exploits.

Thus it was that when he awoke a few hours later, he recalled with infinite pleasure the invitation that had been extended to him. At last he was approaching his goal. The Humbert millions, what a prey for such an appetite as his!

He dressed especially for the occasion, a threadbare frock coat, worn trousers, a silk hat of antiquated shape, frayed collar and cuffs, the whole quite clean but indicating poverty. Thus equipped, he descended the stairway from the lodging he occupied at Montmartre. At the third floor he rapped in passing on the panel of a door, using the head of his cane for the purpose. Reaching the street, he made his way to the exterior boulevard and leaped into a passing tram. A man mounted behind him. It was the lodger from the third floor, and they sat down side by side.

After a moment, this man said to him:

"Well, boss?"

"I am going there to lunch."

"You are going to lunch with them!"

"You ought not to expect me to expose for nothing a life as valuable as mine. Did I not save Monsieur Humbert from the sure death you were about to inflict upon him? Monsieur Humbert is a grateful man, and he has asked me to lunch with him."

After a moment's silence the other ventured:

"Then you cling to your original idea?"

"My dear boy," said Arsene, "after having planned that little hold-up and taken the trouble to stay awake until the early hours of the morning so as to rap you on the wrist and kick your shins, thus running the risk of injuring my only friend, do you imagine that I intend to abandon the advantages of an affair so well begun?"

"But what about the rumors that say their fortune is a farce?"

"Let them say what they will. For the last six months I have been making inquiries, studying the case, questioning the servants, the money-lenders and the puppets they employ. For six months I have been shadowing both husband and wife. Whether the fortune comes from old Brawford, as they claim, or from any other source, I know that it exists, and, since it exists, it shall be mine."

"The devil! A hundred millions!"

"Call it ten, or even five, what is the difference? There are great bundles of stocks and bonds in the strong-box. There will be the devil to pay if one day or the other I do not find the key."

The tramway stopped at the Arc de Triomphe.

"What am I do do now?" asked the subordinate.

"Nothing. I shall let you know later."

Five minutes afterward Arsene Lupin was climbing the stairway of the luxurious Humbert mansion, and Ludovic presented him to Madame Humbert. Gervaise was a nice, plump little woman and very talkative. She received Lupin most amiably.

"I preferred that we should lunch alone in honor of our rescuer," she said.

"Our rescuer" was immediately placed on a footing of intimacy and treated like an old friend. By the time dessert was served the intimacy had become absolute and confidences were freely exchanged. Arsene related the story of his life, told about his father, a magistrate of sterling integrity, the sorrows of his childhood and the troubles of the present. Gervaise also told of her girlhood, her marriage and the kindness of old Brawford, the hundred millions she had inherited, the obstacles to her enjoyment of this fortune, the loans she had been forced to take at exorbitant rates, her endless difficulties with Brawford's nephews, the injunction and, indeed, the whole story.

"Just think of it, Monsieur Lupin, the stocks and bonds are there, in the next room, my husband's office, and if we cut off a single coupon we lose it all!"

Monsieur Lupin felt a slight tremor.

"Ah, so they are there," said he, but his throat was so dry he could hardly utter the words.

An acquaintance thus favorably begun could only become more intimate. When delicately questioned, Arsene Lupin confessed his poverty and distress. At once

Mrs. Carter and a Dramatic Critic

Mrs. Leslie Carter has a tumultuous personality which involves her private career in actions as bizarre as any that she portrays behind the footlights. The unexpected flows as naturally from her restless temperament as a bromide does from the pen of her latest playwright. Mrs. Carter has a carmine disposition which flashes with emotions even as her shock of hair scintillates with color. No seer may ever hope to guess what Mrs. Carter will do next; even from herself that interesting secret is often hidden. Impulse is the breath of her nostrils; surprise is her second nature; to achieve the commonplace is beyond her power and alien to her desire. When Mrs. Carter was here recently with her laudanum melodrama of " Vasta Herne" she received the kindest consideration from the dramatic critics of the morning press. These gentlemen vouchsafed her play the compliment of serious attention, lavished their most flattering adjectives upon her acting and devoted a page in the Sunday papers to her views on art and David Belasco. The Carter-Belasco quarrel has two sides, like most quarrels and it was fitting that Mrs. Carter should give her version of it. But at least one critic did not satisfy Mrs. Carter in his report of her self-justification. That critic is Mr. Ralph E. Renaud of the Chronicle and in consequence of his failure to please he has just been treated to a bewildering view of the Carter personality.

An Interchange of Letters

Mr. Renaud is a discerning critic, not only of acting but of human nature; hence I take it that he was not unduly surprised when he received the following curious communication:

Sunday, February 13.

Dear Mr. Renaud:—

Of course you did not mean me to consider seriously your effort in my behalf in last Sunday's Chronicle. I thank you though for any trouble you took and am glad if I was of service to you in your copy. Usually I should feel inclined to resent libel!—but in this instance it only made me laugh.

The ax was so apparent that it didn't even hurt, and after all I gave you a chance to exploit—yourself! But seriously, if you did anything for me please accept my thanks.

Faithfully,

—Leslie Carter.

Mr. Renaud's reply was couched in the following terms of admirable restraint:

My Dear Mrs. Carter,

Permit me to thank you for your graceful acknowledgement of my interview with you. Naturally I did not mean you to consider seriously my effort on your behalf, as I was not aware either that I had made one or had implied making one. My effort was solely on behalf of the readers of The Chronicle. Incidentally, however, I am glad that it carried with it the rare privilege of making you laugh. We are now on common ground, for your suggestion of "libel" affords me a similar privilege. If you are still in a humorous mood, I will be pleased to furnish you with a transcript of my notes, which I chanced to keep with no anticipation of the mutual satisfaction they might give us. The original draught will prove, I think, that I did not quote you for one word you did not utter. "By their acts shall they be known," it is said; I am sorry that you should spell it "ax."

With renewed assurances of esteem and regard, believe me

Sincerely yours,

—Ralph E. Renaud.

If Mrs. Carter sees fit to reply her answer should be very interesting.

The Carter Temper Rebuked

During Mrs. Carter's recent engagement at the Van Ness one of her audiences was treated to an exhibition of her continuously outcropping temperament—or perhaps temper is the more fitting word. It was on Wednesday night, the third of her engagement. On that occasion Mrs. Carter was visibly perturbed and her disquieted mind found solace at the expense of her luckless leading man. From time to time during the progress of the hectic melodrama she vented her dissatisfaction with his acting in despairing gestures and audible exclamations addressed to the audience. Quite plainly by word and action she let it be understood that his acting displeased her and that she pitied the audience for having to put up with it. Now even a leading man will turn on a star if the provocation be sufficient and this leading man was indubitably provoked beyond endurance. His opportunity for revenge came in the last act when the heroine is supposed to die in his arms. Instead of adhering to the "business" the leading man held aloof and allowed Mrs. Carter to execute her death pangs in solitary agony. As she lay near the footlights Mrs. Carter cried at him, so that the audience might hear, "I'll get you for this."

"I got my wife through advertising."
"Then you'll admit that advertising pays?"
"I'll admit that it brings results."

Sandy McNaughton and the Police

Great has been the wonderment of the Tenderloin over the daring displayed by Sandy McNaughton, proprietor of "The Breakers," in bidding the dance go on in his underground resort despite the interdict of the police. Time was that this caterer to the thirst of the underworld respectfully heeded the moralists of the police commission when they commanded that the giddy waltz and the insinuating twostep be banished to the ocean beach and the Barbary Coast and that in all resorts within the city limits the sound of music and dancing cease at one in the morning. But now it is different. Sandy McNaughton has discovered that the prohibition is based, not on a city ordinance, but on a mere police order which he thinks he may with impunity disobey. It is no wonder that the contumacy of one of their number, based on a fine-drawn distinction between an ordinance and a police order, should fill the cafe proprietors with amazement. Not for them the dialectical subtlety with which Sandy McNaughton fends his novel position. Little they care whether the supervisors or the police make the rules of the game they play; enough that the police are on the job to enforce them. Eager to preserve their standing and their liquor licenses, they frown on the gay spirits who yearn for a whirl and restrain the ardor of the musicians who would play after one o'clock. But Sandy is game.

Vaudeville in the Cafes

Places like "The Breakers" are intended for rounders, college boys on a spree, touts, cadets, demimondaines and all the pale-faced crowd that lives by night. Because they furnish a sort of entertainment that appeals to these elements they have won to an enormous extent the patronage of the so-called respectable classes. Men of family have tarried there and women have not hesitated to invade them on slumming tours. The music in these resorts has usually been unusually good and it is pretty well known that the latest song successes of New York are heard there long before they creep into vaudeville programs or cross the continent to the music stores. Of course these places do not compete with the high class restaurants and cafes where the theatre crowds go for supper, but nevertheless they draw hundreds who enjoy the atmosphere of the pace that kills which may be breathed for the price of a highball or two. But now it has come to pass that the high price restaurants are competing with the resorts of "The Breakers" type. When one of the cafes engaged Rigo some time ago the prescient Sandy McNaughton may have read the handwriting on the wall; certainly he realized its import when another cafe introduced vaudeville. The result is that the throngs which used to frequent the Tenderloin resorts have transferred their patronage to the cafes where good food may be discussed in luxurious surroundings to the accompaniment of vaudeville. The element of riskiness has been removed, the atmosphere is better, the entertainment of a higher grade—no wonder Sandy McNaughton should attempt to lure his old customers back, at the risk of being closed up, by holding out the inducement of dancing. He and others have lost money; they cannot compete with the vaudeville restaurants; so it is plausible that one, more daring than the others, should balance his license against his lease.

A Restaurant Revolution

There is no doubt that the business of satisfying the hunger and thirst of San Franciscan diners-out and suppers-out is passing through a revolution. The introduction of vaudeville in some of the big cafes has had the immediate effect of making them tremendously popular and of drawing regular patrons from some of the others. The other night I supped after the theatre in one of the most beautiful rooms in town, the dining-room of one of our biggest hotels. The room was brilliantly lighted, the orchestra discoursed excellent music and the regular after-theatre supper was of a quality that could not be duplicated elsewhere for twice the money charged for it. Yet there were not more than ten people in the room, not enough to pay for the music. Later, as I passed the entrance of one of the cafes where vaudeville is given, I saw that the place was crowded to the doors with spectators who had dropped in for the last and best number of the program but who could not find seats. You see, Sandy McNaughton and his class are not alone in suffering from the introduction of vaudeville. The situation will right itself in time. Fashions pass and time-honored institutions do not entirely pass away. No doubt there will be a readjustment which will give back to the hotels and to the Tenderloin resorts the patronage which they have lost for the time being. The crowd that loves exclusiveness will go back for its supper to the hotels and cafes that have good chefs; the habitues of the Tenderloin will go back to the highball and the banged piano; the restaurants with vaudeville on the side will retain their very ample clientele.

"I've got a broken tooth that aches horribly," said the garden rake, leaning against an old tree.

"I've got a decayed root that nearly drives me mad," answered the tree.

The Spreckels Brothers

Now that Mrs. Claus Spreckels has gone to join her husband in the other world there is no longer any sentimental or other kind of restraint on their belligerent sons, and we may therefore look forward without peradventure to as fine a scrap as was ever pulled off in a court of justice. John D. Spreckels and Adolph Spreckels are of course elated over their triumph in Judge Coffey's court, but the fires of passion are not extinguished. As to what their future course will be much depends on the nature of their mother's will, which at this writing has yet to be filed. But the probability is that it will provoke a contest; for Mrs. Spreckels was in warm sympathy with her two younger sons, and it is the belief of those that were familiar with the state of affairs immediately prior to her death that she has disposed of her property after the example of her husband. A fact not generally known is that Claus Spreckels' will was made in accordance with the wishes of his wife. It was when they learned this fact that John D. and Adolph Spreckels withdrew the contest in which they had raised the question of undue influence. The charge made against Rudolph and Gus would have been easily disproved by the widow's testimony, as she would have sworn that she persuaded her husband that justice demanded a will in the terms of the one admitted to probate.

A Mother's Love

Mrs. Spreckels never approved of her husband's attitude of hostility toward Rudolph and Gus. She was a heart-broken woman during all the years of their estrangement. She longed for reconciliation with all the fervor of that mysterious maternal love that nature kindles and that endures when all else passes away. Dreary was the blank in her home when she ceased to be the rallying point of filial affection and obedience. Often in the company of a few intimate friends she was overcome by storms of emotion and poured out the sorrow of her seared heart. Often she tried to assuage her husband's vindictiveness but he seemed inexorable. Once when Rudolph lay sick almost unto death but a few blocks from the old folk's home, the grief-stricken mother, burning with desire to soothe and comfort him in his illness was on the point of hastening to his side, but the stern husband demurred and she did not go. finally the reconciliation was effected Mrs. Spreckels felt that all her sorrows had been banished, and in the last years of life she seemed to be intent upon doubly recompensing with affection the children to whom it had been so long denied.

Weinstock for Governor

With unmixed satisfaction I have read the news that Mr. Harris Weinstock has had under advisement the flattering offer of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League to back him with all its finest and chaste energies for the gubernatorial job. Mr. Weinstock's engaging personality would contribute tone to a gubernatorial campaign and inspire some very worthy citizens. Round him would rally the forces of invincible righteousness with unbridled enthusiasm. Enjoying as Mr. Weinstock does the confidence of our uplifters, as a candidate for Governor he would command their ardent support, and as a consequence the State would witness a repetition of scenes that have been more or less peculiar to this eccentric city in recent years. The battle for civic purity would be fought up and down the State, and Boke, Heney and Johnson, and, mayhap, Spreckels and Wheeler, would be tearing passions to tatters at every crossroads within the confines of our glorious commonwealth. In addition to being one of the few men upon whom all our illustrious patriots can agree, Mr. Weinstock has many qualities that commend him to the favor of divers elements in the body politic. A merchant who has made a success of marking down goods to magic figures, he has a smattering of many isms and is regarded in culturine circles as a philosopher of profound depth, nearly wool and a yard wide. A Jew, he is a great lover of Christ; an employer, he is a champion of organized labor, to the trade of which he caters with unselfish enthusiasm. He is chock full of the spirit of optimism and good will to every laudable labor union. He would run without any hope of benefit, real or imaginary, to himself, but would consecrate his talents to the preservation of organized labor, which, for some unaccountable reason, he conceives to be in danger of disintegration. With no thought of improving his political chances, he lectures wherever he can get the opportunity and with all the heroic zeal of a Don Quixote, on the importance of keeping organized labor intact. Nobody more thoroughly appreciates the demands of public interest growing out of the relations of capital and labor than Harris Weinstock.

Patriots at War

In the haunts of politicians where always is to be found a keen sense of humor the risibles of men have been in a state of agitation ever since the news got out that those two bright plumaged birds of a feather, Professor Boke and Fremont Older, were engaged in a clawing match. Friends of other days, these eminent reformers animated equally with the benevolent purpose of shaping the destinies of political parties and the morals of the people became estranged as a result of a difference of opinion as to the man that should be chosen standard bearer of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Boke is for the Hon. Francis J. Heney and Older is for the versatile and vociferous Hiram Johnson. Singularly enough, though both Johnson and Heney have said they would not run, neither Boke nor Older has for a moment placed the slightest credence in their avowal. Boke insists emphatically that he knows Heney and that by virtue of this knowledge he has no hesitation in assuring everybody that the flexible idol of his heart is susceptible to the right kind of overtures. Older is equally dogmatic with reference to the man from Sacramento whom he has known for many years, both as a performer at the capital and a reformer in the metropolis. And Mr. Older, serenely unconscious of the significance of his scepticism, demands that Mr. Johnson be given full opportunity to be prevailed upon to accept the nomination.

How the Professor is Affected

It grieves the tender soul of Professor Boke thus to meet with opposition in the camp which, through long, weary and tempestuous months he edified with his counsel and his sympathy. Indeed the Professor is absolutely sick at heart. He harbors the harrowing suspicion that he is not appreciated. He feels that he rendered eminent service to the cause of righteousness in the hour of need; that to a great extent he imparted character to the mottled sanhedrim that ruled the parish in the two years of its plagued plight; and now that he is embarked upon a fresh crusade to rescue the sacred pillars of government he smarts under the ingratitude that cavalierly ignores his warmest wishes. It is particularly galling to him to learn that he is being ridiculed behind his back by Fremont Older, who, in his opinion, did more to impair confidence in the late lamented moral project than anything or anybody else remotely or intimately connected with current reform movements. In the circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the Professor, whose normal temperature is comparable only with that of an Alaskan glacier in the long Arctic night, is boiling over with emotion.

The Inspiring Sack

In the conflict between Older and Boke has been generated an exuberance of rumors respecting the plans and prospects of the two reformers as well as the animating principle of their current zeal. As to Older it is said that he is for Johnson because the sack that is to be available for campaign purposes will not be opened for any other man. The young millionaires whose sentiments he reflects, it is said, have come to the conclusion that for conjuring purposes the name of Heney has lost its charm. The explanation of the curb that this consistent loser has put on his political ambition is that nobody has volunteered to finance his campaign. Now this is information that has never been conveyed to Professor Boke who, it is said, has had visions of himself accepting high office at the hands of Governor Heney, and who as a consequence holds firm to the conviction that without Heney in the gubernatorial chair everything will go to the devil. Hence the dolorous apparation that he makes, as he goes about uttering warnings and strange noises, as though he were personifying Bedlam on two legs. Verily the situation has a touch of comedy that makes the whole State grin.

Must Pay for His Negligence

According to Samuel Regensburger, the attorney, there were very few precious stones lost in our big fire. Regensburger had occasion some time ago to make inquiry about the losses suffered by jewelers, and he learned that not only the big jewelry houses but also the pawnbrokers managed to get their diamonds and pearls beyond reach of the flames. In one or two instances vaults were relied upon for the safekeeping of some articles of jewelry, and even in these instances a total loss was not suffered. John Hammersmith was one of the jewelers who placed confidence in a vault, and among his losses was that of a diamond belonging to a woman, which she valued at $300. Regensburger brought suit for her to recover that sum, and judgment was obtained, the court holding that as Hammersmith had plenty of time to remove his stock he was guilty of negligence in not removing the diamond. He admitted that he carried away about $15,000 worth of diamonds but the lost one was left in his vault. Regensburger's client has collected her judgment.

The Strange Story of a Pearl

The story is told that one jeweler reported the loss of a pearl valued at $2,000 which he had in his repair shop. Now pearls of this value have an individuality and they are well known to all jewelers. Singularly enough the pearl that was believed by its owner to have been consumed in the flames turned up not long ago. It was sold in this city, and the news reached the ears of the owner. He went at once to the jeweler in whose custody it had been placed, and after some little discussion he was given a check for $2,000. The jeweler was greatly surprised when he heard that the pearl was ornamenting the scarf of a New Yorker. Strange are the things that happen in the jewelry business.

A Bird of a Heroine

Not often do I have leisure for the reading of ephemeral literature, but occasionally I come across a novel of the style of Mr. Horace Newte's "Sparrows, the Story of an Unprotected Girl," and I dip into the story and learn something of the life that is mirrored to the satisfaction of persons that regard nothing as exhilarating that does not deal with purple passions and iridescent intrigues. Mavis Keeves is the unprotected girl of this story. She was educated at an institution where the girls read Ruskin and "tubbed" regularly. She went to work in a store managed by a man named Orgles who had sinister designs on young girls that looked good to him. Mavis was one of them, but she baffled him. "It's men like you," she said, "who drag poor girls down. It's men like you who bring them to horrible things which they'd never have dreamed of if it hadn't been for you. It's men like you who make wickedness. You're the worst man I ever met, and I'd rather die in the gutter than be fouled by the touch of a horrible old beast like you." This is pretty stiff language for a young girl to address to a man who was fond of her. It is compact, however, of hints as to the character of Orgles. And it conveys by an easy route a characterization that otherwise might not be clear without elaboration: You are made to realize by a few strokes of the pen that Orgles is the type of man that Evelyn Thaw ran up against, and your curiosity is filliped. You would like to know just what his particular style of debauchery was. But perhaps it is enough to know that the wicked and aged Sadist (if that's what he was) knew Mavis in no unrighteous way; that on the contrary, he knew after his overtures failed that she was not for him. He caused her anger to blaze up "into a final flame"; and "this gave her strength to throw the old man from her; he crashed into the grate; she heard his head strike against the coal box. Mavis cast one look upon the shapeless and bleeding heap of humanity and left the room." From all of which it is to be inferred either that Orgles is a feeble, burnt-out old sinner in whom what passion that remains is largely reminiscent, or that Mavis is hardly a fitting name for the heroine whose physical achievement is more suggestive of a Hercules than a song-thrush.

She Gets Protection

We next find Mavis in Mrs. Hamilton's house, a place where one might expect to find only a very worldly-wise or a very unsophisticated girl. Now Mavis who was wise as to old Orgles was completely deceived as to the Hamilton establishment. If one were inclined to be hypercritical one would say that Mr. Newte was guilty of an unpardonable inconsistency in putting his heroine, who knew so much about bad men, into Mrs. Hamilton's house. But if she had not strayed into Mrs. Hamilton's she might never have met Mr. Windebank. This circumstance while pointing an unpleasant moral is nevertheless conducive to the heart interest and romance. Windebank fell in love with Mavis, and with his assistance she escaped from her evil surroundings. Then Windebank went away with his regiment and Mavis returned to the country where fresh dangers assailed her repeatedly until Windebank's return, when he said a trifle hoarsely, "Little Mavis, I love you more than I ever believed it possible for man to love woman." With all her experience Mavis was not struck with the pale conventionality of these words; on the contrary they and the kiss that went with them, cause "a delicious inertia to steal over her senses." When they were married Mavis said to her husband: "It's love I want—love. Nothing else matters. Love me, love me, love me!"—three times, just like that. Of course Windebank did as requested. He used to visit Mrs. Hamilton's house.

Bruguiere Sees the Tables Turned

The bar of one of our biggest hostelries was the scene of a merry party a few nights ago and the object of general badinage was Emile Bruguiere. Many corks had popped, 'twas the hour of unstinted expression and the members of the party which was made up of various gilded scions of plutocracy, found delight in chaffing Bruguiere on his financial infelicities. The care-free heir of the wealthy house of Barron was particularly apt in flinging the barbed arrow of banter into the breast of the indifferent Bruguiere. His words were winged with wit and carefully delivered, eliciting roars of laughter from the other members of the gay party. It was great fun while it lasted, but never was the old adage that he who laughs last laughs best so admirably illustrated. In the midst of the lingual melee a stern-faced gentleman strode into the bar, called young Barron aside and whispered excitedly in his ear. The episode was too strange to escape observation and although Barron returned to the fray with every appearance of nonchalance, he was forced to explain the mystery. With a wry face he confessed that his bank account had that day been attached by a prominent haberdashery for a long-standing bill of goodly proportions. Emile Bruguiere, chivalrous knight of the Order of St. Jacques, forebore revenge.

Husband—If you hadn't taken so much time with your toilet, we wouldn't have been late.

Mrs. Atherton on Tamalpais

Those who were aware that Gertrude Atherton was engaged in the writing of her book, "Tower of Ivory," during her stay on Mount Tamalpais may be surprised to learn that the gifted novelist would never have written the book in any other place. It seems, from her own statement, that it had to be Tamalpais or nowhere. Speaking to an interviewer in New York recently, Mrs. Atherton described the novel which is soon to appear as a story of Munich and England. "I had to come 7,000 miles to Mount Tamalpais," she continued, "as I made up my mind I could write it nowhere else. There were long draughty corridors in the deserted hotel where I could take long walks in my heaviest coat. It was good exercise and the three leaks in the roof of my bedroom did not even give me a cold. But fine weather came before I had finished and with it people. I had to go down to San Francisco to finish." Of San Francisco also Mrs. Atherton speaks with enthusiasm, the enthusiasm of one who finds it admirably suited to her temperamental needs. "In summer it is an ideal place for work," she says; "it is cold and foggy, windy and bracing; the people go away and I have it to myself. It's very stimulating."

Her Views on Suffragettes

Mrs. Atherton spoke of suffrage and suffragettes with as much vivacity as she applied to the draughty corridors and the leaking roof of her Tamalpais abiding place. Mrs. Atherton is a believer in the cause of suffrage and is a member of the Equal Franchise Society, but she has a mean notion of the intellectual capacity of the most conspicuous American advocates of women's rights. She believes that the cause is bigger than its American leaders. Her description of a visit to a suffrage meeting is not lacking in piquant interest. "The last meeting I attended was very large and distinguished," she begins. "The house was packed to hear the eminent women leaders who were to speak. One of them, very prominent indeed, made a long, windy, monotonous speech composed of much rhetoric and a few facts. My mind wandered, but I was brought back by a long curved sentence—I seemed to see arcs thrown off into the air—containing the statement that one of her reasons for wishing the franchise was that 'women of talent and genius could go out into the arena and command the same price for their wares as men.' This was too much for me. I dislike speaking in public, but when she and the other two distinguished leaders had finished speaking I arose and said that I believed in giving the devil, in other words man, his due; that in the twenty years of my life as a writer of fiction I had never found it any disadvantage to be a woman. I then stated certain facts—that the royalties of any author are determined by his market value, in other words by the demand of the public for his work; that whereas a publisher might give a woman clerk in his office less than a man he would not dare underpay a popular woman writer. I have never known him even to demur. If he is dishonest he won't pay anybody, men or women. I believe it to be the same in any of the arts—mind you I emphasized 'arts,' and said nothing about wage earners; it is all a matter of having the goods. Never have I heard any woman writer use such dreadful cuss words when anathematizing publishers as men. If anything she has the best of it. It may be observed that more male artists of all sorts have starved than women. If a publisher today hesitates over two first manuscripts 10 to 1 he takes that of the woman. Not only is he human and susceptible, but women's fiction often makes a more subtle appeal to women. When I had said a few more words to the same effect the first speaker arose and denied that she had ever made the statement that called forth my remarks. When I quoted her words she arose again and said, 'Well, go down and try making shirtwaists and see how you like that.' Then one of her colleagues hastened to the rescue and asked the obvious question: 'Why, if women stood on an equal footing with men, did George Eliot take a man's name?' I replied that that was fifty years ago and we were talking about today. Then she said: 'Well, if the lady thinks it just as easy to be a woman as a man let her try preaching for a while.' I subsided, especially as they made haste to give some one else a chance to be sat upon, but I had received a fine object lesson in the logic, the courtesy and the sense of fair play, also the thirst for facts of three eminent leaders of the suffrage movement."

Judge Cooper's First Case

From an attorney who is an intimate friend of Judge Cooper of the Appellate Bench I heard a few days ago the story of the judge's first clients and it is too good to be kept out of print. As an ambitious young man Judge Cooper went from his home in Santa Rosa to practice law in Ukiah. The young lawyer's shingle was up for some time before it attracted clients, so that when a message came from Willits, calling him to the defense of three young men who had been arrested for larceny, he responded with alacrity, well knowing that it would be an interesting and difficult case. For months the three youths under arrest had been the terror of Willits and although they had long eluded detection and were now in jail only on a larceny charge, it was certain that efforts would be made to mete out to them arrears of punishment for a formidable list of transgressions. All the way from Ukiah young Cooper meditated the best policy of defense and he was in deep thought when the stage rolled over the bridge just outside of Willits. The exclamations of his fellow passengers aroused Cooper from his legal trance and with mixed feelings he realized that there was no more case for him. It was a coroner and not an attorney that the three terrorists needed; their dead bodies were swinging from the truss of the bridge.

Our Coast Artillery

Nowhere has the work of our Coast Artillery been raised to so high a state of efficiency as at this port. Such is the judgment of a military authority of high rank who objects to being quoted in matters of comparison affecting this branch of the service. He says further that in personnel and equipment the Coast Artillery of the United States is unsurpassed. Wonderful is the progress that it has made in the past ten years. The devotion of officers and men to their work has led to constant improvements in their target practice, range finding and mine laying, and from experience vast improvements have been made in material and methods. The country, says my authority, can rest satisfied that the money spent on the improvement in the organization and administration of this branch of the army has brought in an adequate return. Target practice is the final test of Coast Artillery efficiency, the capacity to hit is the criterion of all its training, and in this respect there has been a gradual improvement during the last ten years. and in the last year a very marked improvement. This improvement is noticed not only in cannon of various calibres but also in mortars, and indeed is greater in the latter than in any other, which is a very important fact, inasmuch as the mortar projectile attacks a warship in its most vulnerable part, namely the deck, and because the accuracy of fire of mortars was at one time seriously questioned.

Mortar Firing

It will doubtless astonish many people to learn that our mortars (firing singly) can make nearly a hit a minute. If we remember that our mortars are arranged in groups of four and eight and that the mortars of entire groups are to be fired simultaneously in actual battle the effectiveness of this weapon will become apparent. No battleship can safely venture to come within the range of fire of our mortar batteries, with their projectiles weighing 1,C00 pounds, carrying about sixty pounds of high explosive. There is no longer any doubt regarding the accuracy of fire of mortars, and this is particularly pleasing to the military authorities because our coast defences are more generously supplied with this weapon than those of any other nation. Perhaps the greatest strides that have been made are in the submarine mine service.Six years ago there was no practical mine laying carried on except at the school for that purpose at Fort Totten, Willets Point, N. Y. (and that on boats improvised for such work); today it is conducted at every Coast Artillery fort where mines would be laid in time of war by regular mine planters built for the purpose. Among other improvements by our Coast Artillery in this domain may be mentioned the automatic anchor for submarine mines, which will enable mines to be planted rapidly in any depth of water without knowing the depth beforehand. The importance of this can hardly be appreciated by the layman. Heretofore soundings had to be carefully made, cables cut to proper lengths, and much other work done before mines were planted in any area, but by this improvement that is no longer necessary. Most of the European nations have been studying this problem for years without satisfactory results. With all the improvements that have been made more are to come, as it is the desire and intention of our military authorities to perfect our system of coast defense in order to liberate the navy for its highest duty of seeking the enemy's fleet on the high seas freed from all concern for the coast protection.

Promoting the Greater Good at Discretion

Mr. Gifford Pinchot has again uncorked the vials of his devastating wrath. This time the object of his righteous rage is Solicitor McCabe of the Department of Agriculture at Washington who was temporarily put in charge of the forestry department after Mr. Pinchot was dismissed by President Taft. The specific charge against Mr. McCabe is that he prostituted the law by his refusal to continue making payments for the education of forest rangers at some of the State universities. This charge was made by Mr. Pinchot at a banquet given in his honor by the National Arts Club in New York, and the speech embodying it was warmly applauded by that tedious but honest old gentleman, Dr. Lyman Abbott and many other reformers of the same kidney. The inspiration of the speech and the principles and sentiments set forth by Mr. Pinchot are worthy of consideration, constituting as they do a luminous index to much of the bewildering conduct of our self-constituted salvationists. From Mr. Pinchot's speech we learn that when he was autocrat of the forest service he deemed it advisable to educate rangers, and this he did without legal warrant at public expense. He did not follow the system pursued at our military academies; that is, he did not pay for the education of young candidates for admission to the service, but he picked out men on Uncle Sam's payroll and sent them to college. Nor was their pay discontinued while they were being educated at the expense of the government for government jobs. They went on feeding at the public crib while acquiring the education that was necessary to fit them for the jobs in which they were already lodged. A fine snap, indeed! And Mr. Pinchot characterizes the discontinuance of it as an outrage. He argues that the expenditure "came clearly within the agricultural appropriation bill which provides for 'all expenses necessary for the administration, protection and improvement of the national forests.'" Obviously his interpretation of this language is broad and liberal. This style of interpretation is a habit with reformers. They hold that it is for them to determine first what the greater good is and then to stretch the law to suit the case. This is distinctly Rooseveltian doctrine, and hence the wonderful elasticity of the law under his dispensation. So elastic was it that private servants of the Tennis Cabinet were kept on the government payroll as clerks in federal departments in Washington. The colored valet of a certain idol of the masses was thus taken care of without cost to the patriot whom he served. All of which makes it quite reasonable for Mr. Pinchot, who breathed the atmosphere of liberal construction for several years, to regard the discontinuance of free education for rangers as outrageous. Unquestionably he is sincere when he says: "I am not concerned with this indefensible sacrifice of the public welfare. It is a typical illustration of a certain way 'to obey the law.'"

Californian Retires from the Army

The United States service lost a valuable officer last Saturday when Lieutenant-Colonel Ormond M. Lissak retired from active duty on account of disability. Lieutenant-Colonel Lissak belongs to the old and well-known Lissak family which has been identified with San Francisco for many years and has a long record of honorable achievement. He was appointed to the Military Academy from this State in 1878, was graduated in 1882, being No. 8 in a class of thirty-seven, and was assigned as a second lieutenant in the Fourth Artillery. He was promoted to first lieutenant in January, 1889, and three months later was transferred to the Ordnance Department. He became a captain in 1898, major in 1904, and lieutenant-colonel in 1908. Lieutenant-Colonel Lissak was appointed chief ordnance officer of volunteers, with the rank of major, in July, 1898, and accompanied the expedition to Porto Rico. He commanded the ordnance depot at Ponce from August until December, 1898, and then went to Santiago, Cuba, where he commanded the ordnance depot at that place until February 28, 1899, also acting as chief ordnance officer of the Department

Naval News for San Francisco

The many friends of Captain Lucien Young in this city will be interested to learn that the former captain of the yard at Mare Island who has been in Washington since his recent detachment from duty on this coast, has been ordered to duty as commandant of the navy yard at Pensacola, Florida. Orders have been issued assigning Rear-Admiral Giles B. Harber to duty as commander-in-chief of the Pacific fleet with the armored cruiser California as his flagship. He has been recently in command of the third squadron of the fleet. Rear-Admiral Harber will relieve Rear-Admiral Uriel Sebree of supreme command and Sebree will be retired for age next week. Rear-Admiral Harber's retirement for age will take place in September, 1911. Lieutenants Donald B. Craig and Lamar R. Leahy who served as Harber's aides on the Charleston will have the same position on the California.

A Remedy for Fatigue

It would be unjust to withhold from my readers the very latest remedy for "that tired feeling" which has so long commanded the attention of quacks and pill-mongers. The newest method for dealing with this disagreeable condition of the body was suggested by a Mrs. Mildred Manley Easton in a recent lecture at the Waldorf-Astoria in New York in the following words: "When you go to your room tonight, first remove whatever clothing in any way impedes the freedom of your movements and then rest the tips of your fingers very lightly on the crown of your head. Fix your mind that the touch you feel is one end of a cord and that an angel is holding the other end and swinging you gently through space. This thought if sustained sufficiently long will gradually raise the body just enough to do away with all the sagging and drooping which come from overfatigue. Every organ will be elevated to its proper position and capable consequently of performing its function as nature intended it to do." When Edward Bok reads that lovely thought about the angel he will simply die of envy.

What the Wellesley Girls Read

There is a pleasant fiction that college girls allow themselves only the most serious and uplifting literature; that their favorite authors are Maeterlinck, Ibsen and Shaw. This fiction is particularly prevalent in the effete East and is frequently applied to the fair students of Vassar, Bryn Mawr, Wellesley and other noted women's colleges. To puncture it once and for all some of the Wellesley girls recently took it upon themselves to interview the 450 students of that institution on the subject of their favorite reading. Their report shows many interesting facts. Daily reading of the newspaper, generally in a superficial way, was found to exist, but very few girls pleaded guilty to perusal of editorials. Two hundred and fifty of the girls read the weeklies with some thoroughness. Every girl reads some monthly magazine, usually for the fiction. About five per cent read some religious magazine thoroughly. One-fifth of the 450 girls read Dickens, Scott, Thackeray and Jane Austen. About half of them read the light modern novels. Out of the 450 only thirty-two read Maeterlinck, Ibsen and Shaw. Meredith, Stevenson, Kipling and Mrs. Wharton are much more popular. The report shows that the great majority of college girls are content with the culture influence of their chosen or prescribed studies and that their extra reading is done for amusement solely. Evidently they do not find Maeterlinck, Ibsen and Shaw amusing which, in the case of two of these authors, is by no means surprising. No more do their brothers.

The Neglect of Grieg's Music

There is food for thought which some of our professional musicians ought to chew and digest in the fact that when Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite was heard in its entirety for the first time in Rome quite recently the audience was so enthusiastic that all the four movements had to be repeated. It may seem strange that the exquisite "Peer Gynt" music had never before been heard in Rome, but this is only one rather startling illustration of the neglect of Grieg by professional musicians. The suite founded on Ibsen's drama is well known here but there are many other beautiful compositions by Grieg which are as strange to our musical audiences as this suite was to the Romans up to a few weeks ago. For some reason or other players refuse to put them on their programs, preferring to render less meritorious pieces by older masters. Schiller said something to the effect that the gods themselves would struggle in vain against the stupidity of professional musicians and the treatment accorded to Grieg seems to bear him out. Our own Edward MacDowell has been condemned to a similar fate; the public hears some of his best songs and piano pieces only at the greatest intervals. It has been the fate of many musicians to be neglected during life but posthumous neglect is even more inexcusable.

BONES IN THE HUMAN SKELTON

Bones of the Head

In the head of an adult 22 we trace—
8 are in the cranium, 14 in the face:
1 frontal, 1 occipital, parietal bones 2,
2 temporal, 1 sphenoid, 1 ethmoid—that will do;
The facial bones are hard to name; these most in pairs you'll see,
Except the vomer—that is 1, and maxillary 3;
2 lachrymal, 2 palatal, 2 nasal bones between,
2 turbinated, malar 2—which just makes up 14.

Bones of the Trunk

Spinal column 26, ribs 24;
Sternum, os hyoides—of each of them 1 more;
Ossa innominata 2; and now I hope you'll find
These 54 bones in the trunk are also in your mind!

The Upper Extremities

Clavicle or collar bone—this works like a charm!
Scapula, the shoulder-blade, and humerus, the arm;
The ulna and the radius from elbow down to wrist,
And there the 8 small carpal bones must none of them be missed;
5 metacarpal bones are in the hand; and next are seen
The thumb and finger bones, which are phalanges, just 14.

The Lower Extremities

The femur bone is in the thigh—the strongest bone of all;
Then the patella in the knee, triangular and small;

Audubon's Accuracy in Details

A young artist once called upon Mr. Audubon, the great student of birds, to show him some drawings and paintings. Audubon was much interested, and after examining the work, said:

"I like it very much, but it is a little deficient in details. You have painted the legs of this bird nicely, except in one respect. The scales are exact in shape and color, but you have not arranged them correctly as to numbers."

"I never thought of that," said the young artist.

"Quite likely," said Audubon. "Now, upon this upper ridge of the partridge's leg there are just so many scales. You have too many. Nature does her work perfectly. Examine the legs of a thousand partridges, and you will see that the scales are the same number. All partridges are made alike."

This is how Audubon became great—by patient study in small things.

Holman Hunt's Struggles in Art

The career of Holman Hunt illustrates the proverb, "What is bred in the bone will come out in the flesh." When a school-boy of twelve, he told his father that he wished to become an artist. But his father, holding the opinion that artists were a dissolute, reckless set of fellows, would not listen to his son's wishes, and placed him as a clerk with an auctioneer and real estate agent. The usual result followed. The clerk drew portraits instead of auction announcements. The auctioneer was himself found of art, and painted whenever he could get a chance. On days when there was little to be done, he and his clerk used to shut themselves in the office and paint. The tables were turned upon Hunt's father; the employer, instead of instilling into the boy commercial principles, was encouraging him to become an artist. Hunt left the auctioneer to become a bookkeeper in a Manchester warehouse. His duty was to sit in a little back room, looking out on three blank walls, and make entries in a ledger. But another artistic friend turned up in the person of a fellow clerk, who occasionally designed patterns for the firm's calicoes. Hunt tried his hand at designing, and attained sufficient proficiency to justify the friend in making use of several of his designs. When he had nothing to do, Hunt drew flies upon the roughened surface of the ground-glass window. Day by day the number increased, till one day one of his employers, coming in, said: "I cannot make out how it is; every day I come into this room there seems to be more flies in it," and stepping toward the window, he took out his handkerchief to brush them away. Hunt's father allowed him to spend his small salary in taking lessons of a painter, thinking it would amuse the boy and keep him out of mischief. One day the son told the father: "I will be an artist, and nothing but an artist, and if you keep me in a clerkship till I am twenty-one you'll only be taking away so much of my chance of doing any good in the future." The father, secretly proud of his son's resolution, told him to go to the Academy, but he must support himself. He applied for admission, as a student, to the Academy schools, sending in several drawings of antique statues. They were rejected. He tried again, and the Academy again refused to admit him. Then his father told him that he was wasting his time and must go back to a clerkship. Hunt tried a third time, was accepted, and entered the school at eighteen years of age. His paintings, among which are "The Light of the World," "The Shadow of the Cross," and "The Scapegoat," indorse his choice of art as his profession in life.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—A very strong covering movement occurred in stocks at the close of the week and as a result of operations by insiders who gave the market substantial and definite support the middle of the week. Too much bearish sentiment on the part of a large professional contingent recently with much hysterical selling by commission houses has put the market in shape for a strong rally in values and such has occurred before the holiday. On any further rise, a distribution of support stock will come on the market again. Mr. Taft spoke in New York on Lincoln's birthday and it is said words of reassurance will be forthcoming in regard to future legislation. Here is the fact for the rally in the market. However, we feel like saying with some authority, that there will be no change in the administration plans and that important banking and business interests are still against Washington on the subject of too much lawmaking and that eventually the security market will sink to a lower level as a result of this very unfavorable factor.

Grain—Increasing dullness in the flour trade and continued large receipts brought the necessity of special support for wheat early in the week in the Chicago market. This was forthcoming, the shorts were easily put to rout and confusion, and values ranged moderately upward, holding most of the advanced ground without difficulty. The latter has been selling enough recently to keep a big stream running to primary markets. It has required much shifting of positions to keep this supply from piling up. It remains to be seen if the last week's movement will be easily disposed of. Certain it is that the leading Northwestern millers are converting a great deal of wheat into flour. Millers occupying a less conspicuous place in the trade in that section and elsewhere, are not doing as much and are still complaining of lack of shipping directions on rather old sales.

Corn made some improvement speculatively last week, but little headway in the merchandising branch of the trade. In fact the movement of corn to market was so large that discounts widened materially and cash corn piled up in various directions. The speculator at present seems quite willing to discount present conditions and to look ahead a little. Big discounts on low grade corn here are because of the comparatively limited capacity for handling such a rush as has been on for several weeks, since the fine weather permitted the railroads to get back into a more normal way of handling business. The speculator assumes that this rush is now near an end, that the next change will be in the way of an improved demand for corn from the East.

Cotton—The cotton market the past week has been a very dull uninteresting affair with prices fluctuating in a very narrow range. Outside trade in the market has been very light, and while there has been some buying of the nearby futures by the southern speculator, the volume of business was so light that the local traders who are bearish had no trouble in checking the advance around 15 cents. The news in the main was generally of a bullish tone. Receipts at the principal southern ports were very small compared with last year, and spinners were good buyers taking all the offerings at a slight advance in price. The visible supply continues to show a fair decrease each week and if the present demand continues for spots it will become a very bullish factor later on. The foreign market has kept pace with our market and it seems to be working into a stronger position. Demand from abroad has been good not only from the continent but also from the orient. The price however must not be overlooked, fifteen cents for cotton is high and the market could easily break a hundred points from these figures and with the present agitation against prices of all commodities, and the unrest in Wall street over what Congress is going to do in regard to the trusts makes the situation a very dangerous one. The weather, while a little too dry in western Texas is generally considered favorable and with the high prices received for last year's crop makes a big acreage for this year a certainty, and as the distant futures are selling well above the average prices at this time of the year it looks as if the short side of the new crop months would be profitable.

Copper—The unsettled condition of the New York stock market has tended to reduce the trading in the Boston copper shares and has also given a rather heavy tone to that market. There have been but few changes in the copper metal situation as regards supply and demand and fundamentally conditions are the same at this time as they were several months ago when copper stocks were all selling much higher. The formal merging of the leading copper companies awaits only the passage by Congress of a favorable federal incorporation law. When conditions in New York adjust themselves, the market for copper stocks will be relieved of this outside influence and values should once more move upward. For the present it is said that a rather dull, traders' market will prevail for copper stocks with but few important changes.

Local Securities—The market for local stocks and bonds continues to be a dull affair and shows but few important changes. About the only real live trader for the past week or so was Associated Oil. On an abundance of rumors that the company would declare a 4 per cent dividend at the next meeting, the stock was advanced during the latter part of last week from 45 to 53 but since that time it has been pounded down to within a few points of where it started from. Spring Valley Water has many friends in the local market and it has had a steady advance. Alaska Packers has quieted down and it is said will remain so for a short period. Pacific Telephone stocks, in sympathy with the unsettled state and decline of the New York stock market, have had rather sharp recessions but lately have recovered some of their losses. The past week has seen only a nominal demand for Pacific Gas and Electric issues at unchanged prices. Both Bank of California and Fireman's Fund Insurance have recently made upward strides and the latter stock has exceeded its high price record since the big fire. Hawaiian Sugar stocks have rather lessened in point of activity but their prices as a whole have remained very firm. As tax day approaches, the bond list assumes a more lively appearance and a number of issues on it have increased in price. Associated Oil 5s, California Gas and Electric 5s, City Electric 5s, Pacific Telephone 5s, Peoples Water 5s, Southern Pacific Refunding 4s, Spring Valley 4s and United Railroads 4s seem to be the most popular and with one or two exceptions are all higher.

It happened in Tennessee. Last summer a mountain preacher returning from his first visit to the city told his neighbors he had seen a piece of "made ice" a foot thick. His church stood for purity and was strong on discipline. He was promptly dismissed from the pastorate for lying. Shortly after a member of the discipline committee visited the city and saw the same miracle. On returning he broached the matter cautiously by saying that they might have been too hasty in turning out their preacher. Forthwith action was brought against him and he escaped by paying the fare of the committee to the city. On the testimony of five men that mountain church now believes in the possibility of ice in summer.

The working of the Oriental mind was delightfully illustrated in a story which Professor Turner told the British Mathematical Association recently. He had been spending the Christmas vacation in Egypt to supervise the erection of a telescope at Helouan. Captain Lyons, who was in charge of the instrument, said that he had found that at noon every day a gun was fired and was anxious to know how the system worked. Accordingly he interviewed the gunner and asked how he knew when to give the signal. "Oh, I look at my watch," said the official. "And how do you correct your watch?" asked the Captain. "I take it to the maker in Cairo and he tells me the error." Forthwith Captain Lyons interviewed the watchmaker and asked him how he checked the error of the watch. "I get the correct time from the gun," said that simple craftsman. And thus time was told in Egypt.

The estimated area of southern Nigeria is 77,000 square miles, that of northern Nigeria, the hinterland of southern Nigeria, is estimated at 255,000, and the native population of the two combined at from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000, yet any effort at scientific agriculture or mining is confronted by the labor question. The wants of the natives are few, and on account of their primitive custom of acquiring only personal property, and that in the form of cattle, wives and children, depending on the latter in old age for support, they give little thought to laying aside money for use in time of illness or old age. In the far interior traders say that the natives often refuse money in exchange for their products, gathered where they have not sown, but will receive tobacco, spirits, cotton goods, etc., when they desire them for immediate use. In some parts of the hinterland tobacco is an absolute necessity in trading with the natives.

Uncle Sam's campaign for "moral uplift" among his vast army of Indian wards has been chiefly significant because of the almost total suppression of the sale and use of "firewater" among the braves and the consequent diminution of warlike outbreaks on the reservations. Washington officials evinced much interest in the report to Assistant Indian Commissioner Abbott that 700 Navajo Indians went recently to their "white father" superintendent and, surrendering an enormous stock of gambling paraphernalia, enrolled their names alongside those of the "simple life" exponents. These gambling devices of varied sorts and descriptions were shipped to Washington and have been placed on exhibition with the immense collection of relics and trophies at the Indian bureau.

Miss Crocker's Pearls—the Last Phase

Always in the history of mysterious affairs there comes a time when the final word is spoken, when the darkness is made light and obscure unintelligible facts are ranged in an order which is so simple that it carries their explanation. Many have been the theories of the police, many the conjectures of amateur detectives as to the ultimate fate of that wonderful string of pearls belonging to Miss Jennie Crocker which disappeared on the evening of the great Alexander ball at the St. Francis. We were entertained with rumors of a social highwayman, of a feminine Raffles operating under the disguise of haughty exclusiveness and of any number of other picturesque figures variously delineated according to the imagination of their creators. Then we were told in a whisper that the pearls had not been lost at all and there were diverse reasons advanced for the continued hue and cry over baubles supposed to be reposing securely in the Crocker vault. But now the time has come when it may be frankly stated that the pearls are now in Miss Crocker's possession. They were lost by a very simple accident that might have happened to anybody, and yet one that might have inspired the pen of a Margaret of Navarre.

Miss Crocker Lost a Diamond

For a short time during the mad romp of the Mardi Gras it looked as though Miss Jennie Crocker was going to supply the city with another jewel mystery. There was a great deal of suppressed excitement for a few minutes among the members of her party, but before the news spread to others the missing jewel was found. The nimble feet of the frolickers had chased midnight two hours away when Miss Crocker who was dressed like a pint of Mumm and who sparkled like a glass of that enticing beverage, noted that one of her diamond earrings was gone. Miss Crocker's diamond ear-rings are valued at $3,000 apiece; so the loss of one of them, while not so serious as the loss of a $50,000 pearl necklace, was sufficient to cast gloom over the merriment of Miss Crocker's set. The news of the disappearance of the bit of jewelry was whispered to Miss Crocker's friends and a quiet search was immediately commenced. It was a despairing sort of a search, as such searches usually are, but it would have been continued with thoroughness, had not Miss Crocker suddenly announced that the ear-ring was recovered. There were congratulations and inquiries as to where the precious gaud had lain hidden. The felicitations Miss Crocker received with joy, but the inquiries she answered only with a blush and a smile and, in the case of the ladies, a whispered word. Strangely enough it was only a few moments before all of Miss Crocker's masculine friends knew just where the ear-ring had been found. It had not left her person.

No Cigarettes at the Ball

The energetic ladies who managed the Mardi Gras overlooked a source of considerable profit when they neglected to have cigarettes on sale at the affair. When men are dancing and drinking they must also smoke and cigarette cases were quickly emptied. The result was a cigarette famine while the ball was in full swing. There were men running about everywhere, all looking for a cigarette. Overcoats were rummaged, attendants were appealed to and there was a general scramble for anything in the form of tobacco that could be twisted into material for a few puffs. Some of the girls proved their mettle by smuggling dainty Turkish cigarettes to their escorts and there was a good deal of piquant banter when these miniature "pills" were sported between masculine lips. One millionaire borrowed a paper from one waiter and a sprinkling of tobacco of the crudest sort from another and sighed luxuriously as the smoke curled up. He never dreamed that his beautiful daughter was dispensing imported cigarettes to her men friends from a well-filled gold case. If he had, it would have spoiled the Mardi Gras for him and Lent would have been a genuinely penitential season for the vivacious young lady. Too bad the lady-managers had not taken the precaution of laying in a stock of high-priced cigarettes. If they had done so their charity would have benefited to the extent of a goodly sum.

It Was a Motley Throng

Looking back to the ball and remembering some of the men and women whom I saw among the revelers I am forced to the admission that it was a very inclusive throng, to say the least. The advance announcement in one of the papers that unmasking would not be obligatory was made for the purpose of encouraging the attendance of those who have no social standing. For the cause of charity the exclusives were willing to rub elbows with the beauties whose day begins at sundown and whose capacity for buying and consuming champagne is professionally cultivated. They were there in large numbers and there was hardly any resentment of their rather wild hilarity. Only a few prudes objected; the rest of the crowd enjoyed the novelty of the contact. The situation reminded me of some piquant tales by De Maupassant which illustrate the curious bond which occasionally draws the extremes of life together in friendly intercourse. Some of the older men opened their eyes very wide when they observed the terms of friendship on which their sons met certain very gay ladies, but no doubt they remembered their own days of wild-oat sowing, for they very wisely refrained from interposing. Those who knew the name and personality of the merrymaker in pink tights found added zest in the spectacle of her popularity with married men whose behavior is usually discreet; the rest were just as happy in their ignorance. The speculations as to her identity indulged by the innocent ladies were very funny. I know of only one or two men who had the courage to tell their wives and sweethearts who she really was.

Ladies in the Fizz Campaign

The ball showed one very startling circumstance and that is that the battle of fizz water which is being waged in our midst has extended to the ladies. It may be inferred that the campaign of the rival beverages has become sharp and critical when feminine recruits must be enlisted to assist the fighting agents. The pulling and hauling which took place before the wines were chosen for the affair would make a story all by itself. It was a spectacular triumph for Ned Greenway and Tom McCann, the leaders of the Mumm forces, and for Willie O'Connor, the generalissimo of the Clicquot troops, to induce such women as Mrs. Gus Taylor and Miss Jennie Crocker, Mrs. Walter Martin and Mrs. Oscar Cooper to garb themselves in the semblance of these embattled vintages. Nothing of the sort has ever occurred anywhere before. The announcement in the papers of the character of these costumes was an advertisement not only invaluable to the agents but absolutely unique. Of course all their friends had to keep in tone with these charming maskers by ordering the wines which they represented. By the way, it might open your eyes if I told you how many quarts of the costly stuff were quaffed that night.

Bridge is a Mania with Them

For those who look upon card playing as a mere pastime it is amusing to watch the antics of the "bridge fiends" who play as though life depended on their winning. At a recent card party one lady whose acquaintance with the game is slight and uncertain, kept her table in a state of nervous irritability by continually consulting a tiny manual which she had fastened in the lace of her dress. This novel expedient so delayed the game that her opponents lost their self-possession and played badly with the result that the lady who followed the book captured the first prize of the afternoon. This lady will not enjoy another such triumph for a long time to come for she has been boycotted by the "fiends." The bridge boycott is a peculiar institution which operates very effectually in the card playing sets. Another lady who has been boycotted is considered to have earned that punishment by her extraordinary conduct during the past season. On entering the card room it is her habit to examine the place cards and if she finds that an inexpert partner has been assigned to her, she substitutes one to her satisfaction. At a big bridge party a week ago this lady appealed to her hostess to give her a better partner and was very sharply told that if she did not like the arrangements she might retire from the game. It is quite common for players who pride themselves on their bridge to ring up their hostesses in advance to ascertain who will be present. If the company does not come up to their notions they send their declinations. There will not be so much bridge playing during Lent, some hostesses considering it inappropriate to the penitential season and others being glad of the excuse to avoid the outlays required for the expensive prizes without which no bridge party is considered worth while.

Mrs. Graham and Belasco

The announcement that Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara intends to place herself under the tutelage of David Belasco to the end that she may satisfy a long-cherished yearning for footlight distinction serves to remind me that she was not so well disposed toward the so-called wizard ten years ago. It was only a short time before that Mr. Graham had made his big strike in Pennsylvania oil and with his wife he was registered at the old Palace. One day Mrs. Graham created no end of a sensation about the hotel by pouring the vials of her wrath upon the name of David Belasco. Mrs. Graham explained to all who took an interest in her plaint that Belasco had appropriated a playlet which she had submitted for his approval and that he was using it as a composition of his own. She declared that she was going to bring suit against the playwright. Mr. Graham, however, quieted his wife and refused to allow her to engage in litigation. He does not relish that sort of publicity. I am of the opinion that he will not approve the histrionic ambition of his interesting helpmate.

The Kip Divorce

The divorce of the "Larry" Kips was unsensational to a degree. Mrs. Kip secured it on the ground of desertion and the whereabouts of her husband is not known. The decree was granted without any undue display of family linen or emotion. Mrs. Kip was deserted in 1904 and since then has done dressmaking to earn a livelihood. "Larry" Kip was formerly one of the most prominent beaux of society. He is the only son of the William Kips, and grandson of the late Bishop Kip. One of his sisters is Mrs. Guy Edie of Washington, wife of Dr. Edie of the army who for a time was medical adviser to the Roosevelt household. Another sister, Mary Kip, was a great belle here and in New York. She also married in the army. The Kips belong to the well-known New York family of that name and are relatives of Henry Spies Kip whose wife recently secured a Reno divorce. The I. Lawrence Kips, prominent in New York society, are their cousins. Larry Kip, at last accounts, was in Boston. Several years ago he was conspicuous in Honolulu where he figured in a romance that supplied much material for gossip. Even before his marriage young Kip was the hero of many heart affairs. Twice his engagement was announced, once to an Oakland belle who has since married. When he did finally take a bride she proved to be an estimable young woman quite without social pretensions. Their marriage was a surprise to society and after it Larry enjoyed a semi-obscurity for several years. Mrs. Kip was Miss Willa Dick. Her sister is married to J. D. Hayes, son of old Michael Hayes who was widely known as the "father of Hayes Valley."

A Taxi Story on Billy O'Connor

The story of Billy O'Conner and the taxicab is told by the hero on himself. It was in the early hours after a late evening that Mr. O'Connor found himself with a friend approaching the Fairmont in a taxi. The Fairmont is where Mr. O'Connor makes his home, so it was the natural end of the journey and the place of financial settlement. Reasoning thus Mr. O'Connor searched his pockets for the fare. They were empty. "You'll have to pay, Joe," he explained to his friend, "I've spent all my money." "Spent all mine too," responded Joe; "What'll we do?" It is known that taxi-drivers are given to taking strange gentlemen who ask for credit to the nearest police station, a custom which, when one is personally unknown to the driver, it is well to respect. Mr. O'Connor and his friend believed that they were personally unknown to this particular driver and they respected the custom. The situation was rapidly reviewed as the cab climbed California street. The result was a determination to avoid the police, if possible, and a decision to finish the night in the taxi. It would be a simple matter to get money to pay for it in the morning. Almost at the last moment, then, a hurried order to turn about and drive to the Cliff House. It was a long trip and nothing at the end but an order to drive to the ferry. Through the park and down Market street rolled the cab with its weary occupants. By the time the ferry was reached fatigue had made them reckless. They were ready to risk jail. "To the Fairmont," they said boldly. Arrived, the two tired travelers alighted, the friend assuming an air of detached irresponsibility. "Charge it to me," said Billy lightly, the terrible tension of the moment well concealed. An easy "All right" from the driver floated back to them as the cab sped away in the gray light of dawn. The two looked after it. "Never hesitated," remarked the friend disgustedly. "You might have done it hours ago." Which considering all things and the taximeter, Mr. O'Connor believes was a display of cruel ingratitude.

Mrs. Frank Leslie and Wilde

In reviewing the history of Mrs. Frank Leslie on the occasion of that remarkable lady's arrival in this city the newspapers omitted to state that she was once the wife of Willie Wilde, the brother of Oscar. Yet Mrs. Leslie's marriage to Willie was a sensation of the days when Oscar himself was the reigning sensation of two continents. Mrs. Leslie was proud to be the brother-in-law of the great epigrammatist, esthete and playwright and when his plays were taking London by storm she was always conspicuous in a box with her young husband. But Willie Wilde shone only in a reflected light and was a very lazy and extravagant fellow, defects which Mrs. Leslie could not endure. So their married life was neither happy nor of long duration.

Giacomo Minkowsky's Success

Those who had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Giocamo Minkowsky, the composer, during his visit to this city will rejoice to learn that he has achieved a great artistic success in Berlin. Minkowsky paid a visit to this city when he was comparatively unknown, went about a great deal in artistic circles and was really discovered by our cognoscenti. His visit had a romantic outcome for he fell in love with Miss Galland, the sister of Barney Galland, and they were married. Minkowsky's great hit in this country was made with his comic opera, "The Smugglers of Badayez" which was sung by the Bostonians. Afterwards he became the director of the Metropolitan Vocal School in Carnegie Hall, New York. The presence of Mr. and Mrs. Minkowsky in Berlin is necessitated by the fact that the composer's latest opera, "Die Liebesprobe" will be produced at the Theatre des Westens next season. The libretto for this work was written by the celebrated Dr.

In the Social Spotlight

The recent death of Mr. Egbert Judson Benedict was a severe shock to a large circle of old friends. Mr. Benedict was noted for his unostentatious charities and was a sincere supporter of philanthropic enterprises. He was the first San Franciscan to subscribe to the fund for the Messina sufferers. A great traveler, Mr. Benedict was exceedingly fond of San Francisco. His widow has been in a state of collapse since his death and her condition causes great concern among her friends.

In the party which will tour Europe with Mr. James Phelan will be Mrs. Atherton, Miss Phelan and Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Eddy.

Colonel and Mrs. W. R. Smedburg are sojourning in Los Anbeles and are registered at the Hotel Alexandria.

The following guests spent Saturday and Sunday at "The Tavern of Tamalpais": Mr. and Mrs. James K. Lynch, Mr. and Mrs. O. Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Dutton, Ralph B. Sinclair, Mrs. S. Alice Morgan and daughters, Miss L. May Baker, A. J. Brandenstein, Robert Capell and family, Mr. and Mrs. M. J. Murphy, Miss L. E. Callahan and the Misses Sutherland, Australia.

Ralston White entertained Mrs. William Boericke, the Misses Ruth and Dorothy Boericke and William Falley at dinner at the Tavern recently.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included Mrs. B. H. Pratt, F. A. Long, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Gilbert, Sumner Hardy, M. E. McLoughlin, Mrs. W. J. Hotchkiss, Miss Hazel Hotchkiss, Charles E. Wilson, C. F. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Baldwin, John W. McCarthy Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Roval D. Hawley and Leo Alexander.

Mrs. Leslie Carter with Mr. W. L. Payne, her husband, has returned to the Fairmont after a week in some of the smaller towns. They leave for the South in a few days.

John Gayley, vice-president of the United States Steel Corporation, has been in San Francisco for the past few days and is making his home at the Fairmont.

Among the well known navy women who have been at the Fairmont for the last week are Mrs. Sheldon Evans, Mrs. Chester Wells of Washington, D. C., and Mrs. Robert Morris of Coronado, Cal. Mrs. Morris is en route to the North where she will join her friends for a prolonged visit.

Mr. and Mrs. William Miller Graham of Santa Barbara who have been at the Fairmont for the few days spent in this city have left for New York and from there will go to London where it is reported that Mrs. Miller has taken a house for the coming season and will entertain with lavish hand. Mrs. Miller was the motif for a number of functions while at the Fairmont.

Henry Stephens, Mrs. G. D. Stewart and Miss Campbell of Detroit. Mich., motored down in their Peerless from Oakland and will spend some time at Del Monte.

Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Beaver and their daughter, Miss Marian Beaver, came down to Del Monte for the week-end from San Francisco. Mr. Beaver is an enthusiastic golfer and spends much of his time on the links.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Boyer and their two sons are at Del Monte from Detroit, Michigan.

C. E. Grosbeck, manager of the San Diego Gas and Electric Co., was a recent visitor to San Francisco and stopped at the Palace.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Hutchins of Montreal, Canada, were recent arrivals at Del Monte.

Mr. V. S. McClatchy, the well-known newspaperman of Sacramento, is registered at Del Monte with his wife.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A Smith and their two charming daughters, Misses Myrtle and Adeline Smith of Minneapolis, arrived at Del Monte during the Week. Mr. Smith is the president of the Smith Lumber Company of Minneapolis, and is here with the intention of extending his interests.

Mr. and Mrs. Theo. B. Wilcox and their young son, T. B. Wilcox Jr. of Portland, Oregon, are at Del Monte. Mr. Wilcox has been coming to Del Monte for many years and finds it an ideal spot at this time of year.

Mr. Thornwell Mullalay entertained a small party in the Green Room of the Fairmont Hotel at a late supper on last Friday. Included among his guests were the following: Mrs. William Miller Graham, Mr. John Lawson, Miss Martha Calhoun, Mr. Blanchard Howard Chase, Miss Virginia Jollife, Mr. William M. Graham, Miss Marion Newhall, Mr. Arthur Cheeseborough, Miss Elisabeth Newhall, Mr. Richard M. Hotaling, Miss Julia Langhorne, Mr. J. Gayley and Mrs. Blanchard Howard Chase.

The polo players of the Twelfth Hussars of England out here to play the Burlingame team and later to go to the South to compete for honors, were guests at the Palace during the week. The party included Colonel F. E. Gill, Major and Mrs. Hobson, Major Robert Lee and Lieutenant Hurndall.

The Palace is the favorite place of residence for most of the prominent visitors from the northern cities. Among the recent arrivals are J. C. Ford, Mrs. Ford and Miss Ford of Seattle. Mr. Ford is the president of the Pacific Coast Steamship Company whose steamers ply between San Diego, San Francisco and the North. M. M. Carrahar, a prominent real estate operator, and W. D. Perkins, a banker and broker of Seattle, are also at the Palace.

In the old days before the fire the Palace was noted as the headquarters for mining men from all parts of the Pacific Coast and all over the world. So it is again. In the court, as in days gone by, one finds the mining men whenever they are in town. Among the guests at the Palace in the last few days were John B. Hobson, a man of great mining interests in and about Victoria, B. C., John D. Keating who is heavily interested in mining properties at Redding, Cal., Dr. F. M. Archer who also has mines at Redding, J. A. Yerington who is constructing one of the largest smelters in Nevada.

Adolph Meyer, one of the largest growers of coffee in Guatemala, is at the Palace on his annual visit to San Francisco. Mr. Meyer is accompanied by his daughter.

C. F. Whiteley, general manager of the Atlantic Smelting and Refining Co. of Salt Lake, is at the Palace. Mr. Whiteley is accompanied by his family.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Bates celebrated their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary on Saturday evening, February 12, with a large and elaborate bridge party at their home in Clay street.

Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Hickman of Sausalito recently celebrated the anniversary of their golden wedding by an elaborate function at their beautiful home on the hill. About five hundred people were present. Mr. and Mrs. Hickman were formerly residents of Stockton. They purchased their present home from Wakefield Baker.

An event of the near future is a large reception which Mrs. Warren S. Palmer will give in Alameda in honor of Miss Renee Kelly whose engagement was recently announced to Edward Alexander Palmer.

Mrs. J. F. Humburg and two children of San Francisco are registered at Del Monte.

The wedding of Miss Lalla Wenzelberger and Lieutenant Shea will take place in the fall. Mrs. Dulce Bolado Ashe will give a tea in honor of Miss Wenzelberger on Sunday afternoon at her home in Sausalito.

Ensign Charles C. Hartigan, U. S. N., returned during the week with the Pacific Fleet. His marriage to Miss Margaret Thompson will take place after Easter. Miss Thompson is the daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. James A. Thompson of this city.

The engagement is announced of Miss Edna Ingram, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Ingram of Oakland and Dr. William Leon Channell.

Mrs. Lawton and her sister Mrs. Kierulff have issued cards for a large bridge party which they will give at their home in Haight street on Friday afternoon, February 25.

Mrs. Ramon Wilson and her daughter Miss Marion will leave in May for a lengthy tour abroad. Miss Wilson possesses a very fine soprano voice and will pursue her studies abroad.

Miss Genevieve King is at present the guest of Mrs. Horace Hill in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. S. J. Churchill and their attractive daughter Miss Marie have taken a house in San Mateo where they will permanently reside. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. Churchill and their young son Thomas J. Churchill Jr. will also reside in San Mateo.

My dear Bess:—

At last my dream is to be something more than a dream. I can hardly believe it myself! But the first payment is made and I feel at least half as important again.

Hunted up an agent and last week he drove me out in a machine. We started on the Lake Shore drive, I believe it is called, passing Lake Merritt, and then on slowly, higher and higher, into the foothills, through the most lovely road, lined on either side so thickly with eucalyptus, oaks and palms, that it presented an almost tropical appearance.

Everything is so beautifully green that it is like buying your ground with the lawn already there.

I have finally chosen a lot with some lovely old oaks on it, and my house is entirely planned (of course). Part of it I will tell you of: the dining room will open with French windows on to a terrace facing the hills and to miss nothing, the living room will open with the same fascinating windows, likewise on a terrace facing the Bay and Mt. Tamalpais. Both views are so lovely there is little to choose between them.

My garden I shall begin at once whether we build this summer or not. My fingers are itching to get at it now, and see in reality the pergola covered with scarlet passion vines, the shallow fairy pool with purple iris nodding their lovely heads above it, the old mission benches here and there with their background of hollyhocks. And oh! the thousand and one charming effects I have in my mind, already, to transfer to my garden.

I can easily see from your last letter that you are more than interested and I fully expect we shall be deadly rivals, as to the beauty of our respective places.

Yours,

—Claire.

WHAT I MEAN, MISS, BY KISSABLE LIPS!

By John P. Doran

(The following verses were written in answer to the lines, "What Do You Mean, Sir, by Kissable Lips?" which appeared in the Sunday Call a week or two ago).

"Kissable lips, Sir! Pray, what may they be?"
Coyly, you ask, Miss. And I,
Challenged to tell what the words mean to me,
Venture to say in reply:

Lips that are red with a cherry-like glow,
Lips that are luscious as wine;
Lips whose rare grace and fine symmetry show
Traces of fingers Divine.

Lips that bespeak the pure fragrance of Spring,
Lips that are mansions of prayer;
Lips fraught with sweet benedictions that bring
Hope to the soul in despair.

Lips whence flow sage admonitions of love,
Lips ever prompt to condone;
Lips as unstained as the Seraphs above;
Lips—to be brief—like your own.

Mantell in "Richelieu"

By Edward F. O'Day

It would be interesting to know whether Mr. Robert Mantell would rather attain perfection in a mediocre play than approximate perfection in a masterpiece. This, it seems to me, is a dilemma calculated to give pause to all but the greatest and sincerest artists; a sort of touchstone for the trying of the precious metal of the theatre, warranted to indicate the precise quantity of alloy. It is not such an easy dilemma to resolve as it may seem; there is much to be said for either horn of it; indeed it goes to the very root of the difficult matter of artistic achievement. While on the one hand perfection is the aim of every artist, on the other it may be argued that to reach perfection in any but the highest field is to suffer comparative defeat. But to leave abstractions and to reduce the question to concrete terms, let us consider Mr. Mantell's Richelieu in comparison with his King Lear. In King Lear Mr. Mantell is not perfect; no player ever has been perfect in that tremendous role. Perhaps Mr. Mantell is not so near to perfection as others have been, but certainly his interpretation of the role brings him measurably close to the goal. In Richelieu, in my modest opinion, Mr. Mantell has a character which he is capable of delineating perfectly; not for one moment during the five acts did his characterization sag from the high plane on which he started it. It need not be pointed out that "King Lear" is a masterpiece while "Richelieu" is a very inferior play. "Richelieu" is not even Bulwer Lytton at his best whereas Shakespeare wrote nothing greater than "King Lear." So the dilemma may be restated in more particular terms. Does Mr. Robert Mantell rejoice more in his Richelieu than in his Lear? Does he feel that in mastering the part of the cardinal, in wresting from it the last iota of effectiveness, he is doing a greater thing for the stage than in striving mightily, yet failing, to conquer King Lear? I have not much doubt in my own mind as to the answer which Mr. Mantell would return if this question were addressed to him. I think he would say that it is more glorious to give an interpretation of any Shakespearian role which commends itself to competent critics as excelling the generality of respectable interpretations than to apply the perfection of art to the imperfect work of an inferior dramatist. More than any other art that of acting is a constant striving toward an ideal which eludes. Of this picture or of that poem it may be said, "it is perfect of its kind; there is no room for improvement," but of the greatest actors delineating the greatest roles who has the authority so to speak? How can comparisons be made and decision be passed with certainty when memory, the memory of one man who has seen only the great actors of his time and must take the achievements of the others on the testimony of other men, enters so essentially into the discussion? However, it is not so difficult to pass judgment on a play like "Richelieu." The limits of this drama are easily fixed, its possibilities easily explored and while easy treatment is not applicable to its interpretation, still there is not a great deal of difficulty attached to the problem of judging how far an actor has satisfied its requirements. There have been a great many more bad Richelieus than good ones; before Mr. Mantell I never saw one whom I could by any stretch of the meaning of the word call perfect. Mr. Mantell is first of all an artist in makeup and in the present case he is every inch a cardinal, full of that characteristic dignity of mien one associates with prelates, though it is puzzling to know just what features it resides in. The churchman breathes in every look, every gesture, every word of that charming second scene of the first act where the cardinal wins the confidence of his ward and hears her romantic secret. It is a very pretty picture that Mr. Mantell and Miss Booth Russell make in this scene; the white hairs and ashen face and trembling hand of the cardinal contrasted with the raven locks and the pink and white beauty of his ward as strikingly as the cardinal's piercing eye and subtle speech are set off by the girl's modest melting gaze and silken utterance. In that scene Mr. Mantell strikes the keynote of his interpretation; ecclesiastical dignity combined with human sympathy, the benignity of an aged man of the world with the domineering ruthless strength of a monarch. Never for an instant does he fall short of the characterization thus begun. Through every succeeding scene his control is sure; there is no faltering or letting down; it is the most polished impersonation imaginable. One naturally waits with interest for those familiar situations which have helped to keep "Richelieu" on the stage. One is curious to see how Mr. Mantell will deliver the tags about the pen and the sword and the lexicon of youth; how he will treat that really great speech about the curse of Rome. The first two were impressive; the last tremendous. A real cardinal could not have struck more terror from the words of that awful menace. In leading up to these well-known speeches Mr. Mantell's art is to conceal art, but one who studies him carefully with a mind on the sequence of the play cannot but admire the skill with which he prepares the background for his picture, by what careful steps he advances from one vantage point of intensity to another until the audience is caught in the grip of his situation and yields completely to his spell. I do not know who was the great original Richelieu, but I think that if Bulwer Lytton could have had the privilege of witnessing Mr. Mantell in the role he would have expressed himself as perfectly satisfied.

The third act in "The Round Up" presents one of the greatest sensations ever seen on the stage—a battle between two white men and a band of marauding Apache Indians in the "bad lands" on the Mexican border. Twenty Indians appear in this act with their ponies.

What Lamb Said About "King Lear"

All the local dramatic critics having referred in their criticisms to Charles Lamb's famous assertion that "King Lear" cannot be acted, Robert Mantell was inspired to point out to an interviewer that Lamb referred only to the mechanical part of the production. According to Mantell Lamb's statement was made at a time when peas were shaken in a box to imitate the sound of rain and the flash of a dark lantern represented lightning. But this is most emphatically not what Lamb referred to, as is evident from his words. As Mr. Mantell seems to have forgotten their purport, it may be well to quote:

ANGELO ANTOLA
Baritone with Lambardi Grand Opera Company coming to the Columbia Theatre.

"The Lear of Shakespeare cannot be acted. The contemptible machinery with which they mimic the storm which he goes out in, is not more inadequate to represent the horrors of the real elements than any actor can be to represent Lear. The greatness of Lear is not in corporal dimension, but in intellectual: the explosions of his passions are terrible as a volcano; they are storms turning up and disclosing to the bottom that rich sea, his mind, with all its vast riches. It is his mind which is laid bare. This case of flesh and blood seems too insignificant to be thought on; even as he himself neglects it. On the stage we see nothing but corporal infirmities and weakness, the impotence of rage; while we read it, we see not Lear, but we are Lear;—we are in his mind; we are sustained by a grandeur, which baffles the malice of daughters and storms; in the aberrations of his reason, we discover a mighty irregular power of reasoning, immethodised from the ordinary purposes of life, but exerting its powers, as the wind blows where it listeth, at will on the corruptions and abuses of mankind. What have looks or tones to do with that sublime identification of his age with that of the heavens themselves, when in his reproaches to them for conniving at the injustice of his children, he reminds them that 'they themselves are old!' What gesture shall we appropriate to this? What has the voice or the eye to do with such things? But the play is beyond all art, as the tamperings with it show." Having quoted this much for the benefit of Mr. Mantell it may be well, for the benefit of the critics, to repeat the words with which one of the greatest of dramatic critics, William Hazlitt, commenced an article on this play: "We wish that we could pass this play over, and say nothing about it. All that we can say must fall far short of the subject; or even of what we ourselves conceive of it. To attempt to give a description of the play itself or of its effect upon the mind, is mere impertinence; yet we must say something."

—The Theatregoer.

Florence Roberts in "Gloria"

Florence Roberts has been creating something of a furore at the Novelty Theatre with her work in Rupert Hughes' strong drama, "The Transformation." The play will be withdrawn with Sunday's night performance, and on next Monday evening, February 21, Miss Roberts will be seen in "Gloria," a new and successful comedy by James Bernard Fagan. The versatility of the star is well known, and her work in comedy is equally as fine as in emotional roles. "Gloria" is a comedy of the romantic type, with the scenes laid in Italy in the sixteenth century. Miss Roberts appears as Gloria Capponi who, being both beautiful and rich, is sought after by many admirers. The action of the comedy centers around Gloria's efforts to get rid of her assorted suitors by making them ridiculous. All sorts of ingenious and deliciously humorous incidents naturally follow. The Messrs. Shubert have given the play a most lavish production in every detail. The capable supporting company, including White Whittlesey and Maude Granger will be excellently cast.

McIntyre and Heath at the Van Ness

The new musical fun-maker "McIntyre and Heath in Hayti" will be seen at the Van Ness beginning Monday night for two weeks, with a special matinee on Washington's Birthday and regular matinees on Saturday only. The story concerns two rollicking negroes who by force of circumstances become involved in a financier's plot to control the markets of Hayti and the resultant rocket-like revolution is one that lends itself well to the comic personalities of McIntyre and Heath. Musically the piece is expected to make a big hit, for the many numbers are said to have the appeal of a vivacious rhythm which is highly effective in the voices of the sprightly chorus. Among the typically modern musical numbers are "Bamboo Lane," "Chickens," "Romeo and Juliet" and the spectacular "Good Bye, Miss Liberty." The company is unusually large and includes many stage entertainers of importance, among them being Julian Rose and Marion Stanley.

Mantell's Last Week

The third and final week of Robert Mantell's season at the Columbia Theatre will begin on Monday night, February 21 with a presentation of Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice" in which the star will appear in the role of Shylock and Miss Marie Booth Russell as Portia. This will be the last presentation of this play during the engagement and it should attract a big audience. On Tuesday night "Romeo and Juliet" will be played and at the matinee on Wednesday the bill is to be "Richelieu." "Macbeth" is announced for Wednesday night and on Thursday evening and at the Saturday matinee the play is to be "King Lear." "As You Like It" is announced for Friday night and on Saturday evening as the closing bill of the engagement Mr. Mantell will give his remarkable performance of "Louis XI." There is a big demand for seats for all the above performances.

Schumann-Heink's Farewell Concert

Mme. Schumann-Heink will give her farewell concert this Sunday afternoon at Dreamland Rink, presenting a program such as no other artist would dare attempt. Four great operatic arias will constitute the first group of works to be given. These are "Mittrane" by Rossi (1668), "Sapho" by Gounod, "Mignon" by Ambroise Thomas and "Samson and Delilah" by Saint-Saens. The second group will consist of two Beethoven works and three by Schubert and a dozen other great works will be included in the offering. A special feature will be six Hungarian Gypsy songs by Brahms. Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's and on Sunday the box office will open at 9 a. m. at the Rink. Manager Greenbaum has arranged to have over 1000 seats at $1.00 and 500 at $1.50, so that hundreds may be accommodated at these moderate prices.

Lambardi Grand Opera at the Columbia

San Francisco is to have a limited grand opera season this year for Gottlob, Marx and Company announce that the Lambardi Grand Opera Company will stay at the Columbia Theatre for eleven performances only, opening on Sunday night, February 27 with their production of "Madame Butterfly." This will be followed on Monday by "Gioconda" and on Tuesday night we are to hear for the first time here Mascagni's beautiful Japanese opera "Iris." "Lucia di Lammermoor" is announced for the Wednesday matinee and on Wednesday night "Aida" will be sung. "Faust" will be heard on Friday night and "Iris" again at the matinee on Saturday. On Saturday night the company will be heard to fine advantage in "Il Trovatore" and a double bill composed of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" will be offered on Sunday afternoon. "La Boheme" will be the bill on Sunday night. Seats for the entire eleven performances will go on sale Thursday morning at nine o'clock.

BLANCHE HALL

"The Right of Way" at the Savoy

The last performances of "The Virginian" will be given at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the Sunday matinee "The Right of Way," with the original Klaw and Erlanger production, will begin an engagement limited to one week, with a special matinee on Tuesday, Washington's Birthday. So many dramatized novels have fallen by the wayside in recent years that the success of "The Right of Way" is gratifying, the more so because Sir Gilbert Parker's novel, from which Eugene W. Presbrey made the play, is an uncommonly fine one. P. Aug. Anderson, one of the best of our "character actors," plays Joe Portugaise notably well. The Charley Steele of Hallett Thompson is said to be the best of this favorite's stage portraits. He makes Steele's regeneration and ultimate return to a consciousness of his past life, as well as his heroic self-sacrifice, really impressive. The company, which includes Arleen Hackett, is an unusually good one and the pictorial side of the production very beautiful. The usual matinees, in addition to the one on Washington's Birthday, will be given on Thursday and Saturday. "The Spoilers," a dramatization of Rex Beach's famous story of Alaskan life, will follow "The Right of Way."

Civil War Play at Ye Liberty

At their offering for Washington's Birthday week the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will stage "The Warrens of Virginia" on Monday evening next. The piece will run throughout the week with a special holiday matinee on Tuesday. This production is one that transbay theatregoers are sure to show a good deal of interest in, because it will be the first appearance of the celebrated David Belasco play in Oakland. Unlike any other Civil War play, "The Warrens of Virginia" deals with the starvation side of warfare. The period is just before the close of the struggle, when nothing but the arrival of an expected supply train can save the Confederate forces under Lee from surrender. Strange as it may sound, it is around the fortunes of this supply train that the story revolves, and that it has proven of interest is best attested by the success of the piece. Manager Bishop intends to give "The Warrens of Virginia" a production next week thoroughly in keeping with its importance. Scenically it will be as fine a one as Oakland has ever seen, and the cast, to be headed by Blanche Hall as Agatha Warren, Sydney Ayres as her Northern lover and Robert Harrison as General "Buck" Warren, is certain to be of adequate strength. After one week of the war play, James M. Barrie's "Little Minister" will be revived.

Good Bill at the Orpheum

The Orpheum program for next week will have two headliners, Walter C. Kelly, "the Virginia Judge" and Fred Lindsay, the Australian bushman and stockwhip expert. Mr. Kelly, in the opinion of many, is the most entertaining monologist on the vaudeville stage. For many years he has been a favorite in this country and last season he gathered fresh laurels in London. His performance is a review of a day's doings in a courthouse in the South, presided over by a characteristic Virginia judge. When Fred Lindsay came to this country last year under Martin Beck's direction he was quite unknown, except in certain circles of sporting men and big game hunters. He astonishes his audiences with the marvelous feats he performs with a thirty-foot whip with two-foot dock, such as is used by Australian bushmen. Charles W. Bowser, Edith Hinkle and their company will appear in a strong modern one-act play by Oliver White called "Superstition" which the Eastern theatrical critics praised highly. The Reed Brothers, unique gymnasts, will be included in the coming attractions. Next week will be the last of Thorne and Carleton who will appear in a new skit called "American Justice." It will also conclude the engagement of La Veen-Cross and Company, Emma Francis and her Arabian Boys and Bert Leslie in his slang classic, "Hogan in Society."

Blanche Walsh at the Macdonough

After two weeks of great artistic success in this city Blanche Walsh will go to the Macdonough Theatre in Oakland with "The Test," the play in which she has scored one of the finest triumphs of her distinguished career. Of Miss Walsh's artistry nothing need be said but it is interesting to note that she considers her supporting company the strongest with which she has ever been surrounded. "The Test" will be seen at the Macdonough Theatre for a limited engagement of five nights commencing Monday, February 21 with a special matinee on Washington's Birthday.

"The Two Orphans" at the Alcazar

Great interest has been aroused by the announcement that the Alcazar company will appear this coming week in "The Two Orphans." This play by the celebrated D'Enery is recognized as a classic of the English-speaking stage although it came originally from France. Its opportunities for fine ensemble effects is so great that it has been a favorite drama for all-star production and some of the greatest players of this country have appeared in it. The production at the Alcazar will be a sumptuous one and all the favorites of the stock company will have sympathetic roles in which they will be able to display their powers to the greatest advantage.

With the return of the Lambardi Grand Opera Company to San Francisco will come Madam Ester Adaberto, an old favorite in this city who, since her last appearance here three years ago with the same organization, has become one of the world's most famous dramatic sopranos. She went from the Lambardi company to the Metropolitan and there became a star in a night when she sang Leonora to Caruso's Manrico.

he was appointed private secretary for the two at a salary of a hundred and fifty francs a month. He was to keep his room outside, but would come each day to receive orders, and, for the sake of convenience, would have at his disposition one of the rooms on the third floor, which he might use as an office.

He was allowed to choose, and curiously enough, selected one which proved to be just above Monsieur Humbert's office.

Arsene was not long in discovering that his position was something ridiculously like a sinecure. In two months he had only two trifling letters to copy, and was summoned to his employer's office only once, which meant that only once was he able officially to inspect the strong-box. He noted also that the incumbent of this sinecure was not regarded as worthy of mingling with the guests of the house, for never was he invited to participate in the mundane functions for which it was so famous.

He felt no regret on that score, however, vastly preferring to remain modestly in the background. Besides, he was not wasting his time. In the first place he made a number of clandestine visits to the office below and paid his respects to the strong-box, which, nevertheless, still remained hermetically sealed. It was an enormous block of iron and steel of stubborn front, against which neither files nor jimmy would avail.

Arsene Lupin was not impatient. He took the measures that were necessary and, after minute and careful soundings on the floor of his room, inserted a lead pipe which came out between two projections in the cornice of the ceiling below. Through this hole, this speaking-tube and eye-hole, he hoped both to see and hear.

Thenceforth he spent his hours lying face to the floor, and he did, indeed, often behold the Humberts in conferences before the strong-box, consulting their ledgers and handling their papers. When they turned one at a time the four knobs that controlled the lock, he tried to catch the combination by counting the click of the bearings. He watched their motions and listened to their words. He wondered where they kept the key.

One day, having seen them leave the office without closing the safe, he hastily descended and entered. They had already returned.

"Oh, excuse me! I have made a mistake," said he, but Gervaise stepped forward and caught him by the arm.

"Come in, my dear Monsieur Lupin. You should feel at home here. I wish you would give us your advice. What do you think we ought to sell—our government bonds or these foreign securities?"

"But what about the injunction?" said Arsene in astonishment.

"Oh, it does not affect all our assets."

She swung the door wide open and there in the pigeon-holes and piled up on the shelves were the imposing bundles fastened with tape. She seized one, but her husband protested.

"No, no, Gervaise, that would be a mistake, to sell our foreign securities. They are rising, while the government bonds are at their highest point. Don't you think so, my dear Monsieur Lupin?"

Dear Monsieur Lupin had no opinion, but advised the sacrifice of the government bonds. Then Madame Humbert took up another bundle, and from this extracted a document. It was a three-per-cent bond, the coupons of which called for 1,374 francs each. Monsieur Humbert slipped it into his pocket. That afternoon, accompanied by his secretary, he called upon a broker and sold it, receiving in return forty-six thousand francs.

Despite the remark of Madame Humbert, Arsene Lupin did not feel at home. Quite to the contrary, his situation in the mansion puzzled him. A number of times he was surprised to note that the servants did not know his name. They called him "monsieur." The master of the house always designated him thus: "You will ask monsieur to come down" or "Has monsieur arrived?"

Moreover, after their first enthusiasm had worn off, the Humberts harly spoke to him, and though they treated him with all the deference due to a benefactor, they never seemed to give him a thought. Once he was passing through the hall, he heard Madame Humbert say to a couple of gentlemen:

"He is such a hermit!"

"So be it," thought he; "now I am a hermit," and he gave up trying to explain the eccentricities of this family. He devoted himself to the execution of his project.

The event was hastened by the violent campaign against the Humberts, which was taken up by several papers. Arsene Lupin watched the development of the drama and noted the excitement of the Humberts. He concluded that further delay would ruin all his plans.

For five successive days, instead of leaving at six o'clock, as was his custom, he locked himself in his room, and the household supposed that he had gone. As a matter of fact, he was lying on the floor and watching Monsieur Humbert's office.

During these five evenings he did not find the favorable opportunity for which he was waiting. He therefore departed about midnight through the little door which opened into the yard, to which he had procured a key. The sixth day, however, he was informed that the Humberts, in reply to the malicious insinuations of their enemies, had offered to open the safe.

"This evening will be my chance," thought Arsene Lupin.

So it was indeed. After dinner Monsieur Humbert retired to his office where his wife joined him a little later, and they began an examination of the ledgers taken from the safe.

"Here goes!" murmured Arsene.

He opened the window over the yard. Without all was dark on this moonless and starless night. He took from his closet a knotted rope, which he attached to the balcony railing, and, climbing over, carefully let himself down as far as the balcony below his own. For a moment he stood motionless. Heavy portieres hid the interior of the offices, but Arsene listened attentively for a few moments.

Reassured by the silence within, he gave the glass doors a gentle push. If anyone had taken the trouble to try them, it would have been found that they did not fasten, for during the afternoon Arsene had tampered with the bolt so that it did not hold.

The doors parted slightly. Then with the utmost precaution he gradually increased the aperture until he was able to insert his head. Through a narrow opening between the loose portieres he could now see the Humberts seated before the safe.

They seemed absorbed in their task and only occasionally

NO COMMISSIONS ACCEPTED

FROM PUBLISHERS, PRINTERS, ENGRAVERS, ELECTROTYPERS, ARTISTS, ETC.

The time has come when the relations existing between the advertiser, advertising agent and publisher must be changed.

OUR NEW POLICY

The advertising man today who renders a service to his client is clearly the representative of that client, and as such should be paid by him, and not by the man from whom he buys advertising space, engravings, electrotypes and other articles.

The fact that publications give commissions to agents of 10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent, 25 per cent, 33 1-3 per cent, and even as high as 40 per cent, makes very doubtful the value of the advertising man's opinion (no matter how honest) as to what publication to use. We believe that business men are generally opposed to the present system of discounts paid to advertising agencies. In our opinion, the business man cannot feel otherwise than that he is receiving at best, a very questionable service when the advertising agency is being paid by the publisher.

Imagine, if you can, a concern that would be willing to employ a purchasing agent who would work for nothing, provided he could secure his profit out of commissions paid by the house he buys from. You know that no one would agree to such a proposition, fully realizing that the poorer the material or goods sold by the dealer, the larger the inducement offered the purchasing agent.

We all admire the store that has ONE price to everybody, and we predict that the day will come when there will be ONE PUBLISHERS' rate for advertising to all alike.

Advertising is selling. advertising is salesmanship; advertising moves the products of the country; advertising creates the big successes. There is hardly a trade, line of business, profession or any utility corporation that can get along without advertising. A business of such vast importance as advertising should be on a good solid foundation.

Hereafter CURTIS-NEWHALL CO. will not accept commissions or discounts on any business placed for new accounts with publishers, printers, engravers, electrotypers, artists, etc., but will receive remuneration from the advertiser in the form of a regular monthly retainer fee.

exchanged a few whispered words. Arsene calculated the distance which separated him from them, decided upon the exact motions that he would have to make to overcome them one at a time, before they could call for help, and he was just about to leap when Madame Humbert said:

"How cool the room has suddenly become! I am going to bed. Aren't you coming?"

"I am anxious to finish."

"Why, it will take you all night!"

"Oh, no. An hour at the very most."

She retired. Twenty, thirty minutes passed. Arsene pushed the door a little farther. The portieres stirred. He pushed again. Monsieur turned and, seeing the portieres moved by the wind, rose to close the door.

There was not a cry, not even the semblance of a struggle. By a few well directed movements, and without inflicting any real injury upon his opponent, Arsene rendered him unconscious, wrapped his head in the curtain, tied his feet and hands and accomplished the whole affair in such a way that Monsieur Humbert did not even see the face of his assailant. Then he walked rapidly to the safe, seized two bundles of securities and put them under his arm. That done, he left the office, walked down the stairs and, upon reaching the yard, went off through the servants' gate. A carriage was waiting in the street.

"Take these," said he to the coachman, "and follow me."

Both returned to the office, and in two trips they had emptied the safe. This done, Arsene climbed to his room on the third floor, removed the rope and effaced every clue to his exploit. It was ended.

A few hours later, Arsene Lupin with the aid of his companion had catalogued the securities. Having suspected the real state of affairs, he felt no disappointment on learning that the Humbert fortune was not as large as had been rumored. The millions were not to be counted by hundreds nor even by tens, but, after all, the total still reached quite a respectable figure.

"Certainly," he mused, "I shall have some trouble when I try to negotiate these securities. I shall be confronted by the injunction, and a good many of them will have to be sold for a fraction of their value. Nevertheless, with this little fortune on which to depend, I shall be able to realize certain plans that are very dear to me."

The next day Arsene saw no reason why he should not return to the Humbert mansion, but upon taking up his morning paper, read the startling news that his employers had disappeared.

The safe was opened with great ceremony. The magistrates found in it exactly what Arsene had left, which was very little.

These are the facts and this is the explanation which Arsene Lupin's intervention furnishes for some of them. He himself told me the story one day when he was in a confidential mood.

"All in all," said I to him, "that was your best haul, was it not?"

Without answering me directly, he continued:

"In this affair there are unfathomable secrets. Why did they flee? Why did they not take advantage of the assistance that I gave them? It would have been easy enough for them to say: 'The hundred millions were in the safe. They are not there now because they have been stolen.'"

"And have you never felt pity for these unfortunates?"

"I!" exclaimed he, starting. "Do you expect me to feel remorse?"

"Call it remorse or regret, in short, sympathy of any kind."

"Sympathy for them?"

"Yes, sympathy for people whom you robbed of a fortune."

"What fortune?"

"Those bundles of securities."

"Those bundles of securities! You mean that I took from them several packages of securities, don't you? A portion of their inheritance? Why, sacrebleu, my dear fellow, you should have guessed by this time that they were forged, those securities! Do you understand? They were forged!"

I looked at him stupefied.

"Forged!" he cried angrily. "The notes, the Paris bonds, the government bonds, paper, all of them, nothing but paper! And you ask me to feel remorse? Why, it is they who ought to feel remorse! They outwitted me like any country yokel! They plucked me like the simplest of their dupes! From first to last I had the worst of the bargain! From the very first, I tell you! Do you know the role that I played in the Humbert scandal, or rather the role that they made me play? That of Andre Brawford! And I suspected nothing!

"While I was posing as a benefactor, a man who had risked his life to save his fellow man from ruffians, they were passing me off as one of the Brawfords!

"How do you like that? This eccentric fellow, who lived on the third floor, this hermit that kept in the background, was Brawford, and Brawford was I! Thus, thanks to me, thanks to the confidence that I inspired under the name of Brawford, the bankers lent their money and the notaries urged their clients to lend:

He stopped bruskly and, seizing my arm, spoke to me in an exasperated tone, which, however, clearly expressed a suggestion of admiration and sarcasm:

"My dear fellow, at this moment Gervaise Humbert owes me fifteen hundred francs!"

The thing struck me as so ridiculous that I could not help laughing. It was really an extraordinary joke, and he, too, burst into a roar of merriment.

"Yes, my dear boy, fifteen hundred francs! Not only did I fail to receive a sou of my salary, but she borrowed fifteen hundred francs more from me! All the savings of my young manhood! And can you guess why she borrowed? I give you a thousand guesses! For her charities! It is exactly as I say—for poor unfortunates that she claimed to be helping without the knowledge of her husband!

"Just imagine me in such a position! It is humorous, isn't it? Arsene Lupin done out of fifteen hundred fracs, and done by the sweet lady from whom he was stealing four millions in forged securities! Then, too, just imagine the plots, efforts and clever schemes that I was forced to employ to attain this grand result!

"That is the only time in my life that I was ever outwitted, but fichtre, it was thoroughly done then and nothing was omitted to make it complete!"

Auto Notes

C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of The Diamond Rubber Co., has just returned from a flying trip to Los Angles. His visit was occasioned by the necessity of increasing the facilities of the Southern branch in order to take care of their ever increasing proportion of the Southern California automobile trade.

"Automobile shows are a pretty good index of the demand for different makes of tires by the consumers and the consequent demand of the distributers on the manufacturer," says Mr. Mathewson of The Diamond Rubber Co. "Speaking of the recent coast shows, the San Francisco, Oakland, Portland and Los Angeles unlicensed, the result of the count of all combined gives Diamond Tires 41 per cent of the total number of cars exhibited using pneumatics. The remainder was divided up among many different makes. This showing is highly gratifying as the big yearly increase in business done by us indicates our construction and quality are right."

Walker Graves, a capitalist of San Joaquin Valley who owns the town of Jameson, has purchased a Chalmers "40" from the Pioneer Automobile Company. He has never owned a car before that cost less than $5000, but he is convinced that the Chalmers has as good stuff in it and is as correct in design as any high priced car on the market.

J. L. Whitmore, the energetic and hustling automobile agent of Stockton, was in town recently and took two Chalmers-Detroit cars back with him, one being a landaulet which is to stand in front of the new Stockton hotel for hack service and the other a "30" touring car. The Chalmers-Detroit landaulet will be the first and only closed car in use in Stockton.

Dr. L. H. Wagner is now the owner of a Hudson "20" runabout which he purchased from the Pioneer Automobile Company.

Dr. J. L. Maupin of Fresno, one of the best known surgeons of the San Joaquin Valley, has run his 6-40 Thomas Flyer of last year's vintage 14,000 miles and two of the original tires are still on the car. He declares that he has solved the problem of upkeep and if anybody has obtained more use with less expense out of a car he wants to know the machine.

Greater than either of the New York Automobile Shows is the Chicago Exhibition, according to word received by N. Cowan of the Hughson & Merton Co. here, from W. L. Hughson who is at present at the Chicago Show. In his telegram Hughson states that the Big Armory is one mass of trees and flowers and that the Ford and Velie cars are attracting a great deal of attention. The Velie car which is showing several new models, is reported to be the talk of Chicago, being one of the latest of the popular priced cars to be displayed there.

R. K. Roberts of the Howard Automobile Company, Pacific Coast distributors of Buicks and Oldsmobiles, has returned from an extended trip over the Northwest, visiting the agencies of the Howard Company in the states of Oregon and Washington. Roberts says: "We in sunny California have been congratulating ourselves on the unusually large automobile business that has continued unabated throughout the winter months, but if we look for a moment at the activity of the automobile market in those sections of the Northwest that are not so favored with climatic conditions, we may perhaps lose some of our egotism and begin to realize that the conditions which obtain in California, so far as pertains to the present activity in automobile sales, are general, and not peculiar to our climate. I started North with the expectation of being met on every side with complaints of a stagnation of business owing to the incessant rains or snow as the case may be, and my surprise was complete when I found that our Buick and Olds agencies, even at Spokane and Walla Walla with a foot of snow on the ground and a temperature hovering around the zero mark, were actually delivering all their cars as fast as they could get them and they could be unloaded."

The Comfort Starr Clark Company, a prominent real estate firm of Oakland, are among the latest to acquire a Hudson "20." The car was delivered this week and will be used as a runabout in their extensive business.

The Chalmers "30" is becoming very popular with physicians. Dr. R. B. Montgomery of Lemon Cove is the latest purchaser of a car of this type.

Mr. A. H. Noah, treasurer of The Diamond Rubber Co. of Akron, O., arrived in San Francisco recently. He expects to remain in California for a month and is combining business with pleasure. Not only is Mr. Noah a noted financier, but he also has considerable reputation as a golf player and will probably be seen on the golf links at Del Monte.

An important announcement to the automobile trade has been made by Ivan L. deJongh, manager of the Standard Motor Car Company, to the effect that owing to arrangements with the Ford factory, whereby the local concern secures an unusually large number of Ford machines for the coming season, together with greatly increased shipping facilities, the freight rates on Ford cars will be reduced from $125.00 to $90.00. In speaking of the reduction of freight which will necessarily mean the lowering of the price of Ford cars on the coast, deJongh said: "We have made every effort to follow out the policy of the Ford factory in giving purchasers of automobiles the very best car for the least money and I received word from Mr. Hughson who is at present at the factory, to the effect that he had closed arrangements with the Ford Company which would enable us to reduce the cost of the Ford car. This means that purchasers of cars of this type will have the same advantage in dealing with the local house that they would by purchasing direct from the factory, and in fact the freight rates to be charged by the Standard Motor Car Company are less than a purchaser could get by shipping a single car from Detroit."

J. A. Nikrent of the Los Angeles branch of the Howard Automobile Company, has been in San Francisco for a few days, renewing old acquaintances. "Nick" who is well known here, will be remembered as one of the Nikrent brothers who drove a Buick "40" to a brilliant victory in that grilling Los Angeles to Phoenix trans-desert race, and who later won the 50-mile free-for-all at Ascot Park, Los Angeles, with the same car. Asked concerning his greatest achievement, the Los Angeles to Phoenix victory, Nikrent said: "Without the slightest doubt, I could have materially reduced the time in that contest if it had been necessary to do so to win; there was never a point of the entire course where I was compelled to tax my car to its utmost, and never a time that I did not have power and speed in reserve, but I figured that I had the race won and that it was the part of wisdom to be content to hold my sure lead of four hours and take no chances whatever. Eleven hours and twenty-three minutes is a large enough slice to clip off any record at one time." Nikrent is enthusiastic over the one mile circular board track that is in course of construction at Plava-Del-Rey, near Los Angeles, and confidently expects to take several world's records with a Buick "40" during the coming season.

"The Kingdom of Slender Swords"

The new novel by Hallie Ermine Rives (Mrs. Post Wheeler) has a Japanese setting. It is distinguished with a foreword by a Japanese gentleman in which he commends the author's depiction of the character of his countrymen and women, so readers may be assured that "The Kingdom of Slender Swords" will not prove to be a slight variation on that hackneyed theme, the temporary matrimonial arrangement between a visiting Occidental male and a trusting Oriental maid, with the inevitable purple-eyed baby to add poignancy when the "marriage" terminates by expiration of the contract. This is a very modern and up-to-date American romance which is worked out in Tokyo and Miss Barbara Fairfax, who is visiting at the American Embassy and under the protecting wing of her uncle, a missionary bishop who has spent nearly all his life in the Orient, suffers neither from the persistence of a Japanese wooer nor from the rivalry of a native daughter. She meets her fate in the person of young Daunt, an attache of the embassy, and succumbs immediately, her course of true love being, of course, interrupted by the advent of another suitor and some circumstances which place Daunt in an unfavorable light in her eyes. Miss Fairfax is technically the heroine, but she is hardly necessary to the unfolding of the plot save as an excuse for Daunt to "wake up." She is supposed to be an orphan, her father and mother having met and married in Japan, where the father died very soon after and his young widow returned to her own people in Virginia. Now, the daughter being grown, has determined to visit the land which is to her romance incarnate. One of her plans has been the erection of a memorial chapel dedicated to her father, a plan successfully carried out, somewhat to the private embarrassment of her good uncle who knows more family history than he has seen fit to reveal and suspects even more than he knows, for it seems that John Fairfax had not died in the flesh. He had discovered the secret of a certain golden lacquer, and was carrying on an extensive business as a maker of sacred images when his business agent, out of spite engendered by a disagreement, revealed the truth to the young wife, who, with a spirit we would more naturally associate with a puritanical New Englander, left her wicked spouse at once, and he never even knew that there had been a child. Perhaps, though, a thrifty New Englander would have encouraged the enterprise and salved conscience by large donations to the Board of Foreign Missions. At any rate, John Fairfax lost himself and his name, adopted Japanese costume and manners and became a semi-recluse living in an old temple across the street from the chapel erected to his memory, met and conversed with his unknown daughter as a stranger, drawn by subtle ties of blood. The character is evidently suggested by that of Lafcadio Hearn, even to the myopic sight, the shrinking sensitiveness to observation and the life of hardship and privation in his earlier years, as well as to the only picture of him being in profile. In these days when the laboratory dreams of one decade become the commonplaces of the next, the idea of the expert, Dr. Bersonin, of discovering that force of nature which is the opposite of cohesion, so that whoever is in possession of the secret may easily and effectively annihilate his enemy or his possessions, is not so far fetched as it may seem, and the scheme which he had in mind, seconded by the dissolute Paul Ware, of destroying two of the Dreadnaughts of the visiting fleet, and reaping a fortune through the consequent disturbances of the world's stock markets would be, in that case, feasible. It is in connection with Dr. Bersonin's cold-blooded plan that the Japanese side of the story is developed. He has in his employ a servant, apparently the usual dull-witted menial, but really an attache of the civil service department, alert, intelligent and devoted. Ishida, in social rank and descent, far above the servant class, is yet willing and ready to accept menial service in order to keep watch on a suspicious character. Haru, the Japanese girl, daughter of a samurai, and his only child, regrets like her father, that there is no son to give loyal service, but she makes a sacrifice greater than life itself when she sees that by so doing she can help her lover, Ichida to serve the empire, though she knows all of the resignation that must follow. Even the two little six-year-old playmates show themselves heroically ready though they do not understand what they are undertaking. The splendid appearance of the Japanese sailors in Portola week gives San Franciscans at least a credence in the feat undertaken by the cadets when, at the eleventh hour Haru, enlightened by the inebriate confidences of Philip Ware, makes her way in spite of opposition, to the residence of the Minister of Marine to disclose the Bersonin-Ware plot which is to work itself out automatically at sunrise. A storm has rendered the direct roads to Nagasaki impassible for vehicles and railroad traffic has been suspended, yet the infernal machine must be destroyed. Telegraph and telephone communication as well as wireless are all impossible likewise, and the feat to be accomplished is to beat time itself. One of Daunt's fads has been experimenting with aviation, and he, too, speeds to the rescue. The cadets make practically as good time as he, and though it is the Glider, acting as a battering ram, that actually averts the threatened calamity, it is by only the height to be scaled that he arrives first on the scene. Apart from the plot, "The Kingdom of Slender Swords" is worth reading for the bits of description of the streets of Tokyo, the old temple gardens, the various festivals and above all, the Imperial review of the national army. Old and new jostle elbows, and we have side by side the dignified, kimono-clad elders and the somewhat flippant and assertive modern youths, and at times a little of both mingling in the same individual. Readers whose taste takes them somewhat beyond the ordinary field will have no difficulty in recognizing at least the shadowy outline of some real personage behind many of the book characters. Illustrations in color are by A. B. Wentzell, who would have done well to have read with greater attention the descriptions of Haru's costumes. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 26,821.

HARDA ZOIE, Plaintiff, vs.
NICHOLAS ZOIE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Nicholas Zoie, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and abandonment of the plaintiff without any sufficient cause or reason and on the further ground of defendant's wilful failure and neglect to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life while having the ability so to do; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1909.

(Seal) ....., Clerk.
By.....Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 8799, Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN MENGEL, Deceased.

CHARLES C. ELSASSER and FERDINAND A. LORENZ, the Executors of the Last Will and Testament of JOHN MENGEL, deceased, having filed their petition herein, duly verified, praying for an Order of Sale of the whole of the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the Judge of Department No. 10 of said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on Thursday, the 17th day of March, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day at the courtroom of said Superior Court, at the Grant Building, corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Executors to sell at private or public sale the whole of the real estate of the said deceased. And that a copy of this Order be published at least once a week for four (4) successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated, February 4th, 1910. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge

GEORGE H. BAHRS, Attorney for Petitioners. 2-12-5

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 4965, Dept. No. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, Deceased.

Mary A. Barry, the administratrix of the estate of ROBERT M, BARRY, deceased, having filed herein her petition, duly verified by affidavit, praying for an order of this Court authorizing, empowering and directing her, as such administratrix, to mortgage the real property of said deceased therein and hereinafter described, for the purpose set forth in said petition; and it appearing that it will be of advantage to said estate that said mortgage be made;

It is here ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the estate of ROBERT M. BARRY, deceased, do appear before this Court on the 28th day of February, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause, if any they have, why the real property of said estate, hereinafter described, should not be mortgaged for the sum of four thousand and five hundred ($4,500) dollars, as prayed for in the petition of Mary A. Barry, the said administratrix, this day filed, or for such lesser amount as to the Court may seem meet. Reference is made to said petition for further particulars. Said real property, the property to be mortgaged, is situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and is more particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Parcel "A"—Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Eighteenth street with the easterly line of Noe street, running thence easterly along the southerly line of Eighteenth street thirty (30) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.); thence at right angles westerly thirty (30) feet to the easterly line of Noe street, and thence at right angles northerly along the last mentioned line one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) to the southeasterly corner of Eighteenth and Noe streets and the place of beginning; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

Parcel "B"—Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Eighteenth street, thirty feet distant thereon easterly from the easterly line of Noe street, thence along said southerly line of Eighteenth street easterly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles southerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft); thence at right angles westerly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles northerly one hundred and one feet and six inches (101 6-12 ft.) and to the point of commencement; being a portion of Mission block number one hundred and six (106), together with the improvements thereon.

ANTONIO DEVOTO, Plaintiff,
vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANTONIO DEVOTO, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

PIECE NO. 1

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Westerly line of Powell Street with the Southerly line of Green Street and running thence Westerly along the said Southerly line of Green Street sixty-eight (68) feet; thence at right angles Southerly and parallel with Powell Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; and thence at right angles Easterly sixty-eight (68) feet to the Westerly line of Powell Street; and thence at right angles Northerly and along the said Westerly line of Powell Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine inches (9) to the point of beginning. Being a part of Fifty (50) Vara Block No. 156.

Commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the Northerly line of Francisco Street with the Easterly line of Stockton Street, and running thence Northerly and along said Easterly line of Stockton Street sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches; thence at right angles Easterly forty-one (41) feet and eight (8) inches; thence at right angles Southerly sixty-eight (68) feet and nine (9) inches to the Northerly line of Francisco Street; and thence at right angles Westerly forty-one (41) feet and eight (8) inches to the Easterly line of Stockton Street and point of commencement. Being a portion of Fifty (50) Vara Lot No. 1515.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 9th day of December, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED TO THE EXECUTOR FOR THE SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5260, Dept. No. 10.

In the matter of the Estate of TERESA MURPHY, Deceased.

Valentine J. Smyth, as the Executor of the Last Will and Testament of TERESA MURPHY, deceased, having this day presented to this Court a verified petition praying for an Order authorizing and directing him to sell, as a whole or in parcels, and at either public or private sale, the real property and the whole thereof belonging to the Estate of said decedent, which is in said petition particularly described, and it appearing to this Court, from such petition, that it is necessary to sell the real estate and the whole thereof belonging to said estate for the purpose of paying the debts against said estate and the expenses and charges of administration, and it also appearing from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate, and those interested therein, to sell the said real estate and the whole thereof, for the purposes and reasons set forth in said petition; and this Court having thereupon and now and here directed that said petition be filed herein, and the same now having been filed accordingly, and being now on file herein:

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court at the Courtroom of Department Number 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, at the Southeast Corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Tuesday, the 15th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said executor for the sale of the real estate, and for the sale of the whole thereof, and for the sale of the same at either public or private sale, as said Executor shall judge to be most beneficial for the said Estate.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published once a week for four (4) successive weeks prior to the said 15th day of March, 1910, in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 7th day of February, 1910.

Charms and Spells

The first three verses of the Gospel of St. John worn around the neck will ward off sickness.

A silver ring made of money that has been begged will preserve the wearer from ills.

Walk down stairs backward on the morning after an engagement to insure a smooth course to love.

A horseshoe nail driven in the upper lintel of a door will cure toochache. A double nut carried in the pocket is another cure and putting both stockings on the same foot is an infallible remedy.

Wear a red bean on a white string on an article of clothing ironed Sunday to cure nose bleed.

In the Highlands of Scotland a cat plunged into the water a sick person has been bathed in will run away taking the disease with it.

Amongst the lower classes in Mexico, where divorce is unrecognized, if a man proves to be a poor husband the only way to get rid of him is to make him die. The women do not resort to knives, pistols or poisons but rely upon other potent means. One of the favorite ways is to secure a ribbon and have it blessed by a priest on behalf of the saint whose name the husband bears. The man is measured with the ribbon while he is asleep. The ribbon is then cut and on the next morning a mass is ordered in honor of the man's namesake. While the priest is giving the final blessing the ribbon is burned and within a month the victim of the spell will die of some obscure maladv.

Dwellers in Tombs

It seems incredible that men should live in the tombs of their wives, yet there are several cases on record of men who have done this. Jonathan Reed, for instance, sat daily in a vault in Evergreen Cemetery, New York, by the side of the coffin containing the remains of his wife.

Mr. Reed, who was an eccentric gentleman of considerable wealth, erected a tomb at a cost of $3500, and, after placing the body of his wife in it, furnished it with a dressing-table and mirror, chairs, a table, china vases, boxes, and all the property belonging to his wife, including old gloves, balls of yarn, pieces of unfinished knitting, photographs, and boxes of letters.

The coffin stood on a shelf, and over this Mr. Reed threw a piece of cheap Japanese matting, gaudily painted with flowers. Regularly every morning the bereaved husband visited the tomb, and remained there until the cemetery closed at seven o'clock in the evening. He usually sat on a chair by the head of the coffin, but occasionally he would stand at the door of the vault with mementoes of his wife in his hand. The vault is an imposing structure of granite, and over the door is engraved "Jonathan and Mary E. Reed."

When Tolstoy Was Tipped

One day Count Tolstoy was standing on the platform of the railway station of Tula when an express train came whizzing up and stopped. A young man jumped out of a first-class compartment and hurried to the refreshment-room. A young lady followed him to the platform, calling: "George! George!" but George did not hear.

"Little grandfather," she said, turning to Tolstoy, who stood close by, "do me a favor! Run after that man and tell him that I want him. I will give you a tip."

Count Tolstoy did as he was bid and and received five copecks for his trouble. Meanwhile the platform had gradually filled with people and the young lady heard the passengers saying to each other:

"Look, look! There is Tolstoy!"

"Where is Tolstoy?" she hastened to inquire.

The great Russian writer was pointed out to her and with lightning speed she rushed towards him and begged to be forgiven.

"For God's sake, forgive me, count! I am so ashamed. Do forgive me, I beg of you," and she shamefacedly asked for the return of the five copecks.

"Oh, no," Tolstoy replied with a laugh, "the five copecks were honestly earned."

The School of the Future

She conducted her school on the strictest and most approved hygienic principles, and before she decided to take little Willie as a scholar she asked him the usual questions.

"Have you had your vermiform appendix removed?" she inquired.

"Yes, ma'am," said Willie.

"Have you your own sanitary slate-sponge, a disinfected drinking-cup, a certificate for inoculation for the croup, chicken-pox, and measles?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Do you possess a patent antiseptic dinner-box, and do you wear a collapsible life-belt, a camphor-bag round your throat, and insulated rubber-heels for crossing the electric tram-lines? And have you taken out a life insurance policy against all the encroachments of old age?"

"I can truthfully say 'Yes' to all these question, ma'am."

"Then hang your cap up on the insulated peg, and proceed to learn on sanitary lines."

SAN FRANCISCO TOWN TALK

A New "Breakfast Food" Is Born Every Day

Imitation is the most sincere flattery.

H-O oatmeal has been imitated but never equaled. If you are a user of H-O oatmeal, just try the other "Rolled Oats" and see how quickly you will miss the delicate flavor, the tender kernels, the satisfying result of a dish of H-O oatmeal. If you are not a user of H-O oatmeal, better try it at once, and after convincing yourself of its superior quality, you will wonder how you ever used any other.

It is dangerous to experiment; stick to the tried and true H-O oatmeal—that is steam-cooked, easily digested and nourishing. Contains more real nutriment than meat or eggs, and more muscle-building material than Corn Meal, Rice, Wheat Flour Bread or Soda Crackers.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.
H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.
H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes boiling and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usually "Rolled Oats."

Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

Johnson for Governor

We are looking forward calmly, nay, absolutely imperturbed, to the political campaign which is soon to set us all by the ears and make resupinate this glorious commonwealth. Two weeks ago we had visions of ructions and revolutions. They have vanished. The Lincoln-Roosevelt League has done the safe and sane thing in selecting the Hon. Hiram Johnson as its gubernatorial candidate. It might have nominated the Hon. Francis J. Heney, and then nobody would have known where we stood or where we were likely to stand. Mr. Johnson is a politician with perfect control of his emotions and no ideals to which he is uncompromisingly attached. In other words Mr. Johnson is a practical man whose ideals are subject to amendment in the light of common sense and in deference to the exigencies of a critical situation. Mr. Johnson is a reformer, not a long-haired reformer, but a reformer in whom there is a lively sense of the current tendency of the times. As a candidate he has many charms. Depend on him to contribute to the gaiety of the campaign. Singling out the iniquitous S. P. for especial invective, he will feed the popular appetite for redhot stuff. With his sheet-iron thunder and his cultivated ecstasies he will rumple things a bit for campaign purposes, and the multitude will listen feverishly with all their yawning ears, but take our word for it there is nothing to be alarmed about. Mr. Johnson is temperamentally so safe and sane that despite the promises he will surely make to paralyze the railroad and burst the ignominious bonds that bind we shall not be amazed to find him receiving the support of the machine on the strength of its confidence in his inherent reluctance to dislocate society. The machine moves in a mysterious way its wonders to perform.

Raciness in Boston

News comes from Boston that gives us pause and impels us to grave reflection. It is news of "The Girl from Rector's," the audacious farce that suffused our young dramatic critics with blushes and sent them to the dictionary in search of epithets to enable them to characterize the grossness of it in terms eloquent of their outraged sense of decency. From Boston, the great center of esthetic culture and the gushing fountain of the nation's virtue, comes the news that the farce which shocked San Francisco has been playing there to crowded houses for seven weeks with no prospect of satiety on the part of the people. The news is almost beyond belief, justifying as it seems the suspicion that the home of Puritanism is becoming degenerate, and that the principles of a wax-doll morality are no longer upheld by the community that once prided itself on its chastity and its intolerance of the nude in art and the unexpurgated classics. It has always been supposed that though Boston could appreciate Socratic badinage it could never be persuaded that Aristophanic humor was palatable. But now we find the supersensitive community absolutely wallowing in what San Francisco regarded as dramatic pornography. It was "The Girl from Rector's" that sent the good dames of the California Club to the Supervisors in hot haste with a petition for an ordinance empowering the police to censorize the drama. And in deference to the demand for the immediate protection of public morals the farce was pruned of some of the devices through which it appealed to salacious caprice, after which it lacked even the falsetto of specious wit. But in Boston it is given in all its defiant viciousness, and none of the dramatic critics have felt it to be their duty either to render a fitting service to the cause of virtue or to stimulate an unrighteous pruriency. So we must conclude that notwithstanding our French restaurants and our waywardness in matters that excite the scorn of New England reformers, we are not half so gay as we have been pleased to believe. After all perhaps there is no danger of San Francisco becoming the Paris of America.

A New National Trait Discovered

According to one of the half-baked philosophers of Chicago University we are becoming a nation of cynics and sceptics. He says the incredulity that was once peculiar to the man from Missouri has become a national trait. Were this really the case we should not feel there was occasion for lamentation, but the Chicago professor's generalities are not convincing. How is this characteristic incredulity of the American people manifested? The professor has neglected to give us specific instances of a disposition to scrutinize and analyze before acceptance. So far as the public records show nothing has occurred to discourage men that live by their wits. Honest men may complain of dull times, but with swindlers business is always brisk; talent for sophistication does not go unrewarded. In the field of politics especially the achievements of this talent are notable and noteworthy. The man that makes broad his phylacteries is everywhere accorded the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens. To be successful in politics a man has only to study the humors of the multitude, flatter its prejudices, and take advantage of its foibles. All that we ask of candidates for our political support is that they assume the pose of moral superiority and enthusiasm for righteousness and claim no other motive than that of redressing our wrongs. This species of patriotism when it is manifested with unctuous pharisaism, and signalized with beating of tom-toms and shrieks calliopean, accompanied by the eructation of invectives and the other familiar devices that fascinate the public ear inspires faith and fealty more enduring than brass. We persuade ourselves that we despise nothing so much as cant and hypocrisy, and that we admire nothing so much as candor and humility, but all the while we are celebrating men for nothing more than their noisy pretensions to superior virtue. Were we a little less gullible, a little less inclined to accept as final the professions of men who appeal to our favor rather through our vindictiveness than our generosity life would be much more agreeable and civic affairs would attain a more elevated plane.

Newspaper Advice

As nearly two-thirds of the editors of Republican newspapers west of the Alleghenies have said that Mr. Taft is not their choice for President, the Boughten Bulletin considers it the part of wisdom for him to repudiate those statesmen with whom he is in sympathy and establish new and more advantageous connections. How strongly typical of American journalism is this advice; how characteristic of the average American newspaper which lives up to the motto, Give the people not the kind of journal that edifies and instructs but the kind that appeals to ignorance, the kind that is most profitable. American journalism has no more leading characteristic than the desire to stand well with the multitude, to gain circulation not by scrupulous adherence to what is right but by propagating whatever error or sentiment happens to be most popular. Be successful is the maxim of American journalism, and consequently with few exceptions American newspapers are vulgar, dishonest and almost everything that is disreputable. Quite in harmony with the spirit and morals of American journalism, therefore, is the advice given by our local pervert to President Taft, the advice that he rule the country not with an eye to its best interests but with a view to making political capital for his own benefit. Assuredly this advice is informed with the principle of orthodox newspaper policy. If President Taft has not the approval of the majority of editors it is safe to assume that he is appreciated by the majority of honest and intelligent men, which is of course a small minority of the people. The judgment of the minority, however, invariably becomes the judgment of the majority. It is the privilege of the few only to do sound thinking. Always what is known as the second sober thought of the masses was formerly the exclusive possession of the minority.

Characteristics of American Journalism

What there is in the record of American journalism to justify either the arrogance of editors or the presumption that whatever opinion they mould should take precedence of the law of the land, is something beyond the ordinary powers of discernment. Our newspapers have been the scorn of honest and scholarly men for nearly one hundred years, and certainly they are not improving in tone or substance. Adoring no other God than the power of the multitude they have been drifting from bad to worse. With the growth of competition in their temple of worship more pronounced have those coarse characteristics become upon which De Tocqueville dwells in his work on "Democracy in America." Long after De Tocqueville came Matthew Arnold who says of our newspapers, "Taking the total impression and effect made by them I should say that if one were searching for the best means to efface and kill in a whole nation the discipline of respect, the feeling for what is elevated, one could not do better than take the American newspapers." It is the misfortune of this country that it must tolerate its newspapers, but it has been our good fortune that we have had men in public office who heeded the voice of conscience rather than the voice of the press. Mr. Taft is not the first President who incurred the disfavor of the press by the conscientious performance of his duties. For doing what he conceived to be right President Lincoln was held up to public execration and denounced with great fury by the patriots of journalism, but he pursued the even tenor of his way without faltering and without attempting to establish new connections for his own benefit. As timely allusion was made to Lincoln's experience by Speaker Cannon in his Lincoln Day address his words are most pertinent to this discussion. He said:

Lincoln's fidelity to the responsibility put upon him by the American people was no better illustrated than when reverses first came to our armies. In the most trying hour, when treason threatened anarchy, Lincoln stood practically alone as the leader of the people. * * * There is no more curious reading to be found now, in the light of subsequent history, than the files of the metropolitan press and magazines of that day, especially immediately after the first battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861. Go to any library where you can find these old files and read the editorials and news despatches from the front and from Washington if you want to find evidences of pessimism and panic among the moulders of public opinion. To me there is no more inspiring incident in our whole history, or one more pathetic, than that of the tall, gaunt form of Lincoln, with that sad but serene face, standing out against the darkening sky to assure the men in the field and their supporters at home that there was still manhood and real leadership in the place of highest responsibility. Had the people depended on the metropolitan press for guidance then they would have turned against Lincoln and anarchy would have followed. But Lincoln had not won the confidence of the people in a single brilliant campaign or by modern methods of publicity. * * * It is a humiliating historic fact that the three Presidents who have been struck down in office were murdered by foolish egotists hungering for that notoriety which they found in a sensational press. They were all of that type of shallow egotists who crave notoriety and in whose diseased minds is created a desire to appeal to the same sentiment that tolerates and even applauds reckless denunciation of those upon whom is laid the burden of responsibility.

The treatment President Taft is receiving at the hands of a mob-coddling press is more to be reprobated than that which President Lincoln suffered. For the press in Lincoln's day was not inspired by the mean, dishonest motives that actuate the newspapers of today.

A Victory for the People

Though the Examiner is usually felicitous in its appeals to class prejudice it can hardly be considered so in its discussion of the Danbury Hatters case. The Examiner cites this case as proof that "wealth has an undue advantage in our long-drawn and complicated court procedure. Nobody disputes that wealth has an advantage over poverty in litigation or in anything else. Nor is it to be disputed that this advantage will continue until man in his wisdom shall succeed in rendering negligible one of the mysterious designs of an erratic Providence. But the Danbury Hatters case does not furnish us with an illustration of the inherent advantage of wealth in courts of justice. The most striking illustration it does afford is that of the power of organized labor. It was this power that resisted for seven years the efforts of Loewe, the plaintiff in the Danbury Hatters case to obtain justice. During that period numerous combinations of capital have been broken. Wealth concentrated in salt trusts, in shingle trusts, in coal trusts and in oil trusts, wealth merged in railroad combines, has been brought to its knees in periods ranging from one to three years while the case against the gigantic labor trust was slowly dragging along from court to court. The vital issue involved in this case was the freedom of the individual; and the decision of the court affirming the inviolability of the right of every man to employ his capital in productive industry without regard to the imperial will of Mr. Samuel Gompers, is perhaps the most important that has been rendered in this generation. It is a decision no less important to labor than to capital, for it vindicates the right of every wage earner to sell the product of his hands without subjecting himself to the rule of a despotic oligarchy. The history of this case is instructive and interesting. The plaintiff was a hatter by trade. He worked himself up from the journeyman's bench to the ownership of a small manufactory. A man of high principle, free from sordid impulses he was admirably scrupulous in his treatment of his workmen. His relations with them were ideal, and there was no dissatisfaction among them. But as he insisted upon giving men employment without respect to any question as to whether they belonged to labor unions, he incurred the disfavor of the United States Hatters' organization by which he was ordered to discharge all non-union workmen. They had enforced a similar order in almost every big shop in the East, and they had almost ruined a Philadelphia manufacturer who was brought to submission after sinking a fortune in his fight for independence. But Loewe was not to be intimidated. He gave the union battle, and after seven years of litigation he obtained judgment for nearly a quarter of a million dollars. This is certainly a most gratifying triumph; gratifying not to Loewe only but to every American citizen who has a just appreciation of the fundamentals of his government. A man risen from the ranks of the people has won a great victory for the people—for all manufacturers and for the great army of unorganized American wage earners.

According to Andrew Carnegie, multi-millionaires ought to be able to justify their existence. This they may do by giving away libraries suitably labeled.

The burning moral question to be solved in the State campaign of 1910 is one of prodigious personal interest to the patriots that are holding the jobs and to the patriots that hope to get hold of the jobs.

"It seems to be my time to make the sacrifice and I am going to make it"—Hiram Johnson. "I go as the French noblemen went to the guillotine, with a song on my lips"—Mrs. Mary W. Kincaid. "It fills me with grief to see the poor going to jail"—Judge Dunne. And yet the world is full of pessimism and cynicism.

A Boston historian has discovered that Patrick Henry was a demagogue, that John Adams was a defaulter, that John Hancock was an embezzler and that Benjamin Franklin was a thief. This historian can hardly expect to interest us in these matters at a time when we are being entertained and edified by revelations touching contemporary patriots and reformers.

The low clouds hang, their ragged upper edge
Touching the sun, that sends a golden wedge

And stirs the bushes on the beetling ledge;
Then moaning storm-sobs every movement stills,
The clouds roll o'er the sun: the sturdy trees
Bend to the fury of the surging blast;
A fierce red flash shines on the sombre plain;
Then down the slopes, like high, foam-crested seas
That on some rocky coast beat hard and fast,
Comes the wild tumult of the rushing rain.

Stand and Deliver

Persons Who Object to Having Their Trade Secrets and Private Business Affairs Made Public Dismayed by Uncle Sam's Hold-Up Order, Known as the Corporation Tax Law

By Robert McTavish

There is agitation in commercial circles all over the land, not because of the keenness of competition, or the high price of living or the shortage of coin, or any of the current causes of dissatisfaction, but because Uncle Sam has called for a show-down on March 1. Under instructions from Washington the Collectors of Internal Revenue are notifying corporations, joint stock companies, associations and insurance companies of all sizes that the returns required by the Corporation Tax law must be filed on Tuesday of next week, and that the penalties provided by the act will be rigidly enforced in case of intentional omission. Hence the prevalent agitation.

Some corporations have asked for an extension of time on the ground of physical inability to complete the necessary work of computation before the date specified. Others have protested against the requirement which will make a public record of the returns and thus put the secrets of their business in the hands of their business rivals. It has been said that the returns will not be made public, but the law does not give the authorities discretion in this matter. It provides that the returns "shall constitute public records" and that they "shall be open to inspection." Naturally there is consternation in some quarters and more or less emotion manifest wherever business is done by corporations. From all parts of the country come demands that the law be repealed. Numerous suits have been begun in the Federal courts to test the constitutionality of the law, and the earliest that any of them has been set for trial is March 14, less than a fortnight after the last day for filing returns. Meanwhile it is hoped that Congress will pass an amendment extending the time for filing returns for at least sixty days, so that an opportunity may be had for a decision by the court before any damage is done.

The leading test case involving the question of the constitutionality of the corporation tax is that of Stella P. Flint as general guardian of the property of Samuel N. Stone Jr., a minor, against the Stone Tracy Company. The plaintiff in this case, appealing for the protection of her ward, points out that the new law if enforced will give an unfair advantage to a competitor of the firm in which the child is interested. There are two general merchandise stores in the town of Windsor in Vermont. The people of the country for miles around make their purchases from one or the other of the two establishments. Formerly there was but one store conducted by Tuxbury & Stone, dating from 1866. About fifteen years ago, in the ordinary development of the rural trade of which Windsor is the market place, Tuxburg & Stone dissolved, or rather resolved itself into the two firms of Stone, Tracy & Co. and Dwight Tuxbury & Sons. The former continued business at the original stand, on the main street of Windsor, at the corner of the lane leading to the railroad station. The latter built and occupied a new store next door. In this juxtaposition the two establishments have carried on an active competition in the same line of general retail mercantile business and have divided pretty nearly equally the trade of Windsor and an area of about twenty square miles of country tributary to the town. From cranberries and eggs to wheelbarrows and agricultural implements, each watches the business of the other with acute interest and intelligence, and each strives constantly for every legitimate advantage over its neighbor and rival. The difference between the two concerns has been merely one of formal organization, a factor hitherto unimportant. Dwight Tuxbury & Sons are an old fashioned partnership. Stone, Tracy & Co. incorporated ten years ago under the laws of Vermont as the Stone Tracy Company, with a capital of $20,000. Thus, if the corporation income tax is upheld by the Supreme Court, the Stone Tracy Company will pay a tax on its profits, while the similar concern next door will pay no tax to the Federal Government. Besides the secrets of the business of the Stone Tracy Company will become matters of public record, open to inspection by the alert competitor next door, unless the language of the sixth section of the act means nothing. There could be no better illustration of the glaring, destructive inequity of the proposed tax.

All these facts are set forth in the complaint, and the plaintiff informs the court that the consequences of this Federal discrimination will be fatal to the corporation upon which the law forces the burden of a discriminative tax and the disadvantage of publicity as to its private business. She says the company will have to dispose of its assets, wind up its affairs and go into voluntary dissolution. She asks that the law be pronounced unconstitutional on the ground that under its provisions private property will be taken for public use without just compensation; on the ground also that it "violates the right of the corporation to be secure in its papers, effects, books, records, private affairs and trade secrets against unreasonable searches and seizures; on the ground also that it infringes on State rights."

The Siege of Baler

A Review of a Remarkably Interesting Book Entitled "Under the Red and Gold" in Which a Spanish Soldier Tells How His Small Detachment Resisted a Filipino Force During Eleven Months of Constant Fighting and Heroic Endurance

How many Americans have ever heard of the siege of Baler? Very few, in all likelihood. Yet the siege of Baler is the latest glorious achievement added to the Golden Legend of Spain and the Spanish heart glows with pride when it is mentioned. For Americans it should have a special interest because it happened on the Island of Luzon in the Philippines and during its progress the islands were ceded by Spain to the United States. The history of the siege of Baler, a summary of which will be given in these columns, was written by Captain Don Saturnino Martin Cerezo who commanded the detachment of besieged Spaniards and has been translated and edited by Major F. L. Dodds of the United States Army. The book was published by the Franklin Hudson Publishing Company of Kansas City with the title of "Under the Red and Gold." The narrative is compact of heroic deeds and almost superhuman endurance that suggest the mighty adventures recorded by Froissart, Comines and other chroniclers of the days of chivalry. The attention of the editor of Town Talk was first called to this volume by Major-General Funston who declared that "Under the Red and Gold" was one of the most interesting and inspiring works dealing with military exploits ever written. General Funston also declared that the siege of Baler was without parallel in military annals and that it would seem more like fiction than fact had not the details of the siege been carefully verified by various military authorities. Perusal of the book shows that General Funston did not exaggerate its interest or overemphasize the heroism of the siege. "Under the Red and Gold" should be better known, for it tells a story of self-sacrifice, devotion to country and jealous preservation of personal as well as national honor which is of universal appreciation. Too much credit cannot be given to Major Dodds for the pains which he took to procure the Spanish narrative and translate it into English. He has done his work excellently and the book is not only of absorbing interest but also attractively bound and illustrated. To repeat, it should be more widely known. It is the purpose of this extended review to introduce the book to readers who, it is quite certain, will not be satisfied until they have perused the entire narrative of this remarkable siege.

Picture a band of forsaken heroes fighting a desperate fight and winning immortal laurels in a cause which had ceased to exist, in defense of property which their own country had ceased to affect and against the ancient enemy which Spain had transferred to the newer foe with the land itself and you have the anomalous side of this amazing siege of Baler. Imagine a company of Spanish soldiers starving, suffering and dying from wounds and disease, withstanding for eleven long months the continuous efforts of a Filipino force to dislodge them from a little stone church and you will begin to apprehend the stupendous fortitude that made the siege of Baler so glorious an incident of recent Spanish history.

Baler is a little town on the east coast of Luzon distant one hundred and twenty miles from Manila. It is a desolate spot with mountain walls enclosing it on the landward side, the Pacific spread before it and an exposed and dangerous coast stretching away to north and south. Communication with Manila, over the mountains or by sea, is difficult and uncertain. The town stands on a point of land jutting from the shore of the Bay of Baler and is nearly encircled by a tidal stream which at times converts it into an island. It consisted, in Spanish days, of the church which was besieged, a priest's resident, a house for the governor, barracks for troops and a dingy tribunal of justice. These buildings were grouped about the plaza; the rest of Baler consisted of frail native houses surrounded by palm and bamboo.

For a year before the opening of the siege of Baler the Filipinos had been in insurrection against the Spanish Government. Toward the end of August, 1897, rumors reached Manila that the insurgents were taking advantage of Baler's isolated position to smuggle in arms and ammunition. At that time the Spanish garrison consisted of a corporal and four men; to these fifty men were added and the insufficiency of this force brought the insurgents out in numbers to capture the town. This lesser siege lasted for three months and in January, 1898, a relieving force brought it to an end. Thinking that only a few troops were needed to hold Baler, the Spanish authorities despatched fifty men commanded by Lieutenants Don Alonso Zayas and Don Saturnino Martin Cerezo and this force reached Baler on February 12, 1898. With the fifty men were one surgeon and a corporal and an attendant of the Hospital Corps. This small force took up its position in the church, as the strongest building in the town, with scant rations but a good supply of ammunition. The best part of the supplies consisted of 70 cavanes (a cavan contains 75 liters) of palay or unhulled rice and twenty-odd earthenware jars of water. It was on the first of July that the insurgent force became so threatening that the detachment was forced to shut itself up in the church. From the first of July, 1898, to the second of June, 1899, the detachment stood siege without receiving so much as a cartridge or a biscuit from the outside world. For three hundred and thirty-seven days that handful of Spaniards resisted a large force of insurgents; when the siege was ended there were only thirty-three of the detachment left. When they emerged from the church at last the Stars and Stripes had supplanted the Spanish flag in the Philippines.

At daybreak the following morning (July 1) we found a letter which the enemy had left near the church. In it they told us that we ought to lay down our arms in order to avoid the useless shedding of blood, seeing that almost all the Spanish troops had done so, and that further resistance was rash. They added that their force present consisted of three companies overwhelmingly numerous and prepared to capture us. This letter produced no great impression.

As to the capitulation of almost all the Spanish forces, we thought the story nothing more than a stupid artifice on the part of the enemy. But as the manifestations of force were incontestable, and as the facts that we had been able to gather showed that the situation was critical and the peril very real, we understood that it was going to be a long story. We therefore exerted ourselves to prepare for it with every means that we could reach. Suspicion and hesitation had given way to certainty and decision, and something great had awakened in our souls.

On my part, I began again to insist upon the well; because, if we should be closely besieged and should be unable to leave the church, as happened afterwards, there would be nothing left for us but surrender at discretion. Las Morenas finally gave me authority, and, with five soldiers, we put our hands to the work.

The result showed very soon that I had not suggested an impossibility. At a depth of four meters we found water in abundance, enough for all the necessities of

A Case Without Precedent

By Federico De Roberto (From the Italian)

As the carriages drew up before the entrance of the house in course of construction, and disgorged the seconds, with their bundle of swords wrapped up in an old piece of faded green cloth that once had covered a gaming table, the company gathered in the Terminal Cafe directly opposite, across the square, became excited.

"There they are! There they are, over there!"

"Have they all come?" asked Monterani.

"All but the marquis. See there, isn't that Dr. Salandri?"

"How about the other doctor?"

"I haven't seen him come. And it is three o'clock already."

All eyes were riveted in that direction. Even the waiter, with his napkin over his arm, stood craning his neck in the doorway.

"What is the duel about?" inquired Corsi, the lawyer. "Can anyone tell me that?"

"No mystery about that. Luzzi made himself too agreeable to the marquise."

"And her husband could hit on nothing more original than to send him a challenge?"

"By the way," interrupted Monterani, turning to Baldassare Gargano, who had not yet opened his lips, "were you not asked by the marquis to serve as second?"

"Yes, but I could not accept."

"If the question is not indiscreet, what was your reason?"

"I made a vow, the last time that I was involved in an affair of honor, never again to serve as second for anyone."

"Why so? What had happened to you?"

"It was a scene that I shall not forget, to the last day of my life."

"Was one of the principals killed?"

"On the contrary, the duel never took place."

"Well, then, why—?"

"Tell about it! Go ahead, tell about it!" they all insisted with one voice.

"First of all," began Baldassare Gargano, "you must know the reason for the challenge. It was in Rome, one night, at the Sport Club, where I had dropped in quite casually for want of something better to do. I had glanced through the daily papers, chatted for awhile with a few acquaintances, and passed on into the billiard room. I was on the point of sitting down, being curious to see how a match between two of the club's strongest players was coming out, when I noticed, leaning against one side of the door way and almost hidden by the portiere, Count Von Bauern—the son, you know, of the Saxon minister.

"Ordinarily a meeting with him would not have stirred me one way or another; but the count had lately suffered a great bereavement, the death of his young wife, whom he had fairly worshiped during life, and still mourned inconsolably. The sad event, which came as a shock to all those who had known the countess, was not so very recent; it dated back perhaps five or six months. Nevertheless, this was the first time that the heartbroken husband had reappeared in public. This fact in itself gives you some idea of the intensity of his grief, the ravages of which I discovered, as soon as I saw the count, in his bowed form, his haggard features, his pallor, accentuated by the black of his clothing, his vague glance that seemed to swim in a mist of tears. The mourning of his outer garments was a true reflection of the mourning of his soul—of how many widowers do you suppose one may say as much? The fact is that the Countess Von Bauern, this gentle lady so early snatched away, united in herself all the qualities likely to render a man happy, if happiness is to be found at all in the present world. Beauty, grace, culture, nobility of birth and character, perfect dignity—all these she had. And I doubt whether a new Pygmalion, moulding to suit himself the partner with whom he should share his life, could make one any nearer to perfection. Everywhere and by everybody, Count Von Bauern had been regarded with something akin to envy, because of his possession of such a treasure. But all too soon the envy changed to pity, when the sudden extinction of so rare a being proved in a way that she was not fashioned for this world."

"See there, that is the marquis!" interrupted Monterani. The rattle of wheels did indeed make itself heard as a coupe approached and stopped before the house that was in course of erection. This now made three carriages, waiting close at hand, and inquisitive loungers were plying the coachmen with questions.

"Well," resumed the narrator, "as this was the first time I had seen the count at the club since his sad loss, I yielded to an impulse of curiosity. Without being really intimate, we were fairly well acquainted. At the time of his bereavement, I had called and left a card—a formality that has the great advantage common to all formalities, of enabling one to dispense with any further trouble. But now that I met him at the club, and saw how depressed he was, and realized from the look in his eyes how vainly he would seek diversion until he had conquered the habit of entrenching himself within his personal sorrow, I felt that I was doing the proper thing in approaching him.

"Yet I no sooner stood before him than I regretted my act. Count Von Bauern, physically present in that wide billiard room, ablaze with the light cast by the huge reflectors behind the six big lamps, was far away in spirit—infinitely far away. Where was that spirit roaming? What was it seeking? What vision was it following? I do not know. But I do know that I stayed only long enough to clasp his hand, to murmur some conventional phrase, I have forgotten what, and then passed on into the adjoining room. Now, when the devil drives—"

"There comes another carriage! Luzzi's doctor, this time!"

"Be quiet, can't you?" suggested the lawyer, whom the interest of the story had already seized. "'When the devil drives,' what then?"

"Nothing can avert the catastrophe. Precisely that evening, the indisposition of Mme. Nevosky had necessitated the postponement of the opera and the foul weather out of doors offered a difficult problem to a good many men, how they were to pass the evening. Little by little a noisy crowd had gathered at the club, with Rodolfo Vialli at their head, a rattle-brained fellow, of lighter weight than the ashes on the end of his cigarette. They were gossiping at first, commenting on the illness of the songstress, making some sort of a wager; and then all at once Vialli, choosing for his opponent a certain Ansaldi, whose one idea in life was music, dragged him off by the arm to the billiard room. Curiosity drove me in the same direction. The game began, in the midst of a steady influx of new arrivals."

The clock in the cafe struck the half hour.

"They must have crossed swords by now," someone hazarded.

"But you are not listening," complained the lawyer again.

"If you should ask me," resumed the narrator, "how the

The Siege of Baler

A Review of a Remarkably Interesting Book Entitled "Under the Red and Gold" in Which a Spanish Soldier Tells How His Small Detachment Resisted a Filipino Force During Eleven Months of Constant Fighting and Heroic Endurance

How many Americans have ever heard of the siege of Baler? Very few, in all likelihood. Yet the siege of Baler is the latest glorious achievement added to the Golden Legend of Spain and the Spanish heart glows with pride when it is mentioned. For Americans it should have a special interest because it happened on the Island of Luzon in the Philippines and during its progress the islands were ceded by Spain to the United States. The history of the siege of Baler, a summary of which will be given in these columns, was written by Captain Don Saturnino Martin Cerezo who commanded the detachment of besieged Spaniards and has been translated and edited by Major F. L. Dodds of the United States Army. The book was published by the Franklin Hudson Publishing Company of Kansas City with the title of "Under the Red and Gold." The narrative is compact of heroic deeds and almost superhuman endurance that suggest the mighty adventures recorded by Froissart, Comines and other chroniclers of the days of chivalry. The attention of the editor of Town Talk was first called to this volume by Major-General Funston who declared that "Under the Red and Gold" was one of the most interesting and inspiring works dealing with military exploits ever written. General Funston also declared that the siege of Baler was without parallel in military annals and that it would seem more like fiction than fact had not the details of the siege been carefully verified by various military authorities. Perusal of the book shows that General Funston did not exaggerate its interest or overemphasize the heroism of the siege. "Under the Red and Gold" should be better known, for it tells a story of self-sacrifice, devotion to country and jealous preservation of personal as well as national honor which is of universal application. Too much credit cannot be given to Major Dodds for the pains which he took to procure the Spanish narrative and translate it into English. He has done his work excellently and the book is not only of absorbing interest but also attractively bound and illustrated. To repeat, it should be more widely known. It is the purpose of this extended review to introduce the book to readers who, it is quite certain, will not be satisfied until they have perused the entire narrative of this remarkable siege.

Picture a band of forsaken heroes fighting a desperate fight and winning immortal laurels in a cause which had ceased to exist, in defense of property which their own country had ceded to aliens and against the ancient enemy which Spain had transferred to the newer foe with the land itself and you have the anomalous side of this amazing siege of Baler. Imagine a company of Spanish soldiers, starving, suffering and dying from wounds and disease, withstanding for eleven long months the continuous efforts of a Filipino force to dislodge them from a little stone church and you will begin to apprehend the stupendous fortitude that made the siege of Baler so glorious an incident of recent Spanish history.

Baler is a little town on the east coast of Luzon distant one hundred and twenty miles from Manila. It is a desolate spot with mountain walls enclosing it on the landward side, the Pacific spread before it and an exposed and dangerous coast stretching away to north and south. Communication with Manila, over the mountains or by sea, is difficult and uncertain. The town stands on a point of land jutting from the shore of the Bay of Baler and is nearly encircled by a tidal stream which at times converts it into an island. It consisted, in Spanish days, of the church which was besieged, a priest's resident, a house for the governor, barracks for troops and a dingy tribunal of justice. These buildings were grouped about the plaza; the rest of Baler consisted of frail native houses surrounded by palm and bamboo.

For a year before the opening of the siege of Baler the Filipinos had been in insurrection against the Spanish Government. Toward the end of August, 1897, rumors reached Manila that the insurgents were taking advantage of Baler's isolated position to smuggle in arms and ammunition. At that time the Spanish garrison consisted of a corporal and four men; to these fifty men were added and the insufficiency of this force brought the insurgents out in numbers to capture the town. This lesser siege lasted for three months and in January, 1898, a relieving force brought it to an end. Thinking that only a few troops were needed to hold Baler, the Spanish authorities despatched fifty men commanded by Lieutenants Don Alonso Zayas and Don Saturnino Martin Cerezo and this force reached Baler on February 12, 1898. With the fifty men were one surgeon and a corporal and an attendant of the Hospital Corps. This small force took up its position in the church, as the strongest building in the town, with scant rations but a good supply of ammunition. The best part of the supplies consisted of 70 cavanes (a cavan contains 75 liters) of palay or unhulled rice and twenty-odd earthenware jars of water. It was on the first of July that the insurgent force became so threatening that the detachment was forced to shut itself up in the church. From the first of July, 1898, to the second of June, 1899, the detachment stood siege without receiving so much as a cartridge or a biscuit from the outside world. For three hundred and thirty-seven days that handful of Spaniards resisted a large force of insurgents; when the siege was ended there were only thirty-three of the detachment left. When they emerged from the church at last the Stars and Stripes had supplanted the Spanish flag in the Philippines.

At daybreak the following morning (July 1) we found a letter which the enemy had left near the church. In it they told us that we ought to lay down our arms in order to avoid the useless shedding of blood, seeing that almost all the Spanish troops had done so, and that further resistance was rash. They added that their force present consisted of three companies overwhelmingly numerous and prepared to capture us. This letter produced no great impression.

As to the capitulation of almost all the Spanish forces, we thought the story nothing more than a stupid artifice on the part of the enemy. But as the manifestations of force were incontestable, and as the facts that we had been able to gather showed that the situation was critical and the peril very real, we understood that it was going to be a long story. We therefore exerted ourselves to prepare for it with every means that we could reach. Suspicion and hesitation had given way to certainty and decision, and something great had awakened in our souls.

On my part, I began again to insist upon the well; because, if we should be closely besieged and should be unable to leave the church, as happened afterwards, there would be nothing left for us but surrender at discretion. Las Morenas finally gave me authority, and, with five soldiers, we put our hands to the work.

The result showed very soon that I had not suggested an impossibility. At a depth of four meters we found water in abundance, enough for all the necessities of

A Case Without Precedent

By Federico De Roberto (From the Italian)

As the carriages drew up before the entrance of the house in course of construction, and disgorged the seconds, with their bundle of swords wrapped up in an old piece of faded green cloth that once had covered a gaming table, the company gathered in the Terminal Cafe directly opposite, across the square, became excited.

"There they are! There they are, over there!"

"Have they all come?" asked Monterani.

"All but the marquis. See there, isn't that Dr. Salandri?"

"How about the other doctor?"

"I haven't seen him come. And it is three o'clock already."

All eyes were riveted in that direction. Even the waiter, with his napkin over his arm, stood craning his neck in the doorway.

"What is the duel about?" inquired Corsi, the lawyer. "Can anyone tell me that?"

"No mystery about that. Luzzi made himself too agreeable to the marquise."

"And her husband could hit on nothing more original than to send him a challenge?"

"By the way," interrupted Monterani, turning to Baldassare Gargano, who had not yet opened his lips, "were you not asked by the marquis to serve as second?"

"Yes, but I could not accept."

"If the question is not indiscreet, what was your reason?"

"I made a vow, the last time that I was involved in an affair of honor, never again to serve as second for anyone."

"Why so? What had happened to you?"

"It was a scene that I shall not forget, to the last day of my life."

"Was one of the principals killed?"

"On the contrary, the duel never took place."

Demos in Riverside

General Manager Bradley of the Pacific Telephone and Telegraph Company tells a good story illustrative of the characteristic attitude of the champion of the peepul in public office toward public service corporations. Not long ago the telephone company was called upon to extend its service in the pretty little town of Riverside. Mr. Bradley thought it might be advisable to cultivate the good will of the people of the town and to that end he decided to put in the conduit system. But as the company's franchise calls for overhead wires it was necessary to apply for permission to put them underground. So Mr. Bradley, believing that he would be hailed as a public benefactor, or at least that the graciousness of his company would evoke expressions of appreciation from a grateful populace petitioned the Mayor of Riverside for the necessary permit. Prompt was that official's action on the petition. Mr. Bradley was told that he would not be permitted to violate the terms of his franchise. Thus did the Mayor of Riverside vindicate his uncompromising adherence to the letter of the law and his independence of corporate influence.

The Funeral of Mrs. Spreckels

Extraordinary secrecy was maintained as to the hour at which the funeral of Mrs. Spreckels, the widow of the sugar king, would take place. When reporters called at the old house in Howard street to inquire they were told that the interment would be private and further questioning was emphatically discouraged. I am told that the reporter of one paper rang up Mr. John D. Spreckels to ascertain at what hour the services would be held and received the astonishing answer that he too had endeavored to find out but had been unsuccessful. Mr. Rudolph Spreckels was in charge of the funeral arrangements and spent most of his time in the Howard street residence and the inference was drawn that the hostility existing between the brothers had not been forgotten in the presence of death. However, if any disposition existed to keep John D. Spreckels away from his mother's funeral, it was defeated for he managed to learn the hour later and was in attendance with his brothers. There has been a great deal of comment, by the way, on the fact that neither Claus Spreckels nor his widow left anything to charity.

"B. U." Deserts Sacramento

Benjamin U. Steineman has deserted Sacramento and has taken up his residence in this city with the intention of spending the remaining years of his life here. This may seem a simple unimportant announcement, but to those oldtimers who know Steineman and realize how closely he has been identified during the past forty years with the political and business activities of the capital city it will come as something of a surprise. "Old B. U.," as he is familiarly called, was usually considered a fixture in Sacramento. Two score years ago he struck his roots into the soil of the little town and proceeded to grow with its growth and to prosper with its prosperity. Today Steineman knows every man and woman there, can recite their history, describe the skeletons in their closets and give their financial rating with the accuracy of Bradstreet or Dun. Not only that, but he also knows every politician in northern California in an intimate way, having had confidential relations with most of them at one time or another. A good story teller, Steineman nevertheless possesses the maturity of age and his revelations have never topped the barrier of discretion. It may be inferred that he was something of an institution in Sacramento and so he was; but he has shaken the dust of the town from his feet and is to become a metropolitan. Slowly, deliberately and with the cautious regard for shrewd dealing which has ever been his characteristic Steineman has disposed of his manifold Sacramento interests. His last tie to the capital was severed when he sold out his Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank to Banker Peltier who, as everybody knows, is the son-in-law of Banker Cox. Peltier and Cox may busy themselves henceforth with the finances of the valley town; Steineman is through. He has just enough money invested in this city to give him a little employment with which to temper luxurious leisure. From now on "old B. U." is going to enjoy life.

One of Steineman's Fights

Benjamin U. Steineman was always a versatile business man and it used to be said in Sacramento that nobody knew just how many enterprises he conducted. In the olden times one might find him at different hours of the same day behind the grille of his bank, behind the counter of his men's furnishing store and behind the table of his "coffee joint" in the Southern Pacific depot. Those were only three of his sources of income; he had many others and all received his personal attention. A hardworking man was Ben Steineman and a fighter too. That was proved many times but never so forcibly as when he lost the coffee and doughnut concession at the S. P. depot. Steineman had the good luck to be a protege of Governor Stanford and from him secured the restaurant concession at the depot. It was hardly a restaurant but rather a stand where coffee and doughnuts, sandwiches and pie were served to hungry tourists when the trains stopped at Sacramento. It was in Steineman's hands for many years and brought him a modest income. When Huntington took over Stanford's interest in the railroad, Colonel Crocker, as vice-president, had the concession transferred from Steineman to Louis Hanchette. Steineman was furious and vowed he would have his "coffee joint" back again. The loss of it he blamed on J. A. Fillmore who was the general superintendent of the road and who enjoyed the particular favor of John W. Mackay. When he demanded that the concession be restored Fillmore was obdurate. Steineman retaliated by suing Fillmore on an outlawed bill for $1300 of haberdashery. Fillmore was extravagant and easy about money; he had no intention of defrauding his haberdasher. But the publicity of the suit really broke his heart, helping to bring his railroad career and his life to a close. "Old B. U." got back his "coffee joint."

"Have you read Richard Le Gallienne's last poem?"
"No such luck."

The Foltz Idea

In the city of Cleveland the Public Prosecutor is also a public defender. When a man charged with crime is too poor to hire an attorney an assistant of the Public Prosecutor is detailed to defend him. The Examiner calls this the "Cleveland idea" and says that when it is generally adopted an important step will have been taken toward the establishment of real equality of rich and poor before the law. Let us give credit where it is due and call it not the "Cleveland idea" but the "Foltz idea." Mrs. Clara Foltz of the Californian bar, who was recently appointed by Governor Gillett to the Board of Charities and Corrections has been preaching this idea for many years. The system which has been adopted in Cleveland this brilliant woman has advocated with her pen and with her tongue. Years ago she lectured in the East on the inequality of the poor before the law, and she said it was not fair for the State to employ skilled legal talent for the prosecution of a poor man and allow him the services only of a novice in quest of experience as is the custom throughout the country. To Mrs. Foltz belongs the credit of being the first to point out the injustice of this situation and of having tried to educate us out of a cruel practice. Her missionary work has not been in vain, and now that it has borne fruit let us accord her the acclaim she deserves.

"Fighting again, Willie? Didn't I tell you to stop and count one hundred whenever you were angry?"

"But it didn't do any good, ma. Look what the Jones boy did while I counted."

The Row Between Hammond and Wiltsee

A few days ago mining men learned for the first time that John Hays Hammond, the great mining expert, and Ernest A. Wiltsee, his associate for many years, had come to the parting of the ways. Just how surprising is the break between these two can only be appreciated by those who know how intimate have been their relations and how successfully they have collaborated on some of the biggest mining deals in history. Hardly less surprising is the reappearance, as an associate of Hammond, of old Charles D. Lane who at the end of an amazing career is not only blind but practically impoverished. These developments were made public when Hays Hammond and Lane recently brought suit against Wiltsee for an accounting in connection with their large Mexican mining interests. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that Hammond made Wiltsee, for he gave him his golden opportunity many years ago and has been in business with him ever since. Whispers of trouble between the two have circulated from time to time, but never was there any intimation of trouble such as that which separated Lane from Hammond some time ago. Doubtless, therefore, a big row has developed of which the details will not be known until the litigation between Hammond and Lane on one side and Wiltsee on the other is fought through the courts. None are so bitter in enmity as those who have been bosom friends and Hammond and Wiltsee were all of that.

A Great Mining Combination

This row between Hammond and Wiltsee is the last act in the distintegration of the greatest combination of mining promoters the world has ever known. Gradually built up by picked men during several years it slowly went to pieces until only Hammond and Wiltsee remained. Now these two are separated. In its most brilliant period the combination included John Hays Hammond, Ernest A. Wiltsee, Jeff Doolittle, Charles D. Lane, all of northern California, Fred Baker of London, Fred Gardiner of London and Paris, Fred Bradley, Joseph D. Redding and Tom McFarland of Los Angeles. The aggregate of the mining interests represented by these men ran into bewildering millions invested in all four corners of the globe. The Hammond personality dominated the group, but not always in the most harmonious manner. The fortunes of the others have been various but today, standing alone, Hammond is wealthier than ever before and, in all probability, more powerful on account of his association with the Guggenheim group of multimillionaires. The appearance of Charles D. Lane as Hammond's associate in the lawsuit against Wiltsee is particularly interesting because, of all that group, fate has dealt most harshly with this old wizard of the mines. It was only a short time ago that his son Tom set off to Alaska on borrowed capital to try for a streak of better luck.

How the Combine Started

This great mining and promoting combination started many years ago, before the Jameson Raid brought Hays Hammond into international prominence. Dwight C. Crittenden, another great California mining engineer, had failed to make good in South Africa because his methods of taking the ore out of the ground were too expensive. So while Crittenden went to Norway to manage iron mines for the king, Hammond took his place in South Africa. Equipped with the most modern machinery Hammond was an immediate success and began gathering about him a brilliant crowd of American engineers, American mechanics and American electricians. At that time Ernest Wiltsee was a tall lean young metallurgist in Nevada County. He had no money but he saw the possibilities in South Africa and managed to borrow $5,000 for the expenses of the trip. He offered his services to Hammond, made good, shared in Hammond's prosperity and returned with Hammond to this city, a big man among big men. Hammond had been retained by the London Exploration Company, the Venture Corporation and other large English concerns and he saw to it that Wiltsee also was engaged at a fancy salary. A few years after their return Hammond and Wiltsee took in Jeff Doolittle, the greatest metallurgist and gold dredging expert on the Pacific Coast and the man whose word was final with investors in mines the world over. These three began by buying California and other western mining properties for English corporations and their field rapidly widened. Lane joined them and Baker and Gardiner and McFarland, and the combine interested itself in big Mexican mines. Then Fred Bradley, afterwards one of Harry Orchard's intended victims, was added and they expanded into the Colorado and northwestern territory. When the great boom in copper came Hammond turned over most of his English connections to Wiltsee and devoted himself principally to the Guggenheim properties.

How it Broke Up

With so many men representing such diverse interests there was bound to be trouble. Of the rows that took place the walls of a certain office in the Crocker building would be eloquent if walls could speak. But the walls of the office of the "Gold Run Gravel Company Ltd." where all the rows occurred are discreetly silent and so is Jesse W. Lilienthal who was Hammond's attorney and who acted as peacemaker many a time. Hammond, Wiltsee and Doolittle, the original three of the group, had many squabbles, but both Hammond and Wiltsee recognized the value of Doolittle's services and clung to him until his death. Hammond was ever the storm-center. After numerous clashes with him Lane withdrew and was followed by Baker, Gardiner and McFarland. There was a tremendous row between Hammond and his Boston associates over dredging properties on the Feather and Yuba rivers. Then there was a row between Hammond and Bradley with some display of force. Bradley was backed in the dispute by William H. Crocker and left the combine, despite his lifelong friendship for Doolittle. Chester A. Beatty, Hammond's best expert, quit too; and so it went, until only the three partners were left. When Doolittle died, leaving his third interest to his widow, there were only Hammond and Wiltsee. And now for the first time a lawsuit has shed the light of publicity on the fact that Hammond and Wiltsee are friends and associates no more. Time and dissension have smashed this remarkable combination into smithereens.

The Romance of Natomas Consolidated

Some day a Rex Beach of California will realize what a wealth of material for stirring romance resides in the story of Natomas Consolidated and through his telling of the tale we shall suddenly discover that the golden miracles of the argonauts are being duplicated today under our very noses. The Natomas Consolidated of California is a mining corporation that operates immense gold dredges at Natoma, Folsom and Oroville. Its story involves the making of swift fortunes for poor men, the repairing of the fortunes of shattered millionaires and the piling of new millions on the fortunes of men already rich in seven figures. It all began when R. G. Hanford acquired mining claims north of Sacramento and Frank Griffin, taking a leaf out of the book of W. P. Hammon, built dredges to work them. W. P. Hammon, a nurseryman in Butte County, had discovered gold flakes in digging a well and had evolved the scheme of handling the gravel by dredgers. When Hanford and Griffin applied Hammon's discovery to their claims, the rewards were large and Eugene De Sabla, a friend of Hanford, was taken into the project. Seventy thousand acres of land between the Sacramento and American rivers were acquired and the Natomas Consolidated was formed with men like Louis Sloss, Ernest Lilienthal, William H. Crocker and Joseph D. Grant on the ground floor. All of these millionaires have enhanced their fortunes out of Natomas. Hanford is rated as tremendously wealthy today; so is Frank Griffin. James Follis, a brother-in-law of Griffin, has made about $700,000 out of it; Clarence Follis has increased the fortune he inherited by at least $250,000.

When Hammon Made Good

W. P. Hammon's gold dredger transformed him from a comparatively prosperous nurseryman into a magnate and his magic touch also extricated other capitalists from a hard position. That story would be for the novelist an episode in the romance of Natomas. Probably nothing has done so much and will continue to do so much for the Sacramento Valley as the Northern Electric Company. That company has given the territory in which it operates a new lease of life. On a conservative estimate it is bringing 20,000 home-seekers there every year. Yet there was a time, not long ago, when John Martin, Eugene De Sabla and Henry Butters who started the Northern Electric were in desperate straits. Martin and De Sabla were at the end of their available resources; they were harassed with local indictments and were not in a position to appeal to eastern capital. The Butters family troubles added to the difficulty of the situation and things looked very blue for Northern Electric. At the psychological moment W. P. Hammon came to the rescue. He was willing to buy the stock in Northern Electric held by De Sabla, Martin and Butters, but he told them that they would be foolish to give up their interests. He went into the project, secured gilt-edge backing from eastern capitalists and put Northern Electric on its feet. It has been flourishing ever since and whenever it needs more money De Sabla has a million to spare which he made out of Natomas Consolidated shortly after the crisis.

Charlie Dickman's Bills Against the City

Auditor Tom Boyle came across a characteristic absurdity of the late poetic municipal administration a few days ago in the shape of two bills against the city submitted by Charlie Dickman, the Bohemian Club artist. One bill, for $60, was for "devising the color scheme of a schoolhouse of six rooms at $10 a room." The other was a bill of $40 "for devising the color scheme of an engine house." These are very interesting bills. Our schoolhouses always have uniform color schemes, but evidently the artistic strain which Dickman incurred in deciding that room number six should receive the same treatment as rooms number one, two, three, four and five was just as great as the strain of picking out a color in the first place. Devising color schemes for engine houses is a new industry for artists and should become very popular. I do not know whether Charlie had the boudoirs of the fire laddies done in a pale blue or in ashes of roses, but as the firemen are exquisitely esthetic I am sure that the engine house which Dickman "treated" for $40 must be a dream of loveliness. The only difficulty is that it may be so artistic that the firemen will not want to leave it, even for a general alarm. Too bad that Mayor McCarthy is not esthetically inclined so that Dickman might keep on devising color schemes for our public buildings. I would be delighted to see his color treatment for the new incinerator plant and the cells in the new Hall of Justice. But Charlie will knock in vain with his mahlstick at the door of the new regime. No wonder old Fuzzy Wuzzy reduced a car full of men and women to tears a few days ago by sighing out in a loud doleful voice, "Oh, how sorry I feel for my poor stricken city."

Customer—Look here, can't you paint up the bottom of my auto and make it look more presentable?

Agent—What for?

"Well, that's what I have to gaze at most of the time."

Chinese Consumption of Champagne

It may surprise many to learn that the members of the local Chinese colony are great drinkers of champagne; yet such is the fact. San Francisco's Chinatown is unique in its constant manifestation of the adaptability of the Chinese to occidental habits. Time and time again the Chinese have amazed the city by their swift assimilation of the ways of white people. They entered into the spirit of the Portola festival with a hearty enjoyment which was as infectious as it was unexpected. They celebrate New Year's Eve very much as the cosmopolitans of the city celebrate it, with promenades of merrymakers through the streets, confetti, restaurant revelry and all the rest of the frolics. For their own New Year's celebration, of course, they have a number of impressive oriental ceremonies to which they cling tenaciously but on these they have grafted characteristic American methods of enjoyment. Their very latest fad is the cultivation of the champagne habit. Favored white visitors to Chinatown during the recent New Year's celebration were amazed to find the Chinese merchants quaffing the best brands of French champagne and puffing the best Havana cigars. I am told that there was more champagne consumed during the recent New Year's in Chinatown than at the Portola and Mardi Gras masquerades combined, which is certainly "going some." The Chinese like to be good fellows. They have caught the spirit of San Francisco and are great spenders. Immense sums were taken from the banks to make this New Year's one of unexampled gaiety. A great big slice of the money went for champagne. This new habit of the Chinese has interested the wine men and they are beginning to extend their operations to Chinatown. An engagement of the battle of fizz water will be fought ere long in those oriental precincts and by next Chinese New Year's the territory will be properly divided among the rival agents.

Judge Lawlor's Forbearance

Having read the official record of the things that were said to Judge Lawlor last week just before he postponed the Calhoun case on his own motion, I marvel at his forbearance. The record shows that Judge Lawlor was badgered with amazing abandon, nay, apparently with absolute indifference to the awful consequences which he had the power to visit upon his tormentors. And yet he never turned a hair. Into his ear was poured language caustic and bristling with tart and trenchant innuendoes, and all the while his mobile face was a mask upon which could be read no trace of emotion. The salt of satire was rubbed into his skin and he winced not. Somewhat difficult is it to account for Judge Lawlor's placidity on that occasion. Ordinarily Judge Lawlor is extremely, nay, quixotically jealous of the dignity of the court. Usually he presides like a schoolmaster whose rule is iron and whose rod is ever at hand. But the other day he vouchsafed Mr. Stanley Moore extraordinary latitude, and that brilliant attorney indulged himself without restraint. The only plausible hypothesis upon which I can account for the unprecedented amiableness of Judge Lawlor's behaviour is that he appreciated the expediency of letting bad enough alone.

Barrett's Frankness

The situation in which Judge Lawlor was placed, it must be admitted, was somewhat embarrassing. He had set the Calhoun case for trial, and the defendant was ready. So was the District Attorney. There was no one to move for a continuance. Now the law in its solicitude for the rights of the individual guarantees him a speedy as well as a fair trial. Indeed the law provides against wanton procrastination on the part of the State and puts a time limit on postponements that are made without the consent of the defendant. Now Judge Lawlor, notwithstanding the disinterestedness which he has repeatedly affirmed, notwithstanding his complete realization of the fact that there is on him no obligation but that of maintaining the cold neutrality of an impartial judge, was not inclined to accommodate the defendant in accordance with the unprejudiced but unduly humane spirit of justice. He was resolved that the case should be postponed, and this resolution was in nowise weakened by the brutal frankness of Attorney John J. Barrett who said the suspicion was prevalent that in view of the approaching campaign somebody considered it advisable that the case should be kept alive for political purposes. Judge Lawlor received this remarkable statement with that proud haughtiness of soul which the Romans called stoicism. Not always does the flesh quiver where the pincers tears. If Mr. Barrett expected Judge Lawlor to take judicial cognizance of the fact that the Graft Prosecution was advocating the nomination of Hiram Johnson for Governor he must have been grievously disappointed. However Mr. Barrett's statement doubtless added to Judge Lawlor's embarrassment, directing attention as it did to the close coincidence between the court's resolution and the political designs of certain distinguished patriots.

His Stern Irrevocable Resolution

Neither embarrassment, nor Barrett nor Stanley Moore could dissuade Judge Lawlor. He had resolved to go the distance, as it were, and go it he did. The courageousness of him in the circumstances should not be permitted to pass without a panegyric, for the sentiment of which one has but to look to the facts. The ostensible reason of the postponement was that "Big Jim" Gallagher, the chief witness for the prosecution, was not available. But of course the defendant cannot be denied a speedy trial because the State has failed to compel the attendance of a witness. In this particular case it appears from the testimony given before Judge Lawlor for his enlightenment, the State had connived at the absence of the witness. Not only had Mr. Heney and Mr. Burns failed to subpoena Gallagher; one of them had actually advised him to go away. Furthermore while there is nothing of record to warrant the hope that he will ever return, there is much to justify the suspicion that he is keeping himself beyond the reach of the process of court at the instigation of men whose purpose is to harass the defendant. But of course it is not to be said that Judge Lawlor has committed himself to the task of furthering these designs. At least it is not to be said so here. All that I desire to do is to call attention to the situation that existed in Judge Lawlor's court when Stanley Moore had the temerity to take extraordinary liberties with his honor's dignity, and also to make clear the burden of Mr. Moore's remarks.

Two Pregnant Sentences

It will perhaps suffice for my purpose to quote from Stanley Moore one long and one short sentence. The two will serve to illustrate the character of his address. Here they are:

> And, if your honor please, instead as the impression seems to us to be sought to be created here, that the district attorney is not doing his duty, were he answering your honor's behest and your honor's suggestion not thinly veiled, in my judgment he would be recreant to every duty of his office, and in my judgment he would be stating that which he believed to be a lie were he to include in these affidavits a statement that he believed that if a continuance of this case should be had the witness shall have returned and be present when the case shall be again called to trial. He does not believe that, and I do not think the boys on the street believe that.

Here we find the court's observations characterized as "thinly veiled"; also we find the court charged with seeking to incite the sworn officer of the court and of the people to be recreant to his duty and to commit deliberate and wilful prevarication. I submit that Mr. Moore's language is susceptible of no other construction. If I am right then it must be admitted that Judge Lawlor's forbearance is prodigious. So bold a charge I do not believe was ever before uttered in a court of justice. Nor is the sting altogether in the first sentence. "I do not believe the boys on the street believe that!" Here we find subtle and lacerating innuendo. What Mr. Moore seems to have implied is that what Judge Lawlor presumed to intimate as possible was so notoriously absurd that even the boys in the street were not to be hoodwinked by any such representation. Nor was this the only allusion made by Stanley Moore to the boys in the street. He cited them with most tantalizing frequency, yet Judge Lawlor remained heroically equanimous, and at the end of a very bad quarter of an hour he postponed the case without giving any reason, his action being grounded no doubt in his persuasion of the sanctity of his motive.

The Sadness of It

One cannot ponder the picture which I have tried faithfully to reproduce without experiencing a tinge of sadness. Desirable as it is to punish them that are be-

HOW TO KEEP THE GAS BILL DOWN.

¶ When the coal comes to your home do you weigh it to prove there's a real 2,000-pound ton?

¶ When the butter arrives do you test for a real 2-pound square?

¶ When the meat is received do you prove that you're getting the weight?

¶ Answer: YOU DO NOT.

¶ With you and electricity isn't it only the size of the bill that concerns you, not the rate?

¶ You can be carelessly short-measured on coal, wood, butter, meat, or on the capacity of the average "quart bottle" of beverage or milk.

¶ But the gas and electric meters are as accurate as clocks and record on your premises only what is liberated there. They can't distinguish between what your uses actually required and what, through someone's carlessness, was allowed to burn needlessly.

¶ Many a household gas and electric bill could be kept down by simply preventing unneeded heat and unnecessary illumination.

¶ Whenever you go out turn off the gas, particularly in the kitchen. A match costs less than the gas that's wasted.

lieved to be guilty, especially when they are rich and powerful; important as it is to deter the wicked and preserve the purity of the public service, it is certainly a thousand times more desirable and a thousand times more important to safeguard the bench against the suspicion of acting upon the principle that the end justifies the means. Now if this suspicion were believed to be wanting in color are not the hues to be found in the vivid scene that was enacted in Judge Lawlor's court? Though it be conceded that Judge Lawlor, who carries with him some of that fierce, refining fire which is to dissolve the dross of human error, acts always upon what he conceives to be righteous impulse, that scene nevertheless seems to be not without significance. His singular forbearance in the teeth of affront is bound I fear to give the impression that the exigencies of the situation demanded the exercise of a meticulous discretion. How unfortunate that he did not resent harsh insinuation by sending Stanley Moore to jail.

"Whispering 'I Will Ne'er Consent'—Consented"

The Hon. Hiram Johnson has consented to become the standard bearer of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League at the primary election. Mr. Johnson has gladdened the hearts of the patriots who saw their cause go down to defeat in the municipal election of November of last year. He has shed on their afflicted minds the balm of comfort. He has inspired them with hopes that like happy blossoms fair promise timely fruit. With the aid of Johnson they may elect an attorney-general and get control once more of the district attorney's office. Nay, meanwhile they may dicker with Attorney-General Webb who would like to be re-elected, and who is not likely to receive any favors from the machine. Since Johnson consented the air has been full of rumors of plans and projects all of which are conclusive of the renewed activity of our uplifters and their ambition to employ the machinery of the State as formerly they employed the machinery of the municipality. These uplifters are now in control of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and they are confident of receiving the warm support of the righteous people of the interior who have been lamenting the waywardness of this unrepentant community.

His Patriotic Self-Sacrifice

It was with great reluctance that Mr. Johnson consented to become a candidate for Governor. What the argument was that overcame his objections is known only to the immaculate ones who have been commissioned by Providence to redeem the State. It was certainly a cogent argument, one that appealed to his heart as well as to his reason, but let it not be suggested that it was addressed also to his pocket. This I say in anticipation of unfriendly speculation which may be inspired by the recollection of the fat fee that was paid to Mr. Johnson in recognition of his vehemence and zeal as a reformer during the checkered career of the Graft Prosecution. Mr. Johnson tells us now that as a candidate for Governor he will make a great sacrifice, and from this we must infer that in his philosophy the highest honor that can be paid by the people of this State to one of its citizens will not compensate him for the talent which he is prepared to bestow on the duties of the exalted office. When so distinguished a citizen as Mr. Johnson assures us that what he is about to do for us is in the nature of self-sacrifice, he ought not to be scoffed at. But a few weeks ago we were told that Mr. Johnson was losing his sight, that he was doomed to go blind in five years, and felt therefore that for the sake of his family he should keep out of politics and accumulate as much money as possible in the practice of his profession. This being the case is it not for us to appreciate the enormous sacrifice he is about to make as well as the cogency and sentiment of the argument that won his consent?

Finder of Men

An average American knows many people. But he does not always know where they are.

He has a thousand friends and acquaintances. Where are they at this particular moment? He can be sure of some of them—perhaps a dozen. But he wants to locate one or more of the others.

The Bell system enables him to reach them.

If he finds his friend at home, or in his place of business, he talks with him at once. If he learns that his friend is in some other town the Bell System will furnish the connection.

Cities are larger than they used to be. Men know and need to know more people. Yet the need of keeping in touch is as great as ever. Without Bell service there would be hopeless confusion.

The range of the telephone is not confined to one town or one community. It is not satisfying simply to learn that a man is out of town; through the Long Distance Service of the Bell System he may be reached, wherever he is.

The Bell Service extends to all communities. It reaches the millions of American people. One in twenty is a Bell subscriber. The other nineteen can be found because Bell service is universal service.

The telephone does more work for less money than any other servant of mankind. There is economy as well as efficiency in one system, one policy, universal service. Every Bell Telephone is the Center of the System.

A Judge Pardoned

Not at one glance can anyone discern all the ramifications of the sacrifice that the Hon. Hiram Johnson has gallantly consented to make. The pecuniary loss, for example, is one thing, the wear and tear on his nerves is another thing, and then there is the sacrifice of scruple consequent upon his running on the same ticket with Justice M. C. Sloss. This eminent jurist is a member of the court that incurred the scorn and hatred of Mr. Johnson and his associates by rendering the celebrated Schmitz decision. It will be remembered that Mr. Johnson and the illustrious cabal of which he was a faithful representative regarded that decision as a specimen of Satanic artistry. It will be remembered that the gentlemen to whom Justice Sloss is now indebted for the endorsement of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League were so incensed against the court that they impugned its integrity, and by ingenious misrepresentation spread broadcast the belief that the highest tribunal of the State was unworthy of public confidence. The Hon. Hiram Johnson himself contributed to the disparagement of the court in an article written for the Call, though, as was stated at the time in these columns he had previously privately informed a judge of the Superior Court of this State that the law had not been complied with in the Schmitz case and that a reversal was inevitable. In all the circumstances of the matter it is indeed astonishing to find Justice Sloss and the Hon. Hiram Johnson running on the same ticket. Who can fail to appreciate the sacrifice that is being made.

Democracy's Opportunity

Auspicious is the prospect that now unfolds to the eye of the Democratic job-chaser. With the Republican forces split asunder, each faction resolved to vote the Democratic ticket in November in the event of defeat at the primaries, opportunity beams ravishingly on the battered and almost moribund party of Jefferson and Jackson. Will the leaders of the party in this State avail themselves of the embrace thus offered? Will they nominate a candidate for Governor to whom disgruntled Republicans will have no hesitation in giving their support? Or will they nominate some political hack whose aspirations have become track-worn, whose professions have become a weariness to the flesh? So far the Hon. Theodore Bell appears to be regarded as the only available candidate; this for the reason that the job-chasers have established cordial relations with him. William T. Jeter of Santa Cruz has been suggested as a man worthy of confidence and support, but he is not in touch with the men whose interest in the party is symbolized by the piewagon. Mr. Jeter is not a politician. He is a man of affairs, a citizen of distinction who enjoys the respect and admiration of men in all sections of the State. As Lieutenant-Governor, during the Budd administration, he was called upon for a time to perform the duties of the Executive office, and he did so in a manner that won for him a great measure of esteem. Even in a situation less auspicious than the present, as the standard bearer of his party William T. Jeter would inspire enthusiasm. There is no indication, however, that the leaders of the Democracy are threatened with an influx of the common sense essential to an appreciation of the potentialities of William T. Jeter.

Newspapermen Go to Spokane

During the past few days this city has lost five of its well-known newspapermen, all of whom have gone to Spokane to accept responsible positions on the staff of the Inland Herald, the new morning paper recently started in that hustling northern town. The first two to heed the call from the north for experienced and energetic newspapermen were Harry Quinn and Hubert Chapin. Quinn has been identified a good deal with the Associated Press but has also served on the Call and Bulletin. Chapin was one of the clever artists of the Bulletin. They have become, respectively, Sunday editor and manager of the art department of the Spokane paper. Following these went Hugh Thompson and Kenneth McKim of the Chronicle and Charles Morrison of the Oakland Tribune. Thompson who will be city editor of the Inland Herald is one of the best known and best liked newsgatherers in this city. There is no sort of newspaper work in which Thompson is not proficient; he is a wizard in delving to the bottom of events and an expert in writing a "story." Of all the San Franciscans deserting their old field Thompson will be most missed by the newspaper boys, for he was one of the deans of the local corps and a delightful companion, on or off duty. Young McKim who has been "doing hotels" for the Chronicle with credit to his paper and

The Predicament of Redding, Greenwood et al.

Freddie Greenwood, Joseph D. Redding and their associates are going to have a hard time collecting from Ex-President Zelaya of Nicaragua that $25,000 for which they brought suit a few days ago in New Orleans. The trouble is that the witness upon whom they depended to prove their case against the crafty dictator is in an asylum. That witness is Stewart M. Brice, the son of a former United States senator. Young Brice was well known here, for he came to this city after going through the Spanish war and was gayest of the gay along the cocktail route. He was a giant physically, a generous opener of wine and a favorite with the ladies. His spectacular passion for Edna Wallace Hopper won him a great deal of interstate notoriety and added to the interest of his personality. A promising young lawyer, he went to Nicaragua to act as an intermediary between Zelaya and the group of investors headed by Greenwood and Redding and would have thrashed the former president in front of his palace one day if the troops had not interfered. On his return from that mission his dissipations were wilder than ever and it was a rare day that he was not the talk of our big hostelries and thirst emporiums. And now Redding has sent word from New York that he is unbalanced and has been sent to an asylum. It looks like a bit of good luck for Zelaya.

Why Billy Erb Was Happy

Everybody wondered why Billy Erb, football player, social favorite and oil man, was so happy at the Mardi Gras ball. Billy Erb is of a merry humor always, but on that occasion he surpassed himself, dancing with a furious joyfulness and drinking with a madcap zest that astonished all his friends. "Why is Billy so happy?" was the question that flew from lip to lip. A few brains, not too giddied by the obstreperous mirth of the night, recalled that Billy's exuberance had begun to pass all bounds shortly after midnight when he received a telegram in the midst of the revels. The spectacle of a Mardi Gras floor manager in a Punch's cap with his brow knitted over a telegram was one not to be forgotten. From this clue the story was finally unravelled. Billy Erb, young Cordes and other choice spirits are interested in a big oil property in the Bakersfield district. It is a splendid piece of oil land and there has been trouble over its ownership, a certain shrewd business man of this city claiming the title against Erb, Cordes and the others. Erb decided that prompt and peremptory measures were necessary to insure that possession which the law regards so highly, so Cordes was despatched to the oil fields and on Shrove Tuesday night, with such a cavalcade of wagons, derricks, machinery and armed men as never left Bakersfield before he galloped out to the property and captured the works. It was the news of this coup which came to Erb at the ball and raised his spirits to the effervescing point. Erb and Cordes are both in the old fields now while their rival is lamenting his fate in San Francisco. He dares not go to the scene of war for fear of running up against those armed guards.

No Free Wine at the Police Ball

The managers of the annual concert and ball for the benefit of the widows and orphans of policemen sold the bar privilege for $700, a figure at which it was very profitable to the man who secured it. That it was not doubly profitable is chargeable to the stand taken by the associated wine agents of the city. These boosters of choice beverages are stern in battle array when it is a question of competing for business but they are as brothers when it is a question of resisting a common foe. When the managers of the police ball suggested to the agents that they contribute the champagne for the bar this fraternal feeling fizzed forth and after brief consultation, one with another, they issued the ukase that whatever wine was ordered would have to be paid for. The wine agents are charitable but they could not figure out how charity would benefit by their gift of wine to a saloonman who was running the bar as a business proposition. The $700 which he had paid for the priv-

Clark Duped by a Scotland Yard Man

The fact that Charles W. Clark of San Mateo, the son of Senator Clark of Montana, has won his suit against the Rosaria Mining Company of Chihuahua reminds me of a curious circumstance which I have never seen mentioned in print. Young Clark obtained an option on the mine eleven years ago and started for Mexico with his chief engineer, F. O. Sizer, and his private secretary. Edward L. Wittemore, in order to examine the property. Clark was taken ill at Tucson and had to return, but Sizer and Wittemore went on and drew up a favorable report as a result of which Clark bound himself to pay the Mexican owners $100,000 if, after working the mine for a year, he decided to throw up his option. The curious circumstance is that after having hired Wittemore in a confidential capacity, Clark discovered that he was a former Scotland Yard detective. It seems that Wittemore had been sent to Montana by English mining investors to ferret out certain information which would be of great value to them and that seeing the opportunity for big money in the mining business, he had ingratiated himself into the favor of young Clark. On discovering that his private secretary had been a London sleuth Clark became suspicious and when he had reason to regret his investment in the Mexican mine he started an investigation which convinced him that Wittemore had duped him by a false report on the property. The United States Circuit Court awarded the $100,000 forfeit to the Rosaria Company but the Circuit Court of Appeals set aside the award a few days ago. Wittemore has been dead for some time.

"Oh yes, I know him very well, but he doesn't know me."
"Why, I thought he was a relative of yours."
"So he is, but he's a rich one."

Two Great Builders Retire

After a long and honorable career John and Jeremiah Mahoney, the well known local contractors, have decided to retire from active work and the firm of Mahoney Brothers will henceforth be conducted by their sons. The Mahoneys superintended the construction of most of the skyscrapers in San Francisco and their work stood the test of fire and earthquake. The Mills Building, the Flood Building, the Phelan Building, the St. Francis and Palace Hotels are among the monuments to their engineering skill. The brothers are no longer young and have decided that the time has come to rest from strenuous labor. John Mahoney with his daughter left recently for an extended tour of Europe.

She Tipped a Clubman

Harold Pracht who deals in real estate when he is not singing at Grace Cathedral or the Family Club, was driving along Pacific avenue a few days ago when a woman standing at the door of a big house attracted his attention by wild gesticulation. Thinking that something was wrong and that his assistance was desired, Pracht stopped his buggy at the curb and jumped out. "Kindly take this parcel to the Hotel Richelieu; you will find the name written here," said the woman producing a package of modest dimensions. Pracht recognized the woman as the wife of a close friend in the Family Club but it was quite evident that she did not recognize him. So he accepted the situation. As he drove to the Richelieu he tried to puzzle out just what the lady of Pacific Heights mistook him for, but it was too much. Arrived at the Richelieu he delivered the parcel, was politely thanked by the woman to whom it was addressed and—offered a tip of two bits which he accepted with thanks. "What did you do with the money?" I asked Pracht. "I'm going to buy a cigar for that lady's husband the next time I see him at the Family Club," was the reply.

May a Gentleman Take a Tip?

This incident suggests an interesting question. When a gentleman is mistaken for a servant of some sort and is offered a tip for doing a service, should he accept it? There have been many instances where men, in this predicament, have scorned the gratuity and made it plain to the blunderer that they have been grossly insulted. On the other hand there are numerous instances where men have acted as Pracht did. Harry Curtaz, president of the music company, was one of them. Some time ago, at the closing hour when he was alone in his store, a woman rushed in and asked for a ragtime song. Curtaz procured it whereupon she asked to have it played and he complied. She bought the music and gave Mr. Curtaz a tip of ten cents which he took without a word. Now, does a gentleman's dignity suffer in a case of this sort? I think not. Good breeding is unobtrusive and one of its governing principles is to spare the feelings of others. If Pracht and Curtaz had revealed their identity, the women would have been deeply humiliated over their mistakes and would have had to make difficult and extremely embarrassing apologies. Both men avoided giving pain and they showed that they were secure enough in their real positions to risk being mistaken for servants.

Husbands Detrimental to Art

According to the despatches Lina Cavalieri, the beautiful prima donna, who was reported at one time to be the cause of the estrangement between the Willie K. Vanderbilts, is so devoted to her art that she will not marry Bob Chanler, a passionate young millionaire by whom she has been most ardently wooed. She says she is willing to be loved by him, but of marriage she is intolerant. This manifestation of the artistic temperament, singularly enough, is approved by a local music critic who tells me that in the world of art husbands are an affliction. He is acquainted with all the leading song-birds, and he says he has noticed that those with husbands are under a restraint that mars their art. He points to the case of Sembrich as an illustration. Her husband, Professor Stangel, is always behind the scenes on her concert tours, making suggestions about the program. He is always worried about her voice, afraid that she is going to exert herself too much, and he communicates his nervous state to his wife. Schumann-Heink, says this critic, was not at her best on her recent visit, but though her young husband, William Rapp, was not bothering himself about her voice he doubtless distracted her by his absorption in the business end of things. He watched the box-office, and was so afraid that something might escape him that he wouldn't accept the box-office sheet as evidence of the number of seats in the house. He counted them. The only song-bird with a serene and unmeddlesome husband, says my informant, is Gadski. Herr. Tauscher, who is an agent for a manufacturer of repeating rifles, accompanies his wife on her tours and concerns himself with nothing but her artistic success. He is always in the audience, bubbling over with enthusiasm and leading in the applause.

Odd Things in the World

E. C. Neff, a restaurant keeper of Oakland, Ind., recently bought some cold storage eggs, on one of which he found a woman's name and address. He wrote to the woman and learned that the name had been placed on the egg when the woman lived in Princeton, Ind., more than three years ago. Mr. Neff wrote to Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, who has said that one year is the limit of usefulness of the storage egg and gave him the proofs of this egg's age. Dr. Wiley, in reply, said that the proof had been placed with the sub-committee that is investigating cold storage products and that it probably would prove valuable.

The renewal of frost and a heavy snow-fall in the region of Lausanne have caused, the cables tell us, great joy in Switzerland. They mean the continued success of the season of winter sports, with hosts of visitors and enhanced prosperity to the Swiss hotels. This is the point. The Swiss care as little as possible about the sports as such, but the hotels are the country's life. Switzerland is naturally poor. Her trade is small. She produces little wealth within her boundaries. Yet she has grown rich in half a century or so. About fifty years ago the national wealth was estimated at 72 francs 50, or $14.50 for each inhabitant. Today it is appraised at 152 francs 50, or more than $30 a head for every one of her 3,500,000 people. The tourists are the raw material of her wealth, and the hotels are the principal workshops in which they are converted into cash. There were 2,500,000 of them in 1906, the last year for which exact statistics are available, and it is calculated that on an average they left 86 francs, or $17.20, among their entertainers, a total of about $43,000,000. No wonder Switzerland is getting rich. There is no place in the world to which its hotel "industry" means so much as it does to Switzerland, and there is no place where it is taken so seriously. Hotel keeping is not only an industry there, it is developing into a science. There is an aggregate capital of 600,000,000 francs, or $120,000,000 embarked in it. The hotels employ about 28,000 persons in the year, to whom an aggregate of $4,000,000 is paid in salaries. After all expenses are defrayed, including repairs, allowances for depreciation and interest on borrowed capital, the hotel keepers realize profits aggregating $7,500,000.

Miss Sarah E. Ober, who has spent three years among the 7,000 Indians of the Washington coast, studying their religion and customs, says that some of the tribes have doubled in population in the last twenty years. These people are healthy, live in comfort and some are citizens. They are practically all Shakers, this religion being a graft of Christianity upon the old Tomahnous or spirit worship. When a new convert receives the "power" he becomes afflicted temporarily with a strange twitching of the muscles and shakes and shivers in a manner that no one possibly can imitate while in a normal condition. "The religion has done more to save the Indians from vice than all the missionary work they have received," says Miss Ober. "Once converted an Indian immediately becomes industrious."

Recent explorations of the Roman Forum and a portion of the Via Sacra, where a pre-Romulean necropolis was discovered in 1902, have led to the unearthing of an excubitorium or guardhouse near the Praetors' Tribunal and the remains of an archway of Fabianus which was erected B. C. 121. Dr. Boni is now attempting the resurrection of the archway on the original site. Later he will explore the guardhouse, which is a small, loopholed building of the republican period.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Bullish operations have been the feature of the stock market during the entire week as a result of the materially changed conditions in Washington, in the matter of the legislative program for this session. The publicity clause of the corporation tax law has been effectually disposed of. The railroad bill has had the most objectionable feature ruled out, whereby railways may buy into competing lines of stocks and bonds. The federal incorporation bill will probably be pigeon-holed for the present session of Congress. Hence we find the incentive for the recent so-called banker's rally which is the best description we can give of the rise in the market. Manipulation of stocks may be to keep prices steady for a while, but we believe that the range of values will eventually settle lower.

Wheat—Closing prices of wheat last week were only fractionally below the highest figures of the crop year. While there was a considerable crop scare early in the week, which was put into a dormant state again later by the heavy snowfall over most of the winter wheat country, there was no important change in the general situation. Speculatively, and for the immediate present, the owner of the local stock of wheat is in control of the situation, while for the longer campaign, the producer or owner of the farm reserves still has control of the market's destiny. Frequent attempts on the part of local believers in lower prices to raid the market have shown the futility of such attempts. In the absence of any supplementary selling of wheat from the interior, or from market centers, such sales were necessarily short sales, and therefore of no actual force or effect. The situation in the spring wheat country has been a little stronger than in the winter wheat.

Corn—Marketings of corn have not shown the large decrease during the last week that the trade had anticipated. Primary market arrivals were not only materially larger than for the preceding week, but they were also nearly double the quantity running to market a year ago. The bears have been laying much emphasis on the accumulating stocks at western and eastern centers, and in some cases have been open to the charge of exaggeration. Nevertheless, they were sufficient in their claims to make the market more of a two-sided affair than it has been in some time.

Oats—There was a further slight advance in oats prices last week. The crop scare excitement running in wheat, started many shorts covering oats and helped values materially.

Cotton—There was no mistaking the trend of the market this week. With the prices at the beginning of the week reaching the highest prices of this last rise, there gradually appeared a sagging tendency and then a bad drop with a break of about 45 points on Friday last. This may be attributed to various causes: Manufacturers and jobbers complain that the recent sharp fluctuations and declines in prices for raw cotton have to a very large extent demoralized the market for goods. Such disturbing influences have militated against anything like trading on a large scale even when the effect has been no worse. Slight gains in the movement suggest that, after all, there is more cotton held back than the bulls have claimed and that in the end the crop will prove larger than anticipated. We have in the past few letters tried to show this statistically and the action of the market seems to prove the truth of these figures. Though we think that the purchase of the near months at or about the present prices might prove a good turn, as there is potential strength in a wide bullish sentiment that cannot be denied, yet the preponderance of opinion and our advice is that the cotton market is a sale on any good advance, and on account of the good weather reports, particularly the new crop.

Copper—In view of the numerous holidays the Boston Coppers were very dull the past week. There seems to be little fluctuation, though the stocks are well taken whenever offered. The trend, nevertheless, seems to be upward, despite the fact that the price of copper does not show any material advance. But to offset this, is the fact that the demand for April delivery is very active and that the situation at the moment looks brighter. The statement last Friday revealed a total surplus in this country of less than one hundred million pounds of refined copper and the excess deliveries over production about 1,400,000 pounds per day. Technically, therefore, the copper market is in a very strong position and it would appear that the pendulum which has, for the last three years, been swinging in favor of the consumer may now swing towards the producer's side. Therefore we can see but one side to the copper stock market, meaning the good ore producing mines, yet with the New York Stock Exchange, we only see a trading market for the present.

LOVE'S SUPREMACY

I would, indeed, that Heaven had made me meek,
Content to hold and fill a second place,
Take lesser love as undeserved grace,
And bow my thankful head when one should speak
Me gently, touch with careless hand my cheek,
Or bend sometimes and kiss my upraised face,
Since she, forsooth, is in her far-off place,
For whom his highest homage seemed too weak.
But I was made with passionate strong soul,
And what I would, I would have wholly mine;
And if I bow my head to Love's control,
And to his keeping all myself consign,
It must be Love that answers to my need,
That loves me wholly, and is Love indeed.

PURE MILK FOR BABY

Sanitary milk production was first started by Gail Borden in the early 50s. The best systems today are largely based on his methods, but none are so thorough and so rigidly enforced as the Borden system. For over fifty years the Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has proved its claim as the best food for infants.

Greenway on the "Soft" List

From some of the wine men I learn that the Mumm people have placed Ned Greenway on the "soft" list. This is a technical term in the champagne trade which requires a bit of explanation. It does not mean that the czar of society has been relegated to the dreary unfortunates who indulge only in soft beverages. Far from it. Ned is still free to quaff the sparkling quintessence of the French vineyards to his heart's content and will so remain as long as he sees fit. But Mr. Greenway, in recognition of his years of valuable service to the house of Mumm, has been notified that he may henceforth render them as much or as little service in exchange for his munificent salary as he desires. They ask of him no strenuous endeavors; his days may be days of dolce far niente and his nights may be Ambrosian nights of intellectual leisure, if he so elects. This is a way the Mumm people have of showing their appreciation for lifelong service, this and the trip to Europe for which Mr. Greenway is preparing. Whatever cares are connected with the function of keeping Mumm in continuous popularity will henceforth begin to furrow the still placid and unwrinkled brow of Tom McCann, Greenway's right-hand man.

Greenway's Travel Plans

Mr. Greenway will cross the Atlantic in the floating palace Kron Prinz of the German line and will see all that is worth seeing in Europe before his return. But before leaving this country he will pay a visit to Baltimore and secure the choicest mess of diamond-back terrapin for presentation to King Edward. The czar is a connoisseur of terrapin and when King Edward regales himself on Czar Edward's gift with a bottle of "cordon rouge" on the side he will confess that 'twas a treat worthy of royalty. In the course of a long and honorable career Mr. Greenway has made many firm friends among foreign visitors to San Francisco and in Europe he will renew many choice intimacies. Greenway's is no merely provincial fame; the charm of his personality, his genial warmth of temperament and his unceasing kindliness have endeared him to all who have had the pleasure of knowing him. His first trip abroad is sure to be marked by many pleasant incidents which it will be worth while to hear from Ned's lips on his return. He looks forward with particularly pleasant anticipation to his visit to St. Petersburg where a chum of his school boy days is in the diplomatic service.

From the St. Regis Hotel in New York Mrs. William Miller Graham writes me that, contrary to reports, she is not going on the stage. She states that she has no intention of adopting a theatrical career and that she will be trained by David Belasco for amateur dramatic work only.

Some of Our Gentlemen Farmers

Let none suppose that the country gentlemen of Burlingame and thereabouts are mere poseurs, dallying half-heartedly with the pleasures of the country amid scenes of urban luxury. I make this statement because there have been intimations that the swell habitants of our plutocratic suburbs resemble Watteau's shepherds and shepherdesses who never handled crook or fondled lamb except for pictorial purposes. Not of this sort are the millionaires rustics down the peninsula. These gentlemen are truly rural, even if they scorn the blue overalls, the square-toed boots and the aggressive whiskers of the stage hayseed. There is Frank Carolan, for instance. 'Tis true Mr. Carolan does not arise before cock-crow, strap a milking stool to his manly form and tote a milk bucket into the dewy meadows. Yet Mr. Carolan knows a Holstein from a Jersey and he is proud to sell milk to the less favored denizens of the countryside. Then there is Timothy Hopkins. It is a safe bet that Mr. Hopkins never guided a plow, drove a header-wagon or blistered his hands with a pitchfork. But Mr. Hopkins is a hay merchant of no mean pretensions. Last but not least, we come to that classic forensic pleader, Samuel Shortridge. Mr. Shortridge, too, is a gentleman farmer. Skilled by day to point an epigram with a hypnotic finger, Mr. Shortridge hies him of an evening to the calm of his rural retreat where he knows every chicken by its first name. Mr. Shortridge is a connoisseur of hens and roosters and his eggs have a wide sale and are especially profitable in these parlous days when the cost of living is so high. And being of a prudent disposition Mr. Shortridge never puts them all in one basket.

The Sensation of the Season

The McGavin-Fry elopement was the excitement of the week. Properly speaking and to give it due credit it is the sensation of the season. Nothing could have been more unexpected and the impromptu wedding at the McGavin home which followed the civil ceremony was such a departure from the ordinary that society has not yet recovered from the surprise of it. Every one knew Douglass Fry was devoted to pretty Dolly McGavin but there was no formal engagement. He is only 19, and the bride a year or two older and it was supposed that young Fry was merely one of her many admirers. On the contrary he was an accepted suitor and only parental, (on his side grand-parental), objection based on the young man's youth, delayed their marriage. On Monday Miss McGavin lunched with friends but said nothing of her matrimonial plans. When she left the home of her hostess she met Douglass Fry and the civil and religious ceremonies followed. When the bride's mother learned that the first knot had been tied she insisted on a wedding with the usual accompaniments of bridesmaid, best man, white gown and veil. Mr. and Mrs. Fry repaired to the McGavin home whence invitations to twenty-five bewildered friends were sent over the telephone. Florist and caterer were hastily summoned and the bride changed her walking suit for a pretty white lace evening frock and her mother's wedding veil. Miss Marian Miller was bridesmaid and Kenneth Moore best man. Mrs. Fry is one of the most popular belles of the younger set. She is pretty and vivacious and has been prominent at all of society's important functions. She was one of the bridesmaids at the wedding of her brother Drummond McGavin and Miss Helen Baker in November. Douglass Fry is the grandson of Mrs. John D. Fry whose fortune is rated at several millions and whose home at Jackson and Franklin streets is one of the handsomest in town.

MISS HELEN LLOYD

One of the beautiful girls of Berkeley, the daughter of Mrs. Horatio Nelson Lloyd. Miss Lloyd's marriage to Edward Thompson, the son of Colonel and Mrs. Thompson of Seattle will take place soon.

Mrs. J. B. Coryell, "the orchid lady," was recently hostess at an elaborate luncheon at the Fairmont, afterwards taking her guests to the theatre. All the members of the party, including Mrs. McDonald Spencer, Mrs. J. J. Brice and the Misses Collier wore corsage bouquets of orchids which reached from shoulder to waist line. In glaring contrast Mrs. Coryell wore a minnikin bunch of Marie Louise violets.

Dick McCreery is Here

Richard McCreery who married Lady Grey-Egerton is a visitor at Burlingame. The romance of the McCreerys gave London society an absorbing topic of discussion a few years ago. Lady Grey-Egerton who was Miss Cuyler of Morristown, New Jersey, was one of the beauties of the London smart set. She was considered a devoted wife and mother and the Grey-Egertons were frequently referred to as typifying the ideal international marriage. Naturally there was much shocked surprise when the lovely American divorced her titled husband to wed a compatriot. It was said she eloped with Dick McCreery and that her husband subsequently permitted her to secure a divorce. He, in turn, recently married a second time, his bride this time being an English girl who is to be step-mother to the Grey-Egerton children who have always remained with their father. Mrs. McCreery did not accompany her husband to America. Dick McCreery is an enthusiastic polo player and was formerly a member of the Burlingame team. He was an interested spectator at the games played in El Cerrito field last week, accompanying his friend Dick Tobin who was barred from playing early in the season by a badly sprained ankle. Richard McCreery is a brother of Walter McCreery whose matrimonial tribulations occupied much space in the press when he filed suit against his wife for divorce in this city. Walter McCreery is also a visitor at Burlingame.

Miss Taliaferro's Difficult Name

Some of our haughty swells who would look with scorn on the bounder who mispronounced Cholmondeley or De La Pasture have been tripping all over themselves, figuratively speaking, in trying to negotiate the name of Miss Agnes Marshall Taliaferro, the beautiful belle of Richmond, Virginia, who was married on Wednesday to Samuel Averett Clement, an ensign on the South Dakota. Many stared in round-mouthed wonder when told that the proper way to handle the word was "Tolliver." Ignorance in a matter of this sort is decidedly provincial and those who were caught lengthening the name to five syllables felt more deeply humiliated than if they had been discovered in a crime. Miss Taliaferro arrived in the city with her father Monday evening, just in time to greet her fiance on the incoming battleship. The wedding was to have taken place in Richmond, but naval orders upset the plans. Nevertheless the ceremony at St. Paul's in Oakland was a pretty one. The

News About "The Cave Man"

Charles K. Field is putting the finishing touches to "The Cave Man" which will be the Bohemian Club's midsummer jinks piece de resistance with David Bispham in the title-role. The report that Charlie Dickman is to take the part of a gorilla is unfounded. There are to be no "missing links" and monkeys in "The Cave Man." It is a serious effort which Mr. Field trusts will not prove amusing. Those who have heard the music and read bits of the dialogue declare that it will be the most notable of the Bohemian forest dramas. W. J. McCoy who collaborated with Will Irwin in the "Hamadryads" has written the incidental music for it. Given the powerful art and personality of Bispham with the primeval beauty of the setting "The Cave Man" should be a wonderfully impressive production. The stage at the Bohemian Grove is built against a steep wooded hillside which rises as a back-ground and in this hill the cave of the cave man will be constructed after plans suggested by Professor Merriam of the University of California who is an authority on caves and cave men and all things pre-historic. There will be half a dozen characters and a large chorus, but the roles have not yet been given out save those of the hero and the villain, which latter will be sustained by Charles Dickman. McKenzie Gordon will also have an important part in the production. It was Bispham's wish to appear in a jinks play. During his last engagement in San Francisco he visited the grove and was much struck with its beauty. It was then he expressed a wish to sing there and the generous offer made in the interest of art was accepted. The club recently made him an honorary member since non-members may not take part in its plays.

Apropos the death of Jackson Gouraud people are recalling the time when little Gladys Crocker, the daughter of Amy Crocker-Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud, startled a room full of guests by announcing, during a conversational lull: "Mama, of all my papas I liked Mr. Gillig best."

The Hagers in Retirement

The fact that Miss Alice Hager recently won the golf championship of northern California from Miss Edith Chesebrough serves to remind me that society does not see as much of the Hager sisters as it used to a few years ago. They have gone into retirement, almost. In the days of the indomitable Mrs. Hager the family was the very center of our social life, but nowadays how seldom are the girls heard of! Emelie who was a great belle in her day married Walter Dean and cares little for the frivolities of the set in which her lines are cast. Once Ethyl was the liveliest of a lively group of girls whose exploits kept society on the qui vive but since she married Lansing Kellogg she spends much of her time in the country and seems averse to the exuberant pastimes in which she formerly delighted. I saw her at the Schumman-Heink concert last Sunday and I imagine that the calm joy of good music is more to her fancy now than the giddy whirl of gaiety. Miss Alice Hager had not been conspicuous in society for some time when she suddenly appeared and wrested the golf championship from Miss Chesebrough.

Mrs. Atherton Cultivated in Gotham

Gertrude Atherton is being very assiduously cultivated in New York by all the feminine scribblers who have social pretensions as well as by those established members of the smart sets who go in for literary work as others go in for bridge or golf or riding. Mrs. Atherton is waxing in popularity with readers on both sides of the Atlantic all the time and has many very distinguished friends in Europe as well as in America. Hence the would-be poetesses, authoresses and culturines have decided that it is distinctly worth their while to get on friendly terms with her. Perhaps they imagine that she will undertake the task of finding publishers for them or will give them a few pointers about their work. I think they will be doomed to disappointment. Mrs. Atherton is a very busy woman and has neither the time nor the inclination to bother about mediocrities. One of the poetesses who has spent as much time as she possibly could in the company of Mrs. Atherton is Mrs. Alfred Wagstaff Jr. who is one of the most industrious versifiers in New York. No doubt this lady yearns for an opportunity to hear Mrs. Atherton's criticism of her output, but she had better beware. Mrs. Atherton is nothing if not plainspoken. She abhors pretense, as was indicated when she clashed with the suffragists. If she ever tells Mrs. Wagstaff what she thinks of the Wagstaffian rhymes, that estimable lady will surely sink under the blow and turn her activities into some other channel.

Just now there is talk of drawing the lines very tightly at the Mardi Gras ball next year, but let us wait a year before being so sure about that. Exclusiveness is very comforting but not productive. By letting down the bars this year the ladies netted $9,000 for charity.

Miss Stocking's Musical Studies

The publication in last week's Town Talk of an article by Miss Helen Stocking in which that young lady analyzed Strauss' latest opera "Electra" and described the effect which it produced when it was presented for the first time in New York, has evoked several questions as to what the talented musician and critic has been doing since she left this city. Miss Stocking has been turning her New York stay to good account. As a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt in this city she exhibited unusual musical talent and gave promise of a fine career. Following the advice of her teacher she went to New York to gain more general musical culture and studied with Joseffy and Bowman. For some time now, in addition to her piano instruction, she has had the privilege of special study with the eminent Goldmark in musical analysis and the critical study of masterpieces and modern music. She is also taking ensemble work with Livonius. Being fortunate in her musical surroundings and having many friends in New York, Miss Stocking has enjoyed exceptional opportunities for hearing the innumerable concerts, operas and symphonies which have made the season an exceptionally brilliant one. In addition to her other work she has done considerable writing for musical reviews. Miss Stocking's musical criticism is distinguished by sympathy and insight, qualities which were marked in her critique of "Electra."

Fine Artists for the Bismarck

Mr. Otto Muller, manager of the Bismarck Cafe, has just returned from the East and Mexico City where he has been booking high class attractions for his restaurant. Among some of the artists are Floro Arroyo, soprano, Manuel Malpico, baritone, Ismael Magana, tenor, all direct from Teatro Nacional, Mexico; also Mr. Arthur Hahn, an old favorite among San Franciscans, for he was one of the stars at the old Tivoli. Mr. Muller has also secured the services of La Bella Serrana, the most sensational of all Spanish dancers. Her appearance at the Bismarck will be her first in America.

Captain Arthur Cranston, U. S. A., was a guest at the Hotel Victoria during the week.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. William Haas and Mrs. I. N. Walters entertained sixteen guests at a breakfast at the Cliff House last Sunday morning.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included K. L. Perry, T. C. Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. E. Lydess, Miss Gertrude Crossland, C. E. DeCamp, W. T. Smith, Mrs. Susan W. Tibbits, W. S. Davis, Mrs. Charles D. Pierce, Mrs. John Russ, Mr. and Mrs. F. E. DeGroat, F. E. Melville, Mrs. W. F. Morris and S. V. Armstrong.

Miss Marie Louise Foster, Miss Mina Van Bergen and Miss Lee Girvin left last Friday on a ten days' visit to Miss Edith Von Shroeder at "Eagel's Nest," San Luis Obispo, the country home of Baron and Baroness Von Shroeder.

The Palace was the scene of a very pretty luncheon on last Saturday, given by the Chamber of Commerce board of directors to James McNab, the retiring president. In token of their appreciation of his efforts to upbuild the organization Mr. McNab was presented with a silver candelabra of handsome design and workmanship.

Recent arrivals at the Hotel Victoria include Mrs. Wm. B. Fechheimer of Portland, Rev. George M. Searle of New York, Mrs. E. C. Smith and her son, W. G. E. Smith of Portland.

Bridge continues in popularity. Last Wednesday Mrs. Charles C. Moore and Mrs. S. D. Walden were hostesses at one of the largest bridge parties of the season. Sixty friends met at the St. Francis and several hours were spent at the game, each one hoping to capture one of the beautiful trophies, which were works of art that had come all the way from Paris.

On Thursday Mrs. Moore and Mrs. Walden entertained sixty other friends at another bridge party at the St. Francis in the White and Gold Room, followed by tea.

William Sparks, the artist, was recently the guest of honor at the Sequoia Club, the occasion being a dinner celebrating his birthday.

At last accounts Mrs. James Otis and her two charming daughters, the Misses Cora and Fredricka, were at Passy, just outside of Paris.

Several dinner parties made the past week a busy one at the Hotel Victoria. Among those who entertained on Thursday evening were Mrs. W. G. Leland of New York who is wintering at the Victoria.

The Subscription Dance will be given in the Colonial Ball Room of the St. Francis Hotel tonight. It will be one of the fashionable events of the season, and as the arrangements are in charge of Mrs. Greenbaum it is needless to say the ball will be a charming affair.

Society on both sides of the bay is deeply interested in the entertainment which Mr. and Mrs. Frank C. Havens will give at the Claremont Country Club on the Friday after Easter. Mrs. Havens is living up to her reputation for originality and many surprises are in store for her guests. The entertainment will be one of the largest of the season.

Mrs. William C. Ralston and Mrs. Lucie May Hayes will soon leave for a tour abroad.

DISTINCTION

Distinction in dress, distinction in manner, distinction in the appointments of a home, distinction in its architecture and surroundings---a life in harmony---this is the desire of every person of taste and culture. And for such persons the CROCKER TRACT, Piedmont, offers the place par excellence for a residence which shall possess this greatly to be desired quality---distinction. Surroundings incomparably beautiful with trees and flowers---vistas of green slopes and distant bay---an atmosphere of spaciousness and freedom under a nearly always smiling sky---the pleasant and enduring associations which naturally arise in a community of mansion-houses, each set in its own spacious and perennial gardens---such are in part the distinctions of this exquisite residence park. No residence valued at less than $10,000 may be erected, which restriction assures the distinction of the place for all time, while the surrounding gardens and lawns may in each case run to several acres in extent. And as for the more prosaic advantages, they are all present---rapid electric transportation, well-designed boulevards, sewers, water, telephone lines, sidewalks, etc., etc. In brief, here is the perfect place for the home of distinction, and our motors, in continual attendance, will take you over it any day you may choose.

The Best "Grouch" on the Stage

By Edward F. O'Day

It may seem incredible but it is true. "With these eyes I saw it"—the spectacle of a theatregoer sleeping soundly through two acts of McIntyre and Heath. In a choice orchestra chair near the stage she slumbered, for this theatregoer was a woman, an elderly woman with gray hair and a placid face lightly touched by time. All around her men and women of assorted ages became youngsters again and jellied with continuous laughter but this woman tarried peacefully in the land of nod, all oblivious of the fun that was flowing in a steady stream across the footlights. It was a distracting sight, for ever and anon I was impelled to take my eyes off the two blackface comedians to observe her, to note whether any particular joke would awaken her. But no, her capacity for sound sleep must have been inherited from one of the seven Ephesians; even a stageful of singing kicking beauties failed to disturb her repose. It was uncanny and it aroused a queer feeling of resentment. To sleep during a sermon or a lecture or a political speech would be perfectly natural. Even in the theatre the temptation to somnolence may be irresistible at times. But with McIntyre and Heath dispensing mirth it is unnatural. What tsetse fly of indifference, what narcotic of weariness, what perfect remedy for insomnia was responsible for the slumber that defied a stageful of merriment and a theatreful of laughter? It was a great relief when a masculine neighbor on his way to the bar at the close of the second act woke the woman up. He must have stepped on her toe. The slumbering woman lost two-thirds of a treat the like of which this city has not had since McIntyre and Heath were here in "The Ham Tree." The old Georgia minstrel act around which "The Ham Tree" was built is a classic of the vaudeville stage. Age could not wither it or custom diminish its possibilities for exciting laughter. That old act was the best dramatized "grouch" ever given to the public. It fixed the standing of McIntyre and Heath in the American theatre and they are wise not to depart from it too far. The battered trombone and the wornout trunk are gone; gone too the shoveling of doughnuts, the platter of roast beef with the gravy oozing out of it and the tree where the hams grew. McIntyre and Heath have a new play with new jokes, but the "grouch" of McIntyre is still fed by the taunts of Heath. They are not stranded minstrels this time but rival suitors for the hand of a chocolate beauty and a tomato figures as the chief deadly weapon of their amorous warfare. To dramatize a tomato is an achievement almost as signal as to dramatize a "grouch," but "In Hayti" demonstrates that the love apple is a plot in itself and also that its effectiveness as an excuse for McIntyre's "grouch" is hardly inferior to that of the varied viands which the imagination of Heath conjured for the tormenting of the stable boy turned minstrel. Comparisons between "The Ham Tree" and "In Hayti" would be invidious and useless. Perhaps the former extracted a greater volume of laughter but "In Hayti" attacks the risibles aggressively from the start and reduces the audience to a condition of passive chortling bondage that is quite sufficient for one night. The most harassed victim of sleeplessness would not envy that slumbering woman her resistance to the two comedians in their new play. McIntyre and Heath, ever since they began to purvey a whole evening's entertainment, have been noted for the fine companies by which they have been surrounded. This one is no exception. The principals are all good, particularly Julian Rose who shines as a low-comedy Hebrew and Jane Burby, the object of the affections of the two stars. As for the chorus, it is full of pulchritude and music and demonstrates conclusively that legs were made before skirts, an interesting truth sometimes forgotten by our good people.

Schumann-Heink Sings "The Erlking"

By the Music Lover

There was a great burst of applause when Mrs. Katharine Hoffman, sitting at the piano on the little stage of Dreamland Rink, sounded the first notes of Schubert's "Erlking." This poignant tragedy of a dying child, the tenderest and most heartrending ballad that Goethe ever wrote, has always been a favorite with the music-lovers of San Francisco. It has often been said that the ballad is too difficult for adequate vocal presentation and that only the piano can render its full meaning. San Franciscans know that this is not true for they have heard Gadski sing it with marvelous and touching beauty of expression and they have heard David Bispham and Dr. Ludwig Wuellner give it masterly masculine interpretation. But not till Madame Schumann-Heink sang it did they realize its full power to sway emotion. The world's greatest contralto sang "The Erlking" as it had never been sung here before. All in that big audience knew that they were participants in a memorable event, something to be cherished as long as life lasts, the perfect singing of Goethe's words and Schubert's music. The impression which the singer made was tremendous. After that first sound of applause silence settled over the thronged auditorium. The listeners felt that they were in the presence of one of life's greatest tragedies. They saw a father riding through the night and the storm with his young son clasped passionately to his breast. They knew that the boy was dying and that it was a ride for life through the bitter cold of the tempest to the shelter of home. They thrilled when the boy, with blanched face, whispered to his father that the dread Erlking, the wraith of the blizzard whose breath is death, stood before him in his crown and shroud and they ached with pity when the father assured the lad that what he saw was only a misty cloud. Then they heard the Erlking with a voice of infinite sweetness coaxing the child to his fatal embrace. The music rushed forward with the sound of hoofbeats, relentlessly beating toward doom, as the father, with breaking heart, repeated his assurances. The terrified voice of the child and the agonized words of the father gripped the heartstrings of that great audience. The soft alluring voice of the Erlking spoke again, breaking suddenly into cruel tones as the spectre seized his prey. That quick transition from melodious sweetness to violence of tone produced its intended effect of shocking the hearers. There was a shudder and following it, as the boy cried out in the agony of death, tears sprang to many eyes. No actor at the climax of a great drama could have swayed the emotions more surely than Schumann-Heink at that moment. The audience was bound by the spell of her voice and they responded to her singing so completely that they seemed bereft of will. There was no room in any mind for thoughts that did not deal exclusively with the plight of that child screaming in the grasp of the Erlking. The concluding stanza was eloquent of overwhelming sorrow. The tones were hushed in the presence of death and when the singer had uttered that last word of the sond, "todt," her body shook with grief and a great sob came from her lips. All the power that music has to stir, to send the blood tingling through the body, to arouse thoughts that lie in the deep of tears, to exhaust within a few moments the gamut of tragic emotions from terror to pity, was exerted when Madame Schumann-Heink sang "The Erlking."

The Lambardis at the Columbia

A brief season of grand opera given by the Lambardi company will open at the Columbia Theatre Sunday night, February 27. There will be a company of 147 people, including a symphony orchestra of fifty and a chorus of sixty trained singers and dancers. The special star this season is Madam Ester Adaberto who will be remembered as one of the great favorites of three seasons ago. Since that time she has appeared with the Metropolitan and won even greater success. Her voice and dramatic ability have improved until now she is said to be one of the greatest of dramatic sopranos. Her appearances here will be in "Aida," "Faust," and "Il Trovatore." Next in interest is the leading tenor, Attilio Maurini, direct from Mascagni's company in Italy. He is one of the superior tenors and is said to rank with Caruso and Constantino. His "Rodolfo" is one of the greatest interpretations ever given. Maurini will essay the roles of "Enzo" in "La Gioconda," "Faust" in the opera by that name, "Osaka" in Mascagni's music drama "Iris," and "Rodolfo" in "La Boheme." Impresario Lambardi claims that Giuseppe Maggi, a new addition to the company, is one of the greatest baritones in the world. He is a native of Italy, but has spent practically all his life in England where he sang at the Covent Garden. His greatest successes have been in "La Gioconda," "Faust," "Rigoletto," and "La Boheme." Madam Elvina Basetti, dramatic soprano, is said to have a great voice and a fine talent for acting. She will appear here in "La Gioconda," the second night of the opera season. "Iris," Mascagni's beautiful music drama, will receive its initial presentation in San Francisco on Tuesday night of next week. Music lovers have asked for this opera for many years, ever since it was presented at the Metropolitan in New York. The cast for "Iris" will include Signorita Marina Calvi, an ideal "Iris." She appeared in this opera in Italy and won great praise from Mascagni for her great interpretation of the character. Angelo Antola, a favorite baritone here, will portray "Kioto," one of the principal characters. Attilio Maurini, tenor, will sing "Osaka," and Vincenzo Viola, basso, will present the blind father of "Iris." Of the stars of last season but five remain this year. They are Madam Cecilia Tamanti Zavaski who will be remembered for her "Lucia," Angelo Antola, baritone, who sang "Tonio," in "Pagliacci," Alessandro Scalabrini, dramatic tenor, who sang the troubodor in "Il Trovatore," Madam Dolores Frau, famed for her "Carmen" and "Azucena" in "Il Trovatore," and Maestro Edoardo Lebegott, one of the directors. Two of the company this year have also appeared in San Francisco before. They are Maestro Cav. Fulgenzio Guerrieri, director, and Madam Ester Adaberto, dramatic soprano. In Antonio Sabellico impesario Lambardi claims to have one of the world's premier artists. He will make his appearance here in "La Gioconda" and "Faust." Two other bassos this year, Alceste Mori and Vincenzo Viola, are also highly praised. First among the operas to be given is "Iris." The opera will be given two presentations here, on Tuesday night and Saturday matinee of next week. "La Gioconda" has not been given here in some time. It is to be presented Monday night of next week. "Madam Butterfly," Puccini's greatest masterpiece, will be sung here for the first time in Italian Sunday night, the opening night of the season. It will be repeated on Thursday evening. For the Wednesday matinee "Lucia" will be offered, the only time it is to be given this year. "Aida" with Mme. Ester Adaberto as "Aida" and Madam Dolores Frau as "Amneris" will be offered on Wednesday night. "Faust" will be given Friday night. "Il Trovatore" is offered for Saturday night. "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," the double bill, will be given next Sunday matinee and "La Boheme" will close the grand opera season on Sunday night.

The Myrtle Elvyn Concerts

Myrtle Elvyn, a young American artist who has been making a great record both in this country and Europe as a piano virtuosa of the highest rank, will give three concerts at the Garrick Theatre in this city. She has prepared three offerings ranging from the old masters, Rameau and Corelli, down to the ultramodern Debussy, and no artist of twice the years has offered a more interesting or important list of works. Miss Elvyn's success with the leading symphony orchestras has been unusual and her appearance here is eagerly awaited by students, teachers and music lovers in general. At her first concert, Sunday, March 6, works by Bach, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Debussy, Schubert-Liszt, Erich Wolf and Liszt are to be given and a special feature will be Leschetizky's transcription of the popular "Lucia" sextette. At the second concert, Thursday night, March 10, Schumann's "Scenes of Childhood" will be given in their entirety and works by Bach-Tausig, Brahms, Chopin, MacDowell, Moszkowski, Wagner-Liszt and Schulz-Evler complete the list. For the Saturday matinee, March 12, a special program will include the Chopin "Sonata" in B flat minor (the one with the Funeral March), Schumann's "Tocata," Op. 7, Mendelssohn's "Prelude, Fugue and Choral" and works by Rameau, Corelli, Brahms, Scriabine, Dvorak, Schumann-Liszt, Schubert-Liszt, etc.

Edeson Coming to the Van Ness

At the Van Ness the comedy season is well on, and McIntyre and Heath are delighting big audiences with their sparkling show "In Hayti." Their second and last week starts next Monday night and runs up to and including a week from Sunday. The remaining matinees are this afternoon and next Saturday. Robert Edeson, well remembered by local theatregoers because of his famous impersonation of the picturesque Indian athlete hero in "Strongheart," will follow McIntyre and Heath at the Van Ness, appearing for the first time in three seasons. He is now starring in "A Man's a Man" by Anna Steele Richardon and Henry Leslie Friedenberg, and is said to have found in the central character of the play the most effective role of his entire career, while the play itself is said to be very strong.

"The Spoilers" at the Savoy

The last performances of Sir Gilbert Parker's wonderful tale of Canadian life, "The Right of Way," will be given at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the matinee Sunday another dramatized novel, "The Spoilers," will begin an engagement limited to one week. "The Spoilers," a melodrama of the frozen north, dramatized by Rex Beach from his own novel, has been pronounced by competent critics to be the best of all Alaskan plays and every effort has been made in the drama to preserve the intangible but pervasive Alaskan "atmosphere" which contributed so largely to the success of the book. At the head of an excellent cast is Miss Margaret Oswald, an actress of fine attainments and established Eastern reputation. Throughout the play a pretty love story is entwined with the exciting incidents of the plot and a large amount of good clean comedy is liberally interspersed. The customary bargain matinee will be given Thursday, with the final afternoon performance on Saturday and at the matinee Sunday, March 6, that ever welcome extravaganza, "The Gingerbread Man," bigger, better and brighter than ever, will begin a week's engagement.

The Second "Pop" Concert

The second of Will Greenbaum's "Pop" Concerts will be given this Sunday afternoon at Kohler and Chase Hall at 2:30 p. m. The program will include Edgar Stillman Kelly's "Quintette" for piano and strings with Mr. Frederick M. Biggerstaff at the piano, a beautiful Haydn "Quartette" in G major and a group of violincello solos by Corelli and Boccherini played by Miss Dorothy Pasmore with Miss Florence Nachtrieb as accompanist.

"Tess" at the Alcazar

"Tess of the D'Urbervilles," a dramatization of Thomas Hardy's famous novel, will be the Alcazar's next attraction, commencing Monday evening. It was first produced by Mrs. Fiske, and after serving her as a starring vehicle two seasons was adopted by Florence Roberts who last played in it in San Francisco about eight years ago, in the old California Theatre. As a medium of emotional expression the title role is one of the best ever constructed, as it affords opportunity for almost every phase of human passion. In the hands of Evelyn Vaughan it will surely be made impressive. In the cast will be the full strength of the company, with John Ince as Angel Clare, the husband of Tess, and Will R. Walling as Aleck D'Urberville, her betrayer. All the characters are English rural types, and each of the four acts has a picturesque setting, including a farmhouse interior, a dairy yard and the ruins of a Druid temple. The pictorial effects are both realistic and beautiful.

Clara Belle Jerome, assisted by William Seymour and her Eight Dancing Toodles, will appear in "Joyland," the latest effort of Gus Sohlke at the Orpheum next week. A very pretty stage setting lends effect to this act. Miss Jerome presents a fascinating appearance in a number of picturesque costumes and sings several catchy songs which are chorused by eight very attractive girls. She and Mr. Seymour also engage in duets and dances. Miss Jerome was the star for two seasons of Augustin Daly's "Runaway Girl" in which she covered herself with glory and scored a great hit with her famous Pickanniny Dance. Winona Winter, "The Little Cheer-Up Girl," will introduce her latest song successes and some very novel ventriloquial feats. She possesses a most captivating personality and is always a welcome visitor. George Felix and Lydia Barry, assisted by Miss Barry's sisters, Emily and Clara, will appear in "The Boy Next Door," which is said to be one of the funniest skits in vaudeville. Earle Reynolds and Nellie Donegan will introduce all the musical comedy dance hits of the season on roller skates. Next week will be the last of Charles W. Bowser and Edith Hinkle, the Reed Brothers, Fred Lindsay, the marvelous Australian Stock Whip Expert, and Walter C. Kelly, "The Virginia Judge." New motion pictures will close the show.

Attractions at the Macdonough

"The Right of Way," stirringly dramatized from Sir Gilbert Parker's most popular novel, will be presented at the Macdonough Theatre in Oakland at the Sunday matinee and on the evenings of Sunday, Monday and Tuesday, February 27 and 28 and March 1. The company is an excellent one and the play is staged in a manner fitting its strange and interesting atmosphere. "The Gingerbread Man," one of the most delightful comedy operas of recent years, will be at the Macdonough for the matinee and night of Friday, March 4 and the night of March 5. Starting Monday, March 7, McIntyre and Heath will play an engagement of one week at the same theatre with matinees on Saturday and Sunday. They will give "In Hayti," the very funny play with which they are making all San Francisco laugh at the present time.

Barrie's Comedy at Ye Liberty

In none of the plays in which she has starred from time to time is Maude Adams more fondly remembered than in "The Little Minister," the comedy which, more than anything else, helped to place her in the front rank of American actresses, and it is this play that has been selected by Manager Harry W. Bishop for revival by his stock company at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, for the week commencing next Monday evening. Many authors have written poems, stories and plays depicting Scottish life but none have drawn a more faithful picture than James M. Barrie in his charming book, "The Little Minister." It depicts life amongst both the high and lowly born, and throughout the work there is a human interest that never for one moment loses its grip on the heartstrings. As a play the story has been as successful as in its original book form and its attractiveness is such that people go time and time again to see it. In the Oakland revival next week Miss Blanche Hall will be seen as Lady Babbie and George Friend as the little minister, while all the other favorite players will appear in the supporting cast. After one week of the comedy, Martin V. Merle's drama of the early days of Christianity, "The Light Eternal," will be presented.

Grace George will play an engagement here in the near future, presenting her latest success, "A Woman's Way."

life. We now had nothing to fear on account of thirst; but the soil below was very sandy, the subterranean current very strong, and the opening was soon stopped up. It was necessary to line the well, and for that purpose we took to pieces a pillar of stones, which was in the corral. This not sufficing, we sunk half of a wine-barrel in the bottom. My comrade Alonso, with the rest of the available force, occupied himself meanwhile in filling up the doors and windows; the admirable warlike preparations of the enemy demanding no less on our part.

The following day (in the morning also, since the enemy did not come near us except under cover of darkness) we found a second message about ten paces from the church, and surely they had left it in a manner so strange as to give us rather an unpleasant shock. It was found placed in the hollow of a piece of bamboo, one end of which was stuck in the ground, while the other was covered with a banana leaf, for the purpose, no doubt, of keeping the rain from wetting its contents. Apparently they did not wish to give us an opportunity to call their messages mere "paper sops."

The second letter consisted merely of complaints because we did not reply to the first; which, they said, "was not complying with our obligations as gentlemen." Then they enlarged upon what they had already said in the first concerning the victorious progress of the insurrection, assuring us that they had mastered the greater number of the provinces of Luzon; that the capital itself, Manila, was besieged by 22,000 Tagalogs, who had succeeded in cutting off its water-supply; and that it was in imminent peril of succumbing to thirst unless it should capitulate.

They no doubt informed us of this situation in Manila because of the similar plight in which they thought they had placed us by cutting off the canal, thinking that our water-supply was limited and that we therefore were threatened with immediate deprivation of an element so necessary.

The reply of Las Morenas was suitable and conciliating. "Manila will not surrender for want of water," he told them, "while it is possible to utilize the water of the sea, which offers itself in abundance." He went on advising them that they ought not to be deluded; that they should return to the obedience they owed to Spain; and that he, their Politico-Military Governor, would receive them with open arms.

He finished by recommending that they leave no more letters in the vicinity of the church; that in order to send them they should sound the "attention"; and that if we should answer by the same signal, they should send a bearer with the message, but only one man, and with a white flag. He also pointed out the manner in which an answer would be returned to them. We would raise a white flag and sound the "attention," and they could then send someone to receive the answer.

It had been decided that we would not send any soldier, for fear that the deserters might catechise him or lure him away. One of those wretches, Filipe Herrero Lopez, who had been my servant, had the impudence to present himself to receive this answer. I went out myself to give it to him, and tried with the fairest words I could command to persuade him to return to his allegiance; but, seizing the message, he answered not a single word, and returned at a run to his companions, a camp, to him, of treachery and shame.

The same day, it having become impossible to go out of the church, on account of the constant firing kept up by the enemy, it was necessary to take up some flagstones in order to construct an oven in the corral, since we had no bread in store when we shut ourselves up in the church, and it was seventy-two hours since the last morsel was consumed.

The oven, with all the defects that can be well imagined, but useful for the immediate supply of so precious an article, was finished that afternoon. To facilitate the washing of the few articles of clothing that still remained to us (thanks to the honest inhabitants, who could not carry it all away), we sawed in two another empty wine-barrel, like the one sunk in the well, and thus provided ourselves with two fine wooden tubs. Two tin cans that had held Australian meat served as buckets to fill these tubs. We now needed only a better supply of clothing to make our washing arrangements more complete, since some of us had to go naked, or little less than naked, if we wished to indulge in the luxury of clean clothing.

While we omitted no precautions necessary to prolonged resistance, neither was the enemy wanting in diligence. Reduced to the narrow inclosure of that humble church, where nothing appeared more remote than divine worship, and where surely never was God more earnestly invoked and reverenced than in those days so bitter, we had to look on, day after day, without power to prevent it, while the trenches of the siege were stretching out, belting about and shutting us in, forming something very like the web that the spider so skillfully weaves to make secure against the writhings and attempts to escape of his victim.

We could not neutralize those labors because the numerical superiority of the enemy was great, and any attempt on our part would have caused useless loss, a disaster, material and moral, which we could not afford to risk.

Neither was the enemy exposing himself while constructing the approaches. He very well knew the danger of exposure and took advantage of the cover afforded by the darkness of the night. We were on the alert to fire toward the point where we heard a noise, but the sound of the waves of the near-by sea helped also to protect the enemy. Thus they were able to bring their trenches to within fifty paces of us at some points, and even within twenty paces at others, tracing a line, rather irregular, but covered and protected at various points by the houses nearest the church.

In approaching the latter at the points that seemed to be the most vulnerable they leveled some of those habitations, transforming them into regular field-works, which gave excellent protection against our projectiles and from which they could annoy us at will, thanks to a kind of parapet that they raised in each one, the parapet being loopholed and perfectly disposed and revetted.

Up to the present I had been obliged to record more than one instance of that most infamous and detestable crime that a soldier can commit—desertion. As a contrast to such cowardly acts, it is now a pleasure to record a deed of self-abnegation and heroism worthy of encomium, by a most modest individual, Gregorio Catalan Valero. It is the first of those made memorable by the siege and it is, as well, among those that deserve special mention.

Little was wanting now to the completion of that girdle of trenches, and we saw that, to obtain a strong support, they were directing it towards the barracks of the Guardia Civil, situated less than fifteen paces from the church, near the north-east corner. From there it was plain that they could do us much damage because of the proximity and condition of the building, and of the command it gave them against us.

It was necessary to destroy it at all hazard, and Gregorio did it with a serenity and boldness truly admirable. He dashed out of the church, and under a heavy fire kindled not only the barracks but also the school buildings, and with such skill and deliberation that they were completely destroyed, in spite of the swarm of Insurrectos who, although so numerous, did not dare to defy our bullets and expose themselves openly to prevent the realization of that undertaking.

As our soldier needs only an example, the initiative, for him to go wherever we will lead him, a few days later another boy, Manuel Navarro Leon, a victim later of the epidemic that we suffered, succeeded in setting fire to another near-by house, from which the enemy had been firing at us.

This display of stubborn resistance, united to our constant vigilance, which we showed in taking advantage of any carelessness on the enemy's side and not allowing him to show himself with impunity, caused the enemy, naturally, to become impatient; with the result that it was not long before we noticed that he was preparing to make an assault.

Meanwhile we also made suitable preparations, filling in the lower half of each door and covering the upper half with bundles of blankets or boxes filled with earth. The windows were treated in the same way, so that no one could enter that way, and loopholes were made.

In order that we might get out should any reason for doing so offer itself, we left a small opening in the door in the east wall of the church. We were thus locked in so tightly that only one terrible intruder could make his way into our refuge, his way becoming, for this same reason, every moment more easy: Death.

On the 8th of July the leader, Cirilo Gomez Ortiz, sent us a letter, asking for a suspension of hostilities, in order that the people might have a rest from continual fighting. The man affected the generous role; and, saying that he had learned from deserters that we were suffering in the matter of subsistence, he offered us whatever we might need, and proposed that we send two unarmed men for it. As an earnest of the offer, he sent with the letter a small box of cigarettes for the Captain and a trifle for each of the soldiers.

The suspension was agreed upon (and nobody needed it more than we did) until nightfall, at which time it was agreed that the firing might begin again. We thanked Ortiz for his kind offer, and informed him that we had an abundance of all kinds of provisions; and, in return for his civilities, sent him a bottle of sherry, in order that he might drink our health, and a handful of regalias.

At the time agreed upon hostilities were renewed, and were not again interrupted during the whole siege.

Those people resorted to every kind of expedient to accomplish our surrender. Seeing that the news of their victories throughout the island had no effect upon us, they tried to intimidate us with the network of trenches they had drawn around us; they then resorted, as just related, to polite offers; and, not gaining anything by this, they tried to alarm us by a theatrical arrangement of trumpets, which, by sounding and repeating calls at various distances, were intended to indicate the presence of a very large force. This is a device which has been recorded in the military history of more than one campaign, and which did not succeed in its object.

They also added the most tremendous threats and (it is painful to record it) the vile impudence of a pack of traitors from our own army, who continually cried out that we had deceived the Detachment, that we were going to cause its ruin, that we were lost, and so on to the same effect; calling to the soldiers also that they should escape, that they should not persist in their folly, that they would only miserably perish in the church, that (leaving the officers to defend themselves if they wished) they should save their own lives, that they would be well treated, and that they would gain every advantage by deserting to the enemy's camp. Against this fire of words, strong walls and loopholes were, on the whole, useless; there was nothing for it but constant vigilance.

On the 18th a private, Julian Galvete Iturmendi, was severely wounded, and died on the 31st, in consequence of the wound. The Christian duties we owed to his remains necessitated the devotion of that enclosure to one more sad purpose—that of a cemetery.

talk glided little by little from a question of art into out-and-out slander, I couldn't satisfy your curiosity. You know how it happens. One word draws out another. The starting point is plain enough, but no one can forsee the end. They were speaking of a recent scandal affecting a family moving in the highest circles; one of the usual domestic dramas, the husband suddenly having his eyes opened, the wife deserting the conjugal roof, in order to follow her lover. It was Vialli who exclaimed, in reference to the lover: 'Poor Geppino, what a load to be saddled with! Such affairs seem at first like paradise, just as it seemed like paradise to Sapho's lover to carry her up stairs in his arms. But on reaching the top, he was ready to die from weariness.' I have forgotten who rejoined, 'If you create a situation like that, you must face the consequences.' 'I am not denying it,' Vialli replied slowly, while he considered whether his better shot was to aim for the white ball or the red: 'I am not denying it, but doing one's duty is not always a joyous matter.' Then, missing his carom: 'To the devil with duty. The really lucky man is the one who knows how to break off in season.' Ansaldi also missed his shot. 'Now for my revenge,' said Vialli; then, irritated by a second failure, he exclaimed: 'For a man to get his freedom as Augusto Stechi did from Von Bauern's wife, is a piece of luck that does not happen every day.'

"My friends, I do not know how to tell you all that I felt at that moment. What was it Vialli meant to say? Von Bauern's wife? Or had I misunderstood? He had barely uttered that name, when my eyes automatically sought the portiere behind which I had earlier seen the count. He was still there, quite hidden except for his eyes; but those eyes gleamed as though they were made of phosphorus. Were the others aware, as I was, of his presence? Why did no one stir? Why did not I myself spring up on the instant, crying out to the blunderer: 'Silence, you idiot! Don't you see that he can hear you?'

"There are moments when a tragic fatality seems to weigh us down; moments when we perceive clearly all that is happening around us, and yet feel, as in a nightmare, the absolute impossibility of raising a finger to stay the course of events. At present I can say all this; but at the time I could not even think the smallest part of it. 'Augusto Stecchi,' Vialli continued, throwing down his cue, 'was a very lucky man to be set free from her—'

"Ah, what a scene, what a horrible scene! He had not finished speaking, when the floor rang under a tread that made everyone in that small gathering turn around, and Count Von Bauern, like a fantastic spectre, advanced upon Vialli. Not one of us moved. I, for my part, fairly held my breath. When the count had come close to the billiardists, he said in a voice like strident ice—if you will let the phrase pass—that rings in my ears even yet: 'You are a liar and a coward!' Like the recoil of a spring Vialli turned on him, with raised cue, but the count, in a flash, had snatched it from his hold, hurling the man backward with a blow on the chest, and broke the strong rod across his knee as though it had been straw.

"Blind with rage, Vialli was on the point of flinging himself upon the other; but it had gone too far. The dread that had held us spellbound, passed away. A dozen, a score of men, sprang between them, I among the rest; and finding myself beside the count, I drew him away, into another room.

"He had shown admirable courage and self-control. Even now, not a tremor betrayed the frightful emotion that he must have passed through. Everyone agreed in condemning Vialli. To calumniate a lady, against whom no one had ever heard a word uttered; to defame the memory of a dead woman without the least possible excuse, and in such a place, before so many people, was too great a folly, almost a crime. 'I know that I was in the wrong,' he himself exclaimed, in the adjoining room, 'but I do not propose to accept insults tamely.' The result was that, being unable to induce any of those present to serve him as seconds, he was forced to seek them from outside.

"The count, for his part, begged me with a calm courtesy all the more remarkable at such a time, to give him my services for the occasion, referring me to the Baron Narconi as his other witness. 'Accept any conditions,' he said; 'my only wish is to have an early meeting. Not later than tomorrow, if possible,' and with these words he left me.

"A few minutes later, the other returned with his seconds. I hoped to arrange matters with the fewest possible words; but such a second as Vialli's friend, Mendoza, had not entered into my calculations. A lawyer trying a case, a diplomat negotiating a treaty could not be more argumentative, more hair-splitting, more punctilious, more insistent upon form than he was. In my scant experience of such matters I had supposed that there was small room for discussion. Yet I found that the nature of the insults; the circumstances under which they had been offered; which insult was of the more serious nature; which of the principals had the right to name conditions; and what the conditions themselves should be—each and all of these questions must be debated at great length. I forsaw that in being opposed to a man like Mendoza I had my work upon the field of honor cut out for me in advance. As good luck would have it, we finally agreed that the meeting, with swords, at the discretion of the physicians, should take place the next day, at eight o'clock in the morning.

"That same evening I left a note with the count's doorkeeper, and in the morning at seven, I called at his home, accompanied by the Baron Narconi. We were shown into his study, while a servant went to announce us. We waited, and we waited; no one came. We kept looking at each other, not knowing what to think. A clock in the neighborhood struck the first quarter after seven; and still no one came. It is hard to give you an idea of the embarrassment in which this extraordinary state of things placed us.

"We were finally driven to do something definite; I reached for the button of the electric bell and rang it. The same servant reappeared. 'Did you tell the count that we were here?' 'Yes, sir, I told him at once.' 'Is the count dressed yet?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Then speak to him again, and say that there is no time to lose.'

"A few minutes later the door opened and the count appeared. He came forward slowly; and in a ceremonious tone, as though speaking to strangers, asked us: 'In what way can I serve you, gentlemen?' I will not waste time trying to give you an idea of our stupefaction—something more than stupefaction, for it already verged upon contempt. 'Pardon me,' I said, 'but I wrote you last night that the meeting was arranged for this morning, at eight.' 'Ah!' he rejoined, and he seemed to descend from the clouds. He still wore the same clothes as the night before, the same rumpled shirt; it was evident that he had kept them on all night. 'Everything is ready,' the baron told him, 'and it is now half past seven.' The count passed his hand across his brow: 'Well, do we need to go?' Imagine our sensations!

"In the carriage no one spoke a word. The count gazed out at the flitting panorama, but his right arm was trembling where it lay, thrust into the breast of his coat. I began to feel a lively anxiety. What had gone before made me fear that worse was yet to come, after we should reach the duelling grounds, especially in view of the fact that we had to deal with the redoubtable Mendoza. My principal was afraid to fight; that was the conviction that had been borne in upon me, in spite of the dramatic scene we had witnessed the night before. He was likely to make us ridiculous, as well as himself; and I for one was prepared to go any length, sooner than give Mendoza a chance to laugh behind my back.

"We reached our goal. It was a princely villa, within the court of which, sheltered from prying eyes, the encounter was to take place. The encounter! But Count Von Bauern seemed to be in a mood for anything else on earth sooner than fighting. He was gazing off into the distance, holding his head between his hands, plucking the leaves from the shrubs—and shivering.

"Notwithstanding the time we had lost, we were the first on the grounds. We heard a carriage drive up; our doctor had come. A few minutes later the others all arrived. After greeting them I turned to look for the count. He had disappeared! He had passed beyond the limits of the court, and was leaning against the iron railing, down in one corner of the garden. I went up to him and led him back, saying with an emphasis that seemed to me only too well justified: 'I hope, count, that you are not going to lose your presence of mind.' The others also came forward. Then, as Count Von Bauern's glance fell upon Vialli, he burst into a peal of laughter—"

"The duel is over!" suddenly interrupted Monterani. "There is Villardi, calling the carriage," and he rose to go out for further information, followed by the protests of all the others, who had forgotten, in their interest in the story, the original purpose that had drawn them together.

"Go on, you were saying—?"

"That all of a sudden, at the sight of Vialli, my principal burst out laughing. To convey the impression which that peal of laughter made among us all is impossible; an unforseen clap of thunder from a clear sky could have produced nothing like it. But a ray like a lightning flash suddenly illumined my mind, and I sprang forward toward the count. Our doctor had, however, forestalled me. Stopping me with a gesture, and pointing to the count's disordered features, his twitching eyelids, his lips mumbling meaningless words, he said decisively: 'This duel is impossible. The gentleman is not in possession of his mental faculties!' And suddenly, as if in confirmation of this opinion, the count violently tore away his clothes, fumbling with one hand in his breast. He was quite mad—"

"Ah, from fear?" interrupted the lawyer.

"No," answered Baldassare Gargano.

"From what, then?"

"You want to know why the Count Von Bauern had gone mad? Because the assertion Vialli had made in the billiard room was true; because Augusto Stecchi had really been the lover of the countess—"

"What!" exclaimed everyone.

"It seems impossible, doesn't it? Yet such was the case. Returning home that evening, with the terrible words still ringing in his ears, how must the count have felt? What gnawing suspicion had made its way into his brain? Through what insensible degrees, or by what rapid transition, did the indignation roused by the vile calumny give place to torturing doubt? What proofs, what clues, what memories rose up in his mind and took definite form? No one can ever tell. We may know only the facts; and the known facts are these: that, for the first time since the death of his wife, the count that evening entered the room formerly occupied by the dead woman, the room which had been reverently kept in precisely the same state in which she had left it. No one followed him into that room; but when we called the next morning, the servant found his master there. In that room, hidden in a tiny closet, the key to which was usually kept in the countess' workbasket, the count found the letters Augusto had written to his wife. Hundreds of letters, palpable proofs—the most eloquent, most irrefutable of proofs!—of all that Vialli had asserted. Their relations, interrupted by death, had lasted for more than two years; and no one, or almost no one, had suspected it. And the widower had dedicated himself, body and soul, to the memory of that idolized wife!

"In the tragic scene I have just related, there was one farcical note. What do you suppose it was? Why, after the doctor rendered his decision, Mendoza exclaimed, gazing helplessly around: 'This is a case without a precedent!' I shall never forget the air of wonder, bewilderment, curiosity, indignation, incredulity that spread over his face, in the presence of that mad laughter and the physician's verdict. 'A case without a precedent!' A faith destroyed, a shattered intellect, a terrible drama played to the end in a human soul, were all reduced, in the opinion of that gentleman, to a case without precedent in the jurisprudence of chivalry. Evidently there was a gap in his code. Why don't they prepare a special article telling what is to be done when one of the combatants loses his mind on the field of honor? And what different consequences result, according to whether the one losing his mind is the offending party or the offended? And what is to be regarded as conclusive proof of such loss of mind?"

"You are quite right!" exclaimed the lawyer. "The truth is," he added, rising, by way of having the last word, "the truth is that we are all more or less insane, everyone of us."

CHARTREUX STILL MADE IN SPAIN

There appeared recently in some of the American dailies an article stating that the Carthusian Monks, celebrated for the manufacture of the genuine Chartreuse, also known as Liqueur Peres Chartreux, were anticipating moving from Spain to Austria. This rumor is now officially denied by Batjer & Co., 45 Broadway, New York City, who are the American agents of the Monks.

Auto Notes

M. Getz who recently purchased an Oakland car, is rapidly becoming an expert driver. He was never at the wheel of an automobile until he bought his Oakland car, and says he has found it easy to learn.

S. G. Chapman, coast distributor for the Oakland, reports that several carloads of that machine are on the way here and will be ready for delivery by the middle of next week.

One of the most completely equipped cars ever delivered in this city is the little Hupmobile roadster sold by S. G. Chapman to W. G. Henshaw for the use of his daughter Florence who will drive it herself. The little car is equipped with every convenience which makes for comfort and luxury. In fact the small roadster is as completely fitted with all of the accessories that make touring a delight as the most expensive machine on the market.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of The Diamond Rubber Co., is just in receipt of advices from his factory giving the tire count at the recent Chicago Automobile Show. The results more than bear out the claim of "eleventh year of supremacy" in that Diamond Tires were shown on 112 cars, being 86 percent more than the next nearest competitor and 211 per cent and 229 per cent more than the third and fourth best. Sixteen makes of tires were shown.

On the 14th inst. the Sacramento Polic Department placed an order with Thomas B. Jeffery & Company for a Police Patrol Ambulance. A letter from L. B. Harvey, representative of Thomas B. Jeffery & Company at Sacramento, reads as follows: "In reference to the Police Patrol Ambulance, I am enclosing herewith copy of the specifications in my bid. It is a great victory for us, as there was a strong pull for the ———— people, who have been established many years in this city. They had two separate bids covering two classes of cars and prices. I attended the trustees' meeting last night with the balance of those who had in their bids, and had the great satisfaction of hearing the report of the committee read in the presence of a full house, to the effect that after careful deliberation and after careful examination of the different cars represented by the bidders, and after talking with people who were using these different cars, the committee would report to the Board of Trustees that the Rambler car seemed to be the most fitted as a car of service and for heavy duty of any offered. Therefore, they recommended that the bid of Thomas B. Jeffery & Company be accepted, and the vote of acceptance was unanimous. I, therefore, got up with a smile on my face, went home and to bed happy, leaving the other fellows nursing their disappointment."

The world's record for rapid sales of automobiles to individual buyers was established at the Ninth Annual Chicago Show when Thomas B. Jeffery & Company, makers of the Rambler, sold one hundred and seventy-five separate cars in seven days, making a total of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars worth of automobiles. Charles T. Jeffery, head of the Rambler company, under whose direction this enormous sales record was made, says that the greatest sales of cars during the next five years will be made over that area stretching between the copper country and the southern rim of the Texas panhandle. Hundreds of farmers, stockmen and fruit growers bought cars at the Chicago show. The demand was not for the low priced car, as many had anticipated, but the buyers seemed to desire power, comfort and quality more than cheapness. The average price of the cars attaining the largest sales was two thousand dollars. Last year the Rambler broke all previous show sales records when 160 of these cars were sold at an average pr ce of $1900 each.

If the Pioneer Company is asked the usual sterotyped question about the status of business the questioner will be shown figures for the past five weeks' sales that will make him gasp. In round numbers the figures show that the big automobile house has sold and delivered to customers machines to the total value of $136,700. Of this sum $121,200 represented the sale of absolutely new cars, while $19,500 was for second hand machines left with the Pioneer Company to be sold for customers. This is the largest volume of business done by the company in an equal period of time since its organization, and it is probably the most extensive sale record ever made in the same time by any automobile firm on this coast. This business was not occasioned by a big order from an outside agent but the cars were well distributed all over the State. They consisted of Chalmers, Hudsons, Thomas Flyers and Babcock Electrics with the first named in the lead and with the others following in the order of their names. Following are the cars sold and their purchasers: Hudsons—Louis Newroth, W. L. Allen, R. A. Ratto, G. F. Ratto, Dr. P. M. Burns, G. L. Lodi, W. H. Hecht, Ira T. Wellman of San Francisco; R. R. Bray, San Jose; George F. Dunne, Stockton; Consolidated Canal Co., Fred M. Cowse, William Black, Fresno; O. Klemmer, Dr. Strand, Willows; Louis Zumwaldt, Williams; A. C. Zacherais, Modesto; S. M. Phillips, Sacramento; S. M. Simpson, Oroville Auto Co., Oroville; Rayford Peterson, Santa Rosa. Chalmers-Detroit "30's"—Miss Jane Hotaling, Frank Fries, Dr. F. Parsons, Dr. L. P. Howe, Dr. Cooper, Hibernia Bank, W. F. Hovey, Arthur Connreich, Dr. P. M. Burns, Wm. Kolb (Kolb & Dill), Fred Durner (2), Frank Delano, Mrs. A. L. Bryant, Mahoney Bros., of San Francisco; Rolla Leppo, Dr. Clark, Santa Rosa; D. C. McCabe, J. T. Hill, Mrs. F. A. Smiles, L. T. Dacha, Oakland; Bert Dingley, F. Cressy, A. T. Zacharais, Modesto; J. L. Whitmore, Central Auto Co., M. F. Granger, Stockton; S. M. Phillips, Sacramento, carload. Chalmers-Detroit "40's"—E. Riley, Wm. R. Daly, Dr. X. Sullivan, Fred F. Murphy, James L. Mills, of San Francisco; Central Auto Co., Stockton; A. Hexter, Marysville; Cudahy Packing Co., Fresno; Phillip Clay, San Francisco. Thomas Flyers—A. C. Brooks, Wiley B. Allen, of San Francisco; C. F. Horner, Centerville; Joseph R. Ratt, Oakland; Bert Dingley, Modesto. Babcock Electricts—Mrs. R. Holman, San Mateo; Mrs. Josephine Ford, Burlingame.

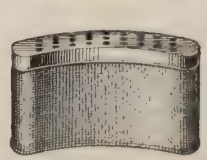
HAVE YOU HEARD ABOUT THE WELKOM WARMER?

Endorsed by the medical profession and hospital authorities as the only modern and sensible substitute for the Hot Water Bottle.



Size 3¼ x 5½ inches; weight four and one half ounces.

NO WATER TO HEAT, NO RUBBER TO ROT,

causing the bag to burst and scald the patient.

The WELKOM WARMER is made of metal, and is heated within one minute by the lighting and insertion of a paper tube containing a bi ze-less, smokeless and odorless fuel generating a heat of uniform temperature which lasts two hours at a cost of less than one cent. It is curved to fit any portion of the body and when in use is placed in a bag to modify the heat and held in place by means of a belt allowing the wearer to move about at will.

As a pain killer the WELKOM WARMER has no equal as it can be put into action instantly, thus avoiding heating water and waiting for the kettle to boil.

Complete outfit including Warmer, bag, belt, box and 10 tubes of fuel sent prepaid to any part of the United States upon receipt of $2.00.

Write to-day for descriptive booklet.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,115, Department No. 4.

In the Matter of the Application of JOSEPH KASIMER JANKOWSKY to Change Name.

It appearing from the written application filed in the above entitled Court on the 17th day of February, 1910, by the above named Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky praying for an order that he be permitted to change his present name, to-wit: Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky to that of Joseph Kasimer John, and that he is a resident of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California: and,

Good cause appearing to me therefore, it is ordered that all persons interested in the above entitled matter are hereby directed to be and appear before the above entitled Court in Department No. 4 thereof at its Courtroom in the Grant Building at the Southeast Corner of Seventh and Market Streets, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of April, 1910, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. and then and there show cause if any they have why the application of Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky for change of his name to Joseph Kasimer John should not be granted.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order to show cause be published for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which the above Court finds to be the one most likely to give notice to the parties interested in the hearing of said petition and the granting thereof.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED TO THE EXECUTOR FOR THE SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5260, Dept. No. 10.

In the matter of the Estate of TERESA MURPHY, Deceased.

Valentine J. Smyth, as the Executor of the Last Will and Testament of TERESA MURPHY, deceased, having this day presented to this Court a verified petition praying for an Order authorizing and directing him to sell, as a whole or in parcels, and at either public or private sale, the real property and the whole thereof belonging to the Estate of said decedent, which is in said petition particularly described, and it appearing to this Court, from such petition, that it is necessary to sell the real estate and the whole thereof belonging to said estate for the purpose of paying the debts against said estate and the expenses and charges of administration, and it also appearing from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate, and those interested therein, to sell the said real estate and the whole thereof, for the purposes and reasons set forth in said petition; and this Court having thereupon and now and here directed that said petition be filed herein, and the same now having been filed accordingly, and being now on file herein:

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court at the Courtroom of Department Number 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, at the Southeast Corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Tuesday, the 15th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said executor for the sale of the real estate, and for the sale of the whole thereof, and for the sale of the same at either public or private sale, as said Executor shall judge to be most beneficial for the said Estate.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published once a week for four (4) successive weeks prior to the said 15th day of March, 1910, in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 7th day of February, 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 26,821.

HARDA ZOIE, Plaintiff, vs.
NICHOLAS ZOIE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Nicholas Zoie, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and abandonment of the plaintiff without any sufficient cause or reason and on the further ground of defendant's wilful failure and neglect to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life while having the ability so to do; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1909.

(Seal) ....., Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 19,122.

ANGELO SBRAGIA, Plaintiff,
vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described, or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of ANGELO SBRAGIA, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Sacramento Street, distant thereon sixty-two (62) feet and six (6) inches Westerly from the Westerly line of Locust Street, running thence Westerly and along said Southerly line of Sacramento Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Southerly one hundred (100) feet; thence at right angles Easterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles Northerly one hundred (100) feet to the Southerly line of Sacramento Street and the point of commencement.

Being a portion of Western Addition Block number eight hundred thirty-two (832).

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the Complaint, to-wit: For judgment establishing and quieting said plaintiff's title to all said real property as the owner thereof in fee simple, and determining all adverse claims thereto, and ascertaining and determining all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property and every part thereof, and for such other and further relief as may be just and proper in the premises, under and pursuant to the provisions of the Act of the Legislature of California entitled, "An Act to provide for the establishment and quieting of title to real property in case of loss and destruction of public records," approved June 16, 1906.

Witness my hand and the Seal of said Court this 11th day of November, A. D. 1909. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk

The New Minister—Do you know who I am, my little man? Little Billie—Don't you know who you are?

Sayings of the Children

A Philadelphia teacher recently gave a class of boys ranging from ten to twelve years some written exercise in false syntax, and this sentence, among a number of others, was given for correction: "The horse and cow is in the field." One lad of twelve corrected it to read: The cow and horse is in the field; and appended this as his reason: "It is more polite to put ladies first."

The teacher of one of the Lane Co., Pennsylvania, public schools had before him a class of small children in subtraction. All answered their questions quickly and correctly until the foot of the class was reached. "Sallie, what is 8 minus 6?" Sallie could not answer, which was nothing unusual. Whereupon the teacher, thinking it might aid her by stating it less abstractly, said: "Now, Sallie, if your mamma went to the barn and found 8 eggs and used 6 of of them to bake a cake, what would she have left?" With a smile of contempt, Sallie answered, "Why, shells!"

In a Catholic Sunday-school the class was under question in the sacraments, and to a question as to the necessity of Confirmation, the child answered that Confirmation was not necessary to salvation, but should a favorable opportunity offer, it would be sinful to neglect it. The sacrament of Matrimony was taken up, and a seven-year-old startled her teacher when replying to a question as to the necessity for this sacrament by answering: "No, Matrimony is not necessary to salvation, but should a favorable opportunity afford, it would be sinful to neglect it."

One evening little Lucy knelt to lisp her evening prayer. Her little heart was bursting with self satisfaction—she had been so exemplary all through the day. "O Lord," she said, "make me very good, even better than I am."

A quaint little four-year-old, whose life had been wholly spent in the city, when finally given a sight of country life, with its many mysteries, gave vent to the limit of childish enthusiasm. Cattle interested her especially, and when told the method employed in producing milk, nothing served to satisfy her until she might see the operation. Returning from the farm, she rushed to her mother, with cheeks aglow, and eyes shining. Her voice quite shook with excitement. "Oh, mamma! it was such fun; the cow stood still he did, and the man took hold of his tassels, much as four, and got a whole quart of milk!"

Dorothy has been very carefully trained by her mother in the proper use of words and their correct pronunciation, but some of Dorothy's playmates and acquaintances are not quite so well instructed. The consequences are sometimes rather harassing to her mother. Not long since the young lady went to her mamma with pencil and paper, and said: "Mamma, won't you please show me how to make a figger eight?" "Why, Dorothy dear, you mustn't say 'figger,' say figure." Dorothy thought deeply for several minutes, then asked: "Must I say nigure, too, mamma?"

Teacher—Willie, what's the masculine of laundress? Willie—Chinaman!

Papa—Well, dear, the doctor has brought neighbor Jones a dear little baby. Wee Daughter—I wish my papa was a doctor. (Later, and reflectively), I wish he was a horse doctor, then he could bring me a pony.

Mother—Georgie, I told you to say "No" if they offered you cake a third time. Georgie—So I did, mamma. Only they offered it to me the fourth time, and you didn't say anything about the fourth time.

A little girl was sitting on the floor when the sun shone in her face. "Go 'way! go 'way!" she cried, striking out at it. "You move, dear, and it won't trouble you," said her mamma. "I s'ant! I dot here first," was the injured response.

"Here," said Benny's papa, showing the little fellow a coin, "is a penny 300 years old. It was given to me when I was a boy." "Gee whiz!" ejaculated Benny; "just think of anyone being able to keep a penny as long as that without spending it!"

"You must keep your mouth shut when you are in the water," said mamma, as she gave Annie a bath, "else you'll swallow some of it." "What if I do? There's plenty more in the pipes, isn't there?" said Annie, innocently.

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys, FREE
Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, etc. Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.
Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?
I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.
It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

Let Us Be Grateful

Instead of reprobating Secretary Ballinger for citing us to appear and show cause why the permit to impound the waters of Hetch-Hetchy Valley should not be revoked perhaps we should be grateful to him for calling our attention to the imperfect judgment of our engineers. Town Talk has never been enthusiastic about the Hetch-Hetchy water project because of an overpowering disposition to regard with feelings of mistrust the engineers and politicians by whom it has been undertaken. Besides being conscious of the tendency of municipalities in general and ours in particular to employ mediocre talent for all kinds of public service, we were of the opinion that nothing could be found in the record of Engineer Manson to inspire us with confidence in his ability. Now, according to men of unquestioned ability, the Hetch-Hetchy Valley is not at all essential to our purposes. There is water sufficient for us and for adjacent communities in the Lake Eleanor region. Hence we have been wasting money in the acquisition of water rights, and were it not for the information supplied by Secretary Ballinger's experts more money would be wasted in the course of time. So instead of waxing indignant we should be calling a halt. The only persons to whom a show of indignation is of any benefit at this time are the gentlemen whose blunders have been exposed. A little public indignation worked up by their accomplices of the demagogic press will serve to lower the intensity of their humiliation.

The Wilson Boom

President Woodrow Wilson of Princeton University is getting a lot of good advertising out of Mr. Proctor's withdrawal of an offer to Princeton University of $500,000. It is intimated that the offer was withdrawn because the purpose of the Proctor gift was in conflict with President Wilson's policy to abate in the university a tendency to luxury and social distinctions. President Wilson is of course heartily applauded for his devotion to his ideals, a devotion that vindicates the solidity of his democratic principles. It is but a coincidence of course that President Wilson has been commended to the Democracy as an ideal candidate for President. Men who affect a profound interest in the future of the Democracy and who are convinced that current phenomena augur well for the party that has suffered so long and patiently from the Bryan obsession, are now trying to create enthusiasm for the man who enjoyed the esteem and confidence of Grover Cleveland. The Democracy, unfortunately, is hardly to be considered sufficiently convalescent to retain on its stomach anything that is not leavened with the principles of populism and socialism. Besides President Wilson has written "A History of the American People," and there are five volumes of it, out of which any man may pick sentiments absolutely fatal to any kind of political ambition.

A Sweet-Tempered Soldier

Colonel James Gordon, ex-Confederate soldier, about to return to private life delivered his first, last and only speech in the Senate of the United States last week. The old soldier was in a sprightly mood, and his farewell address sparkled with humorous observations. The newspaper correspondents, moved to laughter, thought it was one of the funniest speeches they ever heard. The Washington correspondents are evidently a prosaic lot. To describe Colonel Gordon's playful speech as funny is to convict oneself of obtuseness. Through that speech there ran an undertone of kindly sentiment, touching, elevating and ennobling. A man may moralize without sacerdotal posing or sanctimonious attitudinizing; he may inculcate noble precepts without being solemn, without excess of emphasis or ever-solemnity. This is what the Mississippi veteran did on the floor of the Senate, yet he evoked no sympathetic vibration in the hearts of his hearers. Colonel Gordon concluded his speech in these words:

"I love everybody. I am a happy man. I never let hate get into my heart so as to make me unhappy. That is the reason I have lived and kept young and retained my youth and beauty, while you have gotten old and ugly, some of you."

These are the words of a man full of years who has borne the burden and heat of the day and who can lie down to pleasant dreams. They are the words of a man who has the essence of gentlemanliness—self-rule and sovereignty of the soul. They are words that breathe a sentiment that all of us should take to our hearts. In this day and generation there is too much of hatred in the world and too little of love. How much better would it be for all of us were we to banish hatred from our heart! How much better off would the world be were we incapable of hating anything but hypocrisy, cant, intolerance, injustice and Pharisaism, and able to hate them as Christ hated them with a profound God-like hatred! The passion of hatred indulged at the expense of men is the vice and torment of narrow souls. It does more harm to the person that indulges it than to its object. No man can do greater injustice to himself than to harbor hatred. Aside from the fact that it is one of the most enervating emotions, it leads to troublesome personal warfare, to hostility that breeds reprisals and almost inevitably to vain regret. For selfish reasons, therefore, it for no other, it is advisable to avoid the corroding luxury of hatred. "If I wanted to punish an enemy," said a philosopher whose name we have forgotten, "it should be by fastening on him the trouble of constantly hating somebody." The shrewdness of this observation we can all perceive if we but reflect on the experience of men whom we have known, who went through life indulging the passion of hatred and in the pursuit of revenge doing injustice to their enemies and incurring the penalty of bitter retribution. Not for them is the serenity that adorns the visage of old age, the soothing retrospect that comforts Colonel Gordon in his declining years. How refreshing and edifying it is to ponder the kindly sentiments of this frosty-headed soldier, bubbling over with sympathy, humanity and love, free from all antipathy except to current prejudice!

Hearne's Recantation

Persons whose impressions of Japan have been derived chiefly from Lafcadio Hearne will be amazed to learn that he abominated the Japanese. Hearne wrote books for the glorification of the Japanese, and he led many people in this country to regard them with admiration. According to Hearne, in his books, if the tastes of the Japanese were not epic, if their morals were different from ours, there was much poetry in their souls and little malice in their hearts, and they followed their bent rather from simplicity than wilfulness. But notwithstanding their many engaging qualities the Japanese did not wear well with Hearne. This we learn from a letter written to Professor Chamberlain which has been published in the Atlantic. From this letter we quote:

"The finale of my long correspondence with you on Japanese character is frankly this (I know it is unjust; I know it is small. But I suppose it is natural,—and I am not superior to nature,—besides I see no reason why I should not be in all things frank with you):

"I hate and detest the Japanese.

"I refused even to attend a banquet given by a European merchant the other day because there were Japanese present. I wish to make no more Japanese acquaintances. I shall never again be interested in any Japanese of the educated generation. I shall never even receive any of my former pupils. I simply abominate the Japanese.

"There's a nice confession for the author of 'Glimpses of Unfamiliar Japan' to make. But remember—the book was finished a long time ago; and the illusion had not worn off. I should not like now to trust myself to say what I think of the Japanese in their relation to us. I fear the missionaries are right who declare them without honor, without gratitude, and without brains.

"D——n the Japanese!

"Excepting, of course, the women of Japan who are—well, who are not Japanese. They remain angels. Sufficient for this day is the evil thereof."

Commenting on this letter William Marion Reedy of the St. Louis Mirror says: "Certainly, in view of Hearne's failure to love the Japanese, we can judge the more justly of some of our friends on the Pacific Coast who, while universally democratic in their ideas generally, are positively rabid against the Asiatics." Lafcadio Hearne's letter no doubt will give other thinkers pause, and mayhap incline them to restrain their impulse to dogmatize about matters of which they have but little knowledge. This dogmatic impulse, by the way, this tendency of people in one section of the country to pass judgment on conditions and on the conduct of people in sections far away, is productive of much injustice. It would be well were critics of social and political affairs always to consider that in this broad land there is no great diversity of temperament, no vast difference in morals, in intelligence or in human nature. What San Francisco has done at any time is no different from what St. Louis or Philadelphia would have done in similar circumstances, and it is therefore ridiculous presumption for the people of any city to affect an air of superiority in leveling an indictment against a whole sister community. Our experience of foreign critics during the career of the Graft Prosecution improved our philosophy. It made us resolve, for example, to restrain henceforth the tendency to point with horror to the regulation method of dealing with the negro question in the South.

Newspaper Endowment

The subject of an endowed newspaper is once more up for discussion. The idea of an endowed newspaper was promulgated in these columns about two years ago; and it has been given some impetus on the Chautauqua circuit and by contributors to the magazines. Recently it appealed to Francis E. Leupp who has been writing upon the declining influence of the American newspaper in the Atlantic. He would like to see an experiment in endowed journalism, governmental or other. Now it was not because of a sense of the decline of newspaper influence that we suggested the idea of an endowed newspaper; rather was it because of the growth of the evil influence of journalism upon public sentiment throughout the country. Our newspapers have lost influence inasmuch as they are seldom able to consummate anything that they openly advocate. Often when they espouse a good cause, which they have been known to do notwithstanding the goodness of it, they excite nothing but popular mistrust. Many a good cause has been lost by the accident of newspaper support. Yet the power of the press for evil is tremendous. It is in the moulding of public opinion by discussions of the abstract that this power is exercised; by throwing ideas into circulation, spreading mischievous doctrine over the ocean of mind, giving voice to the instincts of the ignorant and stimulating the prejudices and passions of the multitude. The newspapers maintain an irresistible sway over the mind of the whole nation, ruling it at will, moulding it into the form of their mood. Newspaper influence has become a force to be reckoned with because the policy of coddling the mob is universal. All are imbued with the one idea of playing the demagogue. However they may differ on concrete questions competition for circulation is conducted on the paramount principle of flattering the multitude. In every large city the newspapers are accustoming the public mind to the idea that all our laws are the product of corruption; that all our statesmen who act upon the theory that our institutions had their inception in intellect and virtue are knaves; that the voice of the majority is the voice of God, and that wealth has no rights which the people is bound to respect. Not only have the newspapers caused a revolution in the modes of thought, they have made demagoguery the passion of the hour. The pulpit and the university are dominated by demagogues, and even among honest men are to be found subversive prophets, negative destructive philosophers, who believe they perceive the absurdities of time-sanctioned opinion but have nothing to substitute in the place of what they would take away. Verily the power of the press is far from being on the wane. The newspaper, insincere though it is, charlatanical, untruthful and even malicious, is far and away the most powerful of all the factors that give tone and character to society and that go to form the idiosyncrasy of the nation. Now with the press sowing dragons' teeth up and down the land something unpleasant seems almost inevitable. Whatever has happened

Most people make an awful fuss about buying clothes. It is easy for a man to come to this modern men's clothes shop and select his garments, because we handle nothing but men's clothes; consequently all the attention is given in that direction. will happen again, says Ecclesiastes in words to that effect; and those of us that are more or less familiar with history believe that we can discern what is adumbrated. Now the idea of an endowed newspaper, or rather of a string of endowed newspapers, may seem quixotic; it may be thought that an endowed newspaper should be an ideal newspaper and that an ideal newspaper would be futile for the reason that it would be read only by those persons that are not affected by yellow, muckraking journalism. This doubtless is true, but an endowed newspaper need not be the ideal newspaper of dreamers. It need not be dry as dust nor yet adapted altogether to the tastes of highbrows. A newspaper may come down to the level of the multitude without being wholly vulgar. A newspaper designed for the sole purpose of having its voice heard above the clatter of the world's discords can never be popular, but a newspaper devoted to the dissemination of the truth both pleasant and unpleasant can be made to illuminate the dark places of the earth. Perhaps the mob would find as much human interest in the lines of the champions of the people as in the lines of malefactors of great wealth. Perhaps the exposure of falsehood and charlatanism can be made as sensational and as diverting as anything that now commands the attention of the readers of our yellow journals. We believe that a newspaper can be endowed without being made dull, but we have little hope of the experiment being made. Most of the men that have the money to endow newspapers are engaged in imitating the ostrich.

Perspective Impressions

Perhaps there is some relation between the high cost of living and the rank stupidity that luxuriates in public office.

The prophet who predicts only what is pleasant will always be more popular than he who says only what the Lord bids him.

Our esteemed contemporary, the Sacramento Union, asks, "Might not it be a good and pious idea to demand of the various gentlemen who are coming before the voters of California at the primaries this summer to pledge themselves to support the tickets upon which they are seeking a place even if they are not nominated themselves?" Perhaps—if soreheads could be depended on to keep a pledge.

The one certain specific for catching the public ear is to utter solemnly an unimpeachable platitude.

Mrs. Asquith may not be a woman with a serpent's tongue but her husband is certainly a man with befuddled brains.

The time is about ripe for somebody with the courage of his cant to run for Congress on a pledge to introduce a bill for the redistribution of the wealth of the country.

The Baroness Bazus told the ladies of the Women's Press Association the other day that Browning had a red face and looked more like a shop clerk than a famous poet. The news was a great shock to the ladies of the Press Association who supposed that the poet looked as divine as his poetry.

The Ideal American

By Professor G. D. Herron

There is an America that Americans do not know. It is the America of the middle rivers, of the regions embraced by the two great arms of the Ohio and the Mississippi, and spreading out below the Missouri, and more especially of the lands that lie before and beyond the Wabash—the counties of Indiana and the prairies of Illinois. The peoples beside the Wabash and the Sangamon were ever the most characteristically American. New England was never other than what its name indicates. But the peoples of the Wabash and of Illinois were as different from New England as New England is different from Provence. Here, in the bosoms of these prairies and beside these rivers, was the incipient soul of America to be found in the early years before the Civil War; and here it now sleeps. America is not a nation yet: it is only a mob—a mob of conflicting capitalist interests and their slaves. But when this mob becomes a nation, when the New People emerges from the American melting-pot into which the tribes of the world have been cast, the living soul thereof will rise from along these middle rivers—where it slumbers so long and deeply, or but stirs to troubled dreams. If America becomes a distinct spiritual being, that being will proceed from the life and love of these earliest westerlings, enlarged and enriched by the vast and varied Slavic and Latin elements of our more recent populations.

These were the romance-peoples of America. Into their lands of malaria and mysticism, of ferocious feuds and kindliest fellowships, entered whatever we have had of the ancient chivalry. The first settlers were from France. They were the ardent devotees of religion, or else they were the exiled devotees of the sword, or of fair women, or of statecraft, or of intrigue and conspiracy, or of other dissipations of the old noblesse. While the English were establishing themselves along the Atlantic, the French were making Vincennes-on-the-Wabash their gay little stockade-capitol. Even up to a few years ago French was still the language of the older parts of Vincennes. The Wabash valley and the counties of Illinois that parallel the river's course have always crudely preserved somewhat of the blended devotion and gallantry of old Catholic France. But though their influence was permanent, the French were few among the final settlers. The focal geographical points of the French missionaries and explorers became the radiating centres of the frontier families that came from Scotland, Ireland and England by the way of the Virginia mountains and the Kentucky meadows. The English and their language were predominant, of course; but they were not the English type that Massachusetts knew, and that made the traditional mind of America. It was rather the descendants of Cavalier England that poured into these settlements. They were sometimes lawless and superstitious. But in them whatever was left of the old romanticism was resurgent. Its ways and weapons were rude, but the romanticism was there; and there, in distinction from the Puritan thought of life upon the Atlantic coast, was life still looked upon as a quest. It was there also, as at Paris in the beginnings of the Great Revolution, that the human spirit refused to be bound.

Then with all the superstitions of these peoples, with all the wildness of their religious revivals, with all their high and habitual melancholy, with all the mysticism that pervaded their actions as well as their words, there went a shrewd rationalism. Their lives were ever expressive of a strangely mingled intuitionalism and scepticism. They were as realistic in their habits of thought and action as they were religious in feeling. It was from them that Lincoln came, who was their true word and flesh—the word and flesh of what they are, as well as of what they were. And it is Lincoln who reveals, though unto a blind nation, what the real and yet unrealized America is.

This America of the Wabash and of the Illinois prairies is much more akin to Saint Francis and to Dante than to John Hancock and to the Adams family; is much nearer to Isaiah or to Omar Khayyam than to the comfortable merchant-minded Boston that took to literature in Hawthorne, Emerson and Lowell—for New England literature was always a disguised Puritan theology, always a masquerade of the essentially immoral Puritan morality. There is vastly more kinship between the Wabash and the Arno or the Euphrates than there is between the Wabash and the Connecticut. There is as much of Provence or Persia in the prairies of Illinois as there is of New England. The spirit of the first peoples of these middle rivers was the spirit of wide spaces, of great breathing places, of unfettered human beings.

But perhaps the most underlying element in their life was the sense of neighborhood. I am not sure but what this was their chief distinction. I am sure that in this the settlements of Illinois and Indiana stood in strong contrast with the anti-social spirit of the Puritan settlements. These frontier families had their strifes, their feuds, their guerilla wars; and not infrequently were there murders among them. But the sense of neighborhood was never absent; while their attitude towards the guest with whom they had once broken bread was much like that of the Arab. Each family was moved by an inner necessity for ministry to the other families of the vicinage; and the vicinage in those days meant a wide circle of territory: one's intimate neighbors might be miles away. By this sense of neighborhood, begetting a spirit that was at once intensely individual and widely social, these communities repeated some of the characteristics of the early Christians and the first Waldensians.

This real America has passed from the memory of the living. I have said that it sleeps—and who knows when it will awaken? Nor was it ever the manifest mind of the nation. It flowed high for one great moment, bearing Lincoln upon its crest. But then it ebbed again. The Civil War left not only the youth of America under the sod: it buried the soul of the nation as well, at least for a long time. It was the Puritan, not the prairies, that formed the nation's moral and mental habits. And the Puritan still rules the land. Into our dark-omened present, into our terrible capitalist society, into its unclean and degenerate Puritanism, the real America has disappeared. It will not reappear, the nation will not have a soul, until the last of Puritanism is dissolved in a social humanity.

It is true we have made much of Lincoln. We have made his name a popular asset—a fund upon which the needy may draw: the maker of sounding rhymes, the vagrant editorial writer, the ignorant preacher, the obscene politician. But all that is because we have not understood him. America has enshrined Lincoln without in the least knowing him. Even while his name is the nation's most familiar glory, he is as a stranger in a strange land. Into the wide habitations of this man's soul his own generation did not enter, and far from his thoughts are the thoughts of the generations after him. We have linked up his name with that of Washington and other patriots and national saviours; yet he had no part or lot with these. Nor had he any portion with the Puritan: Lincoln and the Puritan are but the antithesis of each other. The American books about him are but

(Last week a review of a book entitled "Under the Blue and Gold" was begun in Town Talk. This book which was written in Spanish by Captain Cerezo of the Spanish Army, translated by Major F. L. Dodds of the United States Army and published by the Franklin Hudson Publishing Company of Kansas City, is the narrative of the siege of a little church in the town of Baler, an obscure hamlet of eastern Luzon, Philippine Islands. The church was occupied by a detachment of fifty Spaniards while the besiegers were a large force of Filipinos. The siege lasted for three hundred and thirty-seven days and when it was over, the islands no longer belonged to Spain. To make this book which is full of heroic deeds of an almost unexampled kind, better known, it is given this extended review. In last week's paper was told how the Spaniards, on July 1, 1898, entrenched themselves in the church, dug a well and otherwise prepared for protracted resistance. The Filipinos tried to induce them to capitulate by sending them accounts of Spanish reverses in other parts of the islands, but the Spaniards gave no credit to their statements. On July 31 the first Spanish soldier died of a bullet wound and was buried in the little inclosure.)

Captain Cerezo, the narrator of this stirring story, tells how the firing of the enemy increased continually both in volume and rapidity as the first month of the siege wore on. To answer it a curious expedient was adopted:

On our part, while we were firmly determined to economize ammunition, we did make an effort to furnish an accompaniment for that noise. We found in the church several old cannons. I do not know how old they were nor by what chain of circumstances they happened to be there. There were no vestiges of a gun-carriage nor any accessories. A singular expedient occurred to us; and since there was no powder for the cannon, it may be affirmed that we invented a kind of artillery.

We took some rockets to pieces and emptied some Remington cartridges; we mixed the explosives thus obtained; and, selecting one of the smallest guns, we put in it more than a sufficient quantity of the mixture and filled it to the muzzle with balls.

Carrying the gun thus prepared, by hand, to one of the loopholes we had made in the foundation wall of the convent (now our corral), we supported the muzzle in the loophole; and, using a strong rope for the purpose, we suspended the other end, by the cascabel, from one of the floor-beams that we had left in place. This allowed us to incline the plane of fire, after a fashion, and to that extent to get some sort of aim.

The piece being in place and our ears well stopped, we selected a bamboo from the longest we had, tied a piece of fuse to the end of it, set fire to it carefully, got as far away as we could, and then came surprise and noise enough! The result was something like the formidable blow of a battering-ram, the recoil of the piece being such that, darting from the loophole like a projectile, it struck the opposite wall, about eight feet away, with a blow that made the foundations tremble. "Fire! fire!" cried the Insurrectos; "but just wait until we get our cannon!"

The Filipinos obtained the cannon and did considerable damage to the walls of the church. With constant vigilance, both against the enemy and to prevent desertions, a few of which nevertheless occurred, and with one spirited sally during which the opposing forces fought face to face, August passed and September. Then the terrible beri-beri appeared:

On September 25th the "intruder" of which I have before spoken, and of which I said that the more we attempted to prevent all entrance the more we facilitated his ravages, made known, by claiming his first victim, his inevitable appearance among us.

The fatigues of the siege, the scarcity and bad condition of our rations, the persistent and ever-present anxiety, the vitiated air and the other very bad hygienic conditions to which we were subjected, the constant firing, the insufficient policing and cleaning, were bound to produce, under that burning sky and those humid winds, the fatal epidemic against which we had no defense.

The disease which now attacked us is a terrible one, not only in its termination, but also on account of the steady advance it makes as it goes on devouring, so to speak, and annihilating its victim. It is called beri-beri. It begins its invasions through the lower extremities, which it swells and renders useless, covering them with loathsome tumefactions. The attack is preceded by excessive debility and convulsive tremblings. It goes on rising and rising until, when in its development it reaches certain organs, it produces death with frightful sufferings.

The former priest of Baler, Friar Candido Gomez Carreno, was its first victim. He died September 25th, the seventy-seventh day of the siege, and the day when we had the first definite news of the surrender of Manila, which we learned through an artifice of the enemy.

No credit, however, was given to any reports involving Spanish losses in the islands and this incredulous attitude of mind was responsible for the anomalous circumstances of the siege. The ravages of beri-beri continued and death came more quickly:

Such was the extremity to which we had been reduced that we were obliged for the needs of the defense to make use of those even who were suffering from the epidmic; and, since none of them could stand, to carry them in our arms to their respective posts as sentinels. There we placed them on chairs, or something as a substitute, and left them for six hours, in order to economize reliefs. We managed the reliefs in the same way, carrying the old reliefs, one by one, from their posts to the bed.

Years have passed, and I have again become surrounded with the ordinary circumstances of life where exertion is commensurate with ordinary human conditions, limited as they are; and I must confess that I, although day after day a witness, an actor, a stimulator of such effort, have very often doubted whether it was all a dream of knightly fiction instead of a positive reality. Six long hours with the rifle ready, the legs useless, the suffering acute and constantly increasing, and those men appeared to be contented!

While Lieutenant Alonso was yet able, we took turns in watching at night; he taking one night with Las Morenas and I the next with the doctor, Senor Vigil, who devoted himself to everything and was everywhere, setting an example of self-abnegation and bravery. But when Alonso died, and I saw that Las Morenas must succumb to the weakness he was suffering, I abandoned this kind of watch and established the following, which was much more practical and which gave better results: One of the three remained always on watch, relieving each other as we conveniently could; and it was not always that we could get sleep, because if Las Morenas was very ill, so was Vigil suffering from a severe wound. The corporal of the relief alternating with the soldiers on duty made the rounds of the sentinels every five minutes, or, rather, in turn, one after the other, each when the other had returned.

One lieutenant had already died and the commander of the detachment followed, leaving Cerezo, the author of the book, in command:

The poor Captain was leaving us fast, a victim, as were the others, of beri-beri. His agony was horrible; he had not lost consciousness completely; he was still conscious of the fact that he was in a siege; constantly, which increased his anguish, he thought he was with his own people, but with the enemy in sight. Once he began to cry out, trembling and frightened, "Little Henry! Lit-

A Little Comedy

By Mathilde Serao (From the Italian)

They had been walking for a long time in the park, the forest, the fields. They had crushed many fragrant herbs beneath their feet and the lady's slippers must have been perfumed with them. The July sun would have disturbed them save that the lady's parasol was large, the foliage was thick, and there was a slight breeze. Then, too, they were very merry, with an inexhaustible vein of spirits. They were young, mutually agreeable, alone in the country, and not in love with each other. They laughed and amused each other, and especially they ridiculed romance. They laughed at blond virgins ever plucking the petals from an eternal daisy, at Paul and Virginia—apropos of the lady's large umbrella—and at all the descriptions, more or less flowery, that have been written about the forest, meadows, flowers.

They had passed a merry morning. With all the freedom of her nature, the lady was virtuous, placidly virtuous. She had a husband in Milan whom she loved and wrote to every few days. He had a wife in Potenza; besides, he was of a very cold nature beneath his gay scepticism, and at heart rather scorned all women. This was why they were not in love with each other.

"Shall we take luncheon?" the lady suddenly asked.

"Madame Lucia, you have an idea!" said he, pretending alarm.

"Prepare yourself, for I have another—a startling one! Sir Frederic, let us take luncheon at Giovanni's restaurant, a hundred feet away, in a thicket of rose bushes."

"Will he give us roses for luncheon? The doubt is cruel."

"Bah! I have been told that he has excellent fare. There will be no one there at this hour; only lunatics like us are about. It will compromise us horribly in the eyes of the waiter and host."

"Lady Lucia, the upper classes should set a good example—"

"Enough, enough, in Heaven's name! Have you decided?"

"From the first moment you spoke of luncheon, a sweet emotion—"

"Agitated my poor heart—"

"A lovely image—"

"Floating through the mist of my dreams—"

"Seemed to become reality."

And they laughed anew, and walked on in the dust of the high-road. The afternoon was suffocatingly hot. In the little inn, all white, the blinds were closed; utter silence prevailed.

"Lady Lucia, we can have no luncheon here."

They looked at each other in mock distress. They were flushed from the heat. At that moment a waiter appeared in the doorway, and gazed at them in the greatest amazement. As they mounted the step he followed.

"Shall I prepare a private room?" he asked timidly.

Frederic hesitated a moment, but she said resolutely, with a sly smile: "Certainly."

Later, when they were left alone in the large room, they were somewhat embarrassed. But it was only for a moment. Almost at once, like true persons of spirit, they understood the delights of their position.

"Lady," said Frederic dramatically, "let us disturb this man's honest conscience."

"Let us scandalize him," she rejoined. "We are lovers, two guilty and happy beings, about to partake of a tragic collation, eating the cutlet of dishonor, drinking the wine of betrayal—"

"We are on the verge of an abyss—"

"Unfathomable—"

"We may be surprised. Oh, Lucia, I will shield you with my breast, since I have no other—"

"Why have I not a veil, a long black veil? Do you think, Sir Frederic, that I should tremble and grow pale?"

"Try it. I too will try to appear agitated."

The waiter came to announce that the room was ready. Lucia rose hurriedly; Frederic followed her, speaking in an undertone, making absurd remarks that were supposed to be words of endearment. The waiter kept at a distance. Arrived in the private room, she sank into a chair and covered her face with her hands very naturally.

"My friend, what will you have for luncheon?"

"Oh, I am not hungry," was the melancholy reply.

"Shall we drink Chablis?"

"Yes, yes," she replied in the hoarse voice and with the wandering glance of a woman who has lost her head.

The waiter left the room with the order. They burst out laughing; they could hardly restrain themselves. Lucia's eyes were full of tears; Frederic buried his face in his napkin. How ridiculous! They enjoyed themselves like two children on a holiday. Then Lucia suddenly became serious. She looked around, somewhat disillusionized. She saw nothing unusual, nothing out of the ordinary. He understood.

"This room is quite ordinary. There are no more remarkable rooms except in novels. We are becoming prosaic."

She smiled absently; then resumed the comedy.

"What shall we do now, Sir Frederic? What shall we do to deceive this man? Invent something!"

"You must address me by my first name."

"Yes, yes. Or rather I must confuse it with your title."

"Certainly. Then we must gaze at each other, and stammer incomprehensible words."

"When he speaks to us we must pretend to be abstracted. I will stare at the water in my glass—"

"And I will make little pellets of my bread—"

The comedy proceeded, recited marvelously. The public, composed of the waiter and host in the distance, in the hall, were overwhelmed. But for five minutes the actors paid much attention to their cutlets.

"Lady Lucia, we should not eat."

"Oh, why not?"

"Don't you understand? With a heart consumed with remorse—"

"You are right, of course! But we are of those who eat for rage—"

"And drink from despair—"

"To drown remorse—"

So they continued lunching with good appetites, like young people whose minds are at rest, and who enjoy good health. But they did not forget their roles.

"When he comes in, Lady Lucia, we must pretend to be drinking from the same glass."

"I will say: 'Frederic, do you remember Viareggio?'"

"And I will appear agitated, sigh, make a gesture of despair—"

They took delight in throwing themselves into their parts. They thought of what they could do best, to make the greatest effect. They gazed interrogatively at each other. The heat became intolerable in the little room. Not a breath of air stirred, but many flies entered through the tightly closed blinds. Lucia waved her fan; she had drunk two glasses of Chablis, and the comedy began to excite her. Frederic was more calm, but in each was a clear consciousness of dualism. The representation of the comedy did not make them more intimate; they remained good friends, content to make fun of the host and waiter.

Neo-Nietzsche

I am the singer
Of Neo-Nietzscheans;
The dynamic soul
With an anaemic wife,
With children like Spartans
Rigidly reared.

I am the camel,
Observe my great hump.
I am the lion
That laughs in the wilds.
I am the child,
A holy assertion.

I am the warrior
That never drew sword.
My speech is the lightning;
I slay with a phrase.
The Superman lives
In me the Up-goer.

I want a woman
Whose virtues are those
Of a world yet to come;
That I may divest me
After my sham-fight,
With her to dance.

I want a house-wife,
A waltzer, a soul,
With whipcord to keep her
Tame to my hand;
And my caresses
Shall be her reward.

Lo, I am square
To the four winds of heaven.
My children must be
Rectangular shaped;
But where is the woman
To bear me those cubes?

I am the Spirit
And Wisdom and Power,
And Truth is not secret
Or bashful with me;
And even my hammer
Is philosophic.

I am immoral,
Adore I all vice;
The lies of a just heart
Philanthropy are,
And great is revenge
For I am cruel.

Lo, I am the singer
Of Neo-Nietzscheans:
The Terror of Kindness,
The Slayer of Shams,
The Tyrant of Women,
But you must not laugh.

The Spectator

In the Throes of a Scandal

The State is proud of its big university across the bay which boasts at once a Wheeler and a Boke. It finds rest and quiet in the moral platitudes that emanate therefrom at brief intervals, and it realizes that were it not for the zeal and vigilance of the faculty most everything of consequence within the borders of the commonwealth would go to the demnition bow-wows. In this rude, rapid and reckless age it is a consolation and a moral strengthening to feel that whatever dangers may threaten there are men at Berkeley ready to uplift and safeguard us at a moment's notice. But there is so much superfluous immorality in this State that occasionally some of it obtrudes even upon the holy ground of the university itself, and then consternation seizes the guardians of the public weal who throw conniption fits and do other things indicative of great mental agitation. A catastrophe of this sort, at this very moment, is stirring the emotions of the righteous pundits. They are writhing in the agonies of a tremendous scandal. The story is one that ought to appeal to the news sense of our alert dailies, but for some reason they have failed to exploit it. The story briefly is that the moral town of Berkeley has been shocked by election frauds, and that the person accused of perpetrating them is a university student, a young man who has sat at the feet of Boke and absorbed lessons in civic patriotism by the hour.

He Boosted Belshaw

A few weeks ago W. R. Ellis, a reformer approved and guaranteed by the university faculty, personally conducted an election in Berkeley for the purpose of learning public sentiment on the question of annexation to Oakland. Incidentally the people were given a chance to express their sentiment with respect to gubernatorial candidates. Much to the amazement of everybody the Hon. Charles M. Belshaw received a decisive majority, while the Hon. Francis Heney, the idol of Berkeley, the patriot who supplied the name at the Boke family christening, figured among the also-rans. To say that the college professors who have been doing their utmost to purify public sentiment in Berkeley were humiliated by the apparent repudiation of Heney, would be to fall ridiculously short of an adequate description of their state of mind. A few days after the election a vagrant rumor to the effect that frauds had been committed was set afloat among the Berkeley oaks. It reached the ears of Boss Ellis and he ordered a recount. When the ballots were examined evidence of fraud was discovered. It was clear that somebody had taken a deep interest in Belshaw's welfare and that Heney had been counted out. This was bad enough, but worse was to come. Boss Ellis conducted an investigation which brought him to the conclusion that the frauds were the handiwork of a bright young man from Belshaw's pocket borough, an undergraduate distinguished as one of Boke's most zealous disciples. Boss Ellis submitted his damning evidence to the university authorities and when last heard from they were conducting a dark lantern investiga-

Kent for Congress

It is high time for Congressman McKinley to look to his fences. Over in Marin County, which is at one end of the First District, a new ambition has come into bloom, the roots of which threaten to absorb every drop of the moisture that supplies sustenance to McKinley's towering greatness. This ambition is nursed and matured by Mr. William Kent, reformer, civic patriot and millionaire, the man who inherited Muir Woods and presented them to the people, receiving for his gift a most gratifying eulogy from no less a dignitary than Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Kent has been looked upon as a Republican, and it was thought that he intended to make a fight at the primary for the Republican nomination. But Mr. Kent is no novice in politics. He appreciates the difficulty of beating McKinley in a contest for Republican votes. What he wants chiefly is a seat in Congress, and the route that presents the fewest obstacles is the one he purposes taking. So he is negotiating with Mr. M. F. Cochrane, the overlord of all territory lying within the shadow of Tamalpais, and a Democrat of considerable consequence.

Not a Long Haired Reformer

With William Kent in the race for Congress Mr. McKinley will soon realize that there is a heart-breaking Marathon ahead with a pace-maker therein of wonderful powers of endurance. In Mr. Kent are combined many elements that are peculiarly advantageous to a man whose soul is fired with political aspirations. A genuine, aggressive reformer, yet he shelters no unattainable ideals beneath flowing, symbolic locks. He is essentially practical, as was demonstrated in Chicago where he conducted a campaign for clean government and won without the employment of any hypocritical pretensions. He fought the machine with its own weapons, and after his triumph he fulfilled his promises and salted nobody's sores. He took an interest in the fight to purge this city of the corruption that Ruef propagated, and put up some of the sinews of war. It is said that before parting from his money he exacted a promise that immunity would not be granted to Ruef, and that he was very indignant when he found that the promise had been violated. Being a good partisan, however, and having espoused the cause of the graft prosecution from liberal motives and with liberal views, the treachery that had been practiced did not cause him to relax his perseverance or impair his zeal. He believes in the principle that to support measures you must support men and that to carry a point through the instrumentality of men you must disregard the alloy and imperfection of the means. So the graft prosecutors still retain the friendship of the man they are reported to have deceived, and doubtless they will requite his fidelity by getting behind him for Congress and helping him to spend a little of the one hundred thousand dollars which he is said to be willing to spend to make the journey to Washington.

Pollard on Bierce

For two reasons Ambrose Bierce does not receive the homage of contemporary criticasters: first, because he is a genius and therefore to them unintelligible; secondly, because he is a satirist and has wounded either their vanity or the vanity of their friends. But to Bierce is given the homage of the discerning few. It has been ever thus. The glory of literary giants can be seen only in the perspective of years save by those who reach above their knees. Among the few by whom Bierce is appreciated is Percival Pollard, a critic versed in the mysteries of literature, who has devoted to a discussion of him many pages of his book, "Their Day in Court." This book is an arraignment of the pretenders of American literature. Mr. Pollard has set himself to the task of telling us what is wrong with American literature, the welfare of which he has at heart, and he opens his first chapter with the statement that the case of literature in America is comparable to the case of My Lady Parvenu's grand rout: crowded and worthless. Bierce he pronounces "the one great artist in English on our continent." He says that Bierce is the only one of our men of letters sure to be heard of side by side with Poe and Hawthorne; that he is fit to rank with De Maupassant, Verestchagin and Kipling. As a satirist he compares Bierce to Swift, Pope and Brown, but he excels, in Pollard's judgment, as a writer of short stories. "If," says this distinguished critic, "one volume written in America in our time is to survive for the perusal of future centuries, that volume is "In the Midst of Life."

A Sonnet From Sterling

Some day when in the mood George Sterling will take up his pen to lash in pungent prose the pygmy criticasters that have the effrontery occasionally to hazard their shallow opinion of Bierce's literary performances. For the present he is content to restrain his indignation within the narrow confines of the sonnet. This one—"To Ambrose Bierce"—I received from him the other day:

I saw a statue in the market-place—
The guerdon of a life of noble toil.
Austerely shone the marble that should foil
Oblivion, tho' the desecrated base,
Round which the sullen huckster trod, bore trace
Of dogs' defilement—transitory moil
That expiating rains would soon assoil.
But oh! the sunlight on that tranquil face!

What to the Titan were the mindless deed,
Mire-born, and swiftly with the mire made one?
No more than could the marble couldst thou heed
The mongrel, and the hate of souls uncouth—
Thou eagle that hast gazed upon the sun
And canst endure the light which is the truth!

Senior—How many times have you been plucked?
Junior—Four times, counting next commencement.

favored with the support of the associated patriots and redeemers. Justice Sloss having been absolved of his sins it would be strange if absolution were denied Justice Melvin. For certainly Justice Melvin cannot be deemed more than a venial sinner, whereas the transgressions of Justice Sloss were such as to put him beyond the pale of the immaculate coterie that guides the destinies of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Hitherto Justice Sloss has been regarded as an especially grievous offender because of the curious misapprehension that he was predestinated to righteousness. When the activities of the graft prosecution were young Justice Sloss, by virtue of his intimacy with Judge Frankie Dunne, was admitted to the charmed circle of the elect. And because of the strange things that were being done in the name of law and justice it was deemed advisable to make much ado over Justice Sloss since he would have a hand in the final analysis. Our uplifters, striving for the greater good, heroically steeled themselves against conscientious scruples, and shrewdly withheld indictments in the Home Telephone cases in which Justice Sloss was interested by marriage. Now Justice Sloss was all the while oblivious of his being the object of subtle designs. Not for a moment did he suppose that he was expected to construe the law upon principles of friendship and gratitude, and so when the Schmitz case came before the Supreme Court he had not the slightest hesitation in concurring in the views of his associates. At once he was cast off by Frankie Dunne, the inflexible standpatter of the court of inferior jurisdiction, who was indignant that the ties of friendship should not constrain despite the law and conscience. In the estimation of the patriots Justice Sloss fell from a vertiginous height. In the councils of the elect his name was anathema. He was more bitterly reprobated than any of his associates of the bench. Yet he has been forgiven. Now Justice Melvin had no hand in the Schmitz decision. When that malign instrument was handed down by an incorrigible tribunal Justice Melvin was a nisi prius judge in Oakland. The only offense that he ever gave to the elect consisted of a rebuke to Francis J. Heney, who wanted to shake him by the hand in private after slandering him in public. There is no doubt of Justice Melvin's guilt. It cannot be denied that on a certain memorable occasion he made it clear to the whole State that Mr. Heney, the idol of the uplifters and all their sympathizers, had no love for the truth. But there were extenuating circumstances. Heney himself forced the issue. It cannot be disputed that he did publicly slander Justice Melvin, nor that he did seek Justice Melvin's hands, nor that he did then and dare deny that he had said what several hundred people heard him say in Berkeley. But of course Justice Melvin was indiscreet. Mr. Heney is God's messenger on earth and his person is sacred. As a matter of fact he can do no wrong. Nevertheless in behalf of Justice Melvin I plead the forgiveness of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, whose leaders seems to have momentarily forgotten that they have resolved to take the judiciary out of politics.

The Spell of a Grill-Room Drama

Mr. Heney suffered an indignity in the Palace Hotel the other day, which, though it was not quite so humiliating as that which was put upon him by Justice Melvin, was akin to Mercutio's wound in that it sufficed. The author of the indignity was Mr. William H. Metson, the attorney, a gentleman with fighting blood in his veins and a reputation that deters the average citizen from a tendency to braggadocio in his presence. Heney met Metson in the crowded grill, and gave him a look that seemed to say "I've got a chip on my shoulder." This is nothing more than a characteristic expression of insolence which settles upon Heney's countenance whenever he meets anybody who doesn't like him, and which consequently is almost fixed. Mr. Metson who was sitting at a table a short distance from the chair occupied by the little prosecutor acknowledged the Heney frown with a stare charged with menace. The two lawyers were observed by a score of men in the grill who watched the development of this little drama without words, and presently the nerve tension became acute. The atmosphere was heavy with portent of a clash. For several minutes both men watched each other without the tremor of a muscle. A hush fell upon the room. The situation was fascinating, and the suspense made breathing short and quick. A sudden flash in Metson's eyes, and the situation changed. It was as though the chip had fallen from Heney's shoulder. With a feeble smile he turned away. Metson would not be denied. He changed his seat, and forced a renewal of the drama. Heney responded, apparently with fresh determination, but the strain was too much. He quailed, rose and walked away.

A Candidate and His Client

Some of the Hon. Hiram Johnson's long-haired friends are deploring his connection with the case of Dr. Burke who is under indictment for the crimes of abortion and attempt to murder. Deeply concerned for Mr. Johnson's welfare and fearful that his professional conduct may impair his political prestige, they consider it advisable for him to withdraw from the Burke case. These good people are laboring under the delusion that a lawyer is judged by his clients. Furthermore they are impregnated with the pernicious doctrine that was propagated in this community when, for the benign purposes of our uplifters, it was deemed advisable to excite prejudice against lawyers who defended men charged with crimes extremely obnoxious to civic patriotism. To this doctrine many converts were made at the height of the excitement to which this community was artfully raised, and the obvious absurdity of it has not yet penetrated the minds of some of the most hysterical of the zealots. Indeed they are insisting that the principle should obtain, and they make no concealment of their astonishment at Mr. Johnson's connection with the Burke case. They are amazed that he, an earnest and sincere civic reformer, should not scruple at running for Governor with the tainted money of an abortionist in his pocket. For of course they assume that Dr. Burke is guilty. This assumption is in harmony with another one of the crazy principles that was vociferously and vehemently enunciated in furtherance of the greater good of this stricken community. An indictment is prima facie evidence of guilt, shouted the uplifters, and now their chickens are coming home to roost. "The principle of the presumption of innocence is all rot," shrieked the elegant Heney, and his disciples are now pointing to Dr. Burke, and lamenting that so vicious a rascal should be able to tempt so distinguished a patriot as Hiram Johnson with money that drips with the blood of countless unborn children.

He Will Be True to Burke

Of course Mr. Johnson will not withdraw from the Burke case as he withdrew from the Conboy case. In the Conboy case he was a prosecutor, and his services were not imperative, but now he is defending an American citizen charged with horrible crimes, and he knows that a lawyer owes no higher duty to himself than that of safeguarding the rights of a man in Dr. Burke's awful predicament. It would be mean and contemptible cowardice on his part to withdraw from the Burke case for the purpose of conciliating the opinion of the ignorant. The noblest grand stand play that he can make is that of sticking to his rich client and getting out of him a fee large enough to compensate him for his sacrifice. Let the long-haired ones moan and lament as they will—they must not be taken seriously in such an emergency; now is the time for Mr. Johnson, our candidate for Governor at a great sacrifice to himself, to prove that his nickname "Hire-him" is not undeserved. Of one thing he can rest assured: that nobody can justly accuse him of inconsistency. Right in the midst of the graft prosecution did he not accept a fee from Dalzell Brown and manipulate the case of that bank looter with wonderful ease and ingenuity? And certainly his invitation to criticism in that case was much stronger than the one he now presents; for at that time he was on terms of intimacy with the District Attorney's office and in the circumstances it might have been thought that a sense of delicacy as well as his exceptionally fine sense of professional ethics should restrain him from putting through the deal by which his client virtually obtained immunity.

The Mystery That Provokes Laughter

With respect to the mysterious cryptograms that have inspired a deal of humor the inclination to a purely comic vein of treatment is strong. They are almost as funny as the dynamiting of the house that Gallagher lived in. But singularly enough the gentlemen who are trying to drown discussion of the cryptograms with loud guffaws, are the gentlemen who were wholly oblivious to the humor of the explosion in Oakland. The circumstance that these gentlemen have been able to laugh at anything is in itself fallow ground for suspicion. Hitherto they have reminded me that the man who cannot laugh is only fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils, for they seemed to be absolutely unable to indulge in the cheapest luxury that man enjoys. Unlike the Roman augurs who laughed in one another's faces when they met in private, the gentlemen of the prosecution cabal were afraid to laugh even behind closed doors. They wore at all times what became known as the prosecution mug, a stern, immobile, pharisaic face, that seemed as though it might have been cast in a moulder's pot. It mirrored nothing but the emotion of cruelty. It seemed indeed that these men who talked solemnly of the shooting of Heney as though they believed Haas had been hired to commit both murder and suicide, had been condemned to drag out their existence without a sense of humor. But now we find them laughing uproariously at the cryptograms that cost somebody four or five hundred dollars. "How much," says Carlyle, "lies in laughter, the cipher key wherewith we decipher the whole man!" Is there not something of a cipher key to the cryptograms in the ribald laughter of the gentlemen who kept their sense of humor under perfect control during the progress of the entire series of shams and frame-ups with which they successfully bunkoed a whole community?

Singular Reticence

I will not attempt a solution of the cryptogram mystery. I will only point out a few significant circumstances in connection therewith. Months ago the cryptograms were called to the attention of District Attorney Langdon, Detective Burns and Francis J. Heney. Did they attempt to solve the mystery? Did they explode with laughter at that time? No, they kept very quiet. If they believed, as they now pretend to believe, that the defense paid for the cryptograms in the execution of some sinister design, is it likely they would have held their peace? We are told that the great detective, celebrated for his talent for unraveling plots, distinguished for his faculty of invention, famous for his genius for elucidating the marvelous, uncovering motives and supplying missing links—this extraordinary man we are told, solved the mystery. He told the Examiner it was a frame-up contrived by the defense. Yet this sensational newspaper story was suppressed. Now whatever was the purpose of the cryptographer obviously his handiwork was not in furtherance of justice. Clearly he was trespassing criminally on a domain that requires the most jealous guarding. How remarkable, therefore, that no effort was made to bring him to justice! How remarkable that it should have remained for the defense to give publicity to the mystery!

Father Frieden Defends the Colleges

Father John P. Frieden, the distinguished Jesuit who was formerly president of St. Ignatius College in this city and who now presides oves the Jesuit University of St. Louis, has just taken up the cudgels on behalf of college education against Richard Crane, the millionaire elevator manufacturer. Crane wrote a book recently in which he declared that college education is not a benefit but a deterring force to greatness and that it would be better if all colleges and universities were burned. He declared, among other charges, that these institutions agreed to make civil engineers out of anybody, an impossible undertaking, and he attacked the sincerity of college presidents and professors. The eastern press has devoted considerable space to the reply made by Father Frieden, no doubt because it is temperate, logical and cogent. Father Frieden said in part: "Mr. Crane's charges are based on a misconception of the purposes of higher education. It does not claim to manufacture either brains or ability, but it aims at developing brain power and increasing and directing ability. Hence, no university holds 'that it can make a great engineer out of anybody.' On the contrary, its object is to aid a young man in the choice of his natural vocation; and only after he has found it, does the university purport to be able to guide him to success or eminence in proportion to his talent and application. Mr. Crane thinks it a fallacy that 'all other things being equal, the college man is better than the non-college man.' Why? Because the non-college man has an 'experience' that his college brother has not. But, surely, the temporary advantage of that experience which has been obtained by blundering will not long keep the non-college man in advance of the student whose brain power has been matured and all his faculties sharpened. If there is an exception then that non-college man is an unusual exception, and educational establishments are founded for average men, not for the rare exceptions. His fling at college professors is amusing, leaving out the fact that men can and do devote themselves to education for far higher motives than seem to have entered the mind of Mr. Crane, who measures all things by dollars and cents. These professors do not say they are 'able to manage affairs better than business men themselves.' They modestly contend that the broadening of a man's faculties will aid him in business, and add, moreover, a power of appreciating other things which are superior to mere business and round out a complete man's life."

Rostand's "Chanticleer" at Last

After waiting seven years with a lively curiosity such as was never before aroused by any promised dramatic event Paris has at last seen "Chanticleer," the barnyard play by the author of "Cyrano" and "L'Aiglon." It is seven years since Paris first heard of Rostand's intention of writing a play in which the characters should be taken by animals. In December, 1902, the poet summoned the late M. Coquelin to his beautiful home at the foot of the Pyrenees and told the great actor of the new idea which had been suggested to him by a small farm in the neighborhood. "I watched with interest," the poet has said, "when suddenly in stalked the cock. He entered proudly, boldly, like a ruler, with disdain in his eye, and a certain rhythmic movement of the head which produced the irresistible impression of a hero. He advanced like a bucaneer, like a man in quest of adventure, a king among his subjects. In a flash I saw in this spectacle a play. I returned to the barnyard many times, and rapidly the framework of the play was constructed in my mind." Despite misfortunes such as the death of Coquelin and continual postponements the play has ever since been one of the principal topics of conversation on the boulevards. When the date for the first presentation was definitely fixed the event overshadowed the Paris floods in popular interest and newspaper prominence. The boulevard in front of the Porte-Saint-Martin Theatre was in a ferment and the few hundred guests invited to the repetition generale had to fight their way into the playhouse. The crowd indulged in typical Parisian witticisms; the men were greeted with cock-crows and when a pretty woman stepped from her motor car there was a cry of "Oh! la jolie poule!" Mr. Walkley, the dramatic critic of the London Times, who was present, declared the assemblage the most brilliant first night audience he had ever seen. At the same time he missed "the fine types of manhood one saw at the opening of the New Theatre in New York"; but the women, he said, were a wonderful show. A member of the French Academy declared that it was the greatest first night since that of "Le Marriage de Figaro." The crowd outside waited till one in the morning when the play was concluded and as the audience left there was eager questioning: "Is it a success? Is it a failure?"

The Splendid First Two Acts

After an exquisite prologue spoken by the son of the great Coquelin in which the animals to be presented were enumerated to the accompaniment of their characteristic noises behind the curtain, a farmyard in picturesque disorder was disclosed. The dog is in his kennel, the black bird in his cage. The properties here and throughout are on a colossal scale so as to keep the right proportion with the animals who are, of course, of human dimensions. The actors have their faces uncovered but their costumes are realistic. The hens cackle about their lord and master Chanticleer. The blackbird makes jokes and puns, having learned the Parisian argot from a city sparrow. There was a tempest of cheers when Guitry, playing Chanticleer, strutted in. He chants the hymn to the sun and then dismisses his harem and chats with the dog. Then the report of a gun is heard and the golden pheasant scurries in, crimson breasted, her head magnificently plumed and her body undulating with the dainty-roguish grace of Madame Simone. The dog hides her in his kennel. When danger is over the eternal coquette shows in the pheasant; she begins to seduce Chanticleer who is troubled by her insinuating questions as he retires to his perch. Night falls and the owl and other night birds come forth to plot the death of Chanticleer. As they fly to the woods close by the pheasant enters sighing in lovesick fashion and the curtain descends to the accompaniment of tremendous cheering. In the second act we are on a headland at sunrise. The night birds have hatched their plot. Chanticleer is going to an "at home" given by the guinea hen; a gamecock will be there to destroy him. They leave at dawn and Chanticleer enters, crowing, and making love to the pheasant to whom he relates how his crow summons the sun. When the sun does not rise it is because his singing has been poor. When the day has dawned in all its sunny glory the act ends. Again the audience was enchanted by the poetry of the lines, the beauty of the scenes and the grace of the actors.

The Play Begins to Disappoint

Guitry said of the play before its production: "It will be a great success if the public does not laugh during the first ten minutes." There was no laughter during the first two acts, because the firm artistry of Rostand supplemented by the ability of the actors and the stage manager saved them from any tinge of burlesque or the ridiculous; but there were yawns during the two last acts, not many yawns but yawns just the same. The "at home" of the third act is full of clever preciosity intermixed with bold spectacle. In a kitchen garden the guests gather, Chanticleer swaggering in last of all. All the humors of such a gathering are satirised. Then follows the fight in which Chanticleer is being worsted until the gamecock wounds himself. The act is episodical and there was a falling off of applause at its end. In the fourth act the scene is in the forest and the possibilities of beautiful songs and sights are exhausted. But Chanticleer is quarreling with the pheasant. Suddenly the sun rises and he has not crowed. It is tragic. He realizes that he is the herald, not the creator of day and as he accepts this disillusionment, the pheasant sacrifices herself for love of him in a hunter's snare. There was very little applause at the end, even when the customary announcement of the author's name was made. Some idea of the elaborateness of the production may be obtained from the statement that there were one hundred and fifty costumes. Nearly $10,000 worth of feathers was used in making them. The weight of some of the costumes was thirteen pounds, an uncomfortable burden. The scenes were painted by well-known artists.

An Opinion on "Chanticleer"

Of course "Chanticleer" has evoked the inevitable comparison with "The Birds" by Aristophanes and much valuable classical learning has been spilled in pointing out the perfectly obvious resemblances and differences. The Greek play is essentially a satire whereas Rostand's only indulges the satiric vein in passing. The critics have been somewhat chary about passing judgment on the play; perhaps they realized that what the public wanted first of all was description, not opinion, for the plot had been so carefully concealed as to excite curiosity to a feverish pitch. It is too soon to say whether Rostand was right when he declared: "I have put the best of my brains into 'Chanticleer.'" Probably Mr. Walkley's summing up is the most interesting of all: "I believe this verdict of the first-night audience will be confirmed by the world at large. It is a work full of literary delights; of high fantasy; of extraordinary virtuosity in versification ("de l'acrobatisme!" was the comment of one veteran spectator in my hearing); sometimes of genuine lyrical fervor; not seldom tending to the "showy" and rhetorical; inspired by a genuine love and knowledge of Nature, even in her most secret places; fresh, ingenious, and "amusing" as a spectacle; bristling with literary satire, some of it rather recondite—altogether an extraordinary work that none other than Rostand could have imagined—but too plainly deficient in the "body," the conflict of wills, the continuous and cumulative interest of action that are essential for an acted play."

"Why did Stella break her engagement to you?"
"Merely because I stole a kiss."
"She must be very strict to object when her fiance kisses her."
"But I didn't steal it from her."

Mrs. Frank Leslie on Browning

Mrs. Frank Leslie, or Baroness Bazus, as she is more correctly designated, brought consternation to the ladies of the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association this week by revealing to them that Robert Browning was fat, red-faced and an enthusiastic eater. It was a sad blow to romance, for the Browningites of the association naturally preferred to think of their idol as that combination of esthete and ascetic which is supposed to represent poetry in the not too solid flesh. But I doubt not that if the disillusioned ladies continued their investigations they would find that other poets were personally unattractive, to say the least. There was Tennyson, for instance, who consumed enormous quantities of mutton chops at breakfast and smoked a vile-smelling pipe in drawingrooms. What more romantic figure than Richard Brinsley Sheridan? Yet Sheridan in the flesh acquired a red nose from too much brandy and used to hiccough tipsily after dinner. We all know that Shakespeare died from eating and drinking too much and that Byron was frequently floored by the demon rum. If we must regard the poet as a superman whose soul is like a star and dwells apart, it would be just as well to avoid veracious biography. Otherwise there will be many shocks like that which Baroness Bazus gave the Women's Press Association.

Flag-Raising at San Juan Bautista

There is a very interesting celebration in the little mission town of San Juan Bautista, in San Benito County this week. Every year the town celebrates the occasion of the first raising of the American flag in California on March 4, 1846. At the summit of what is known as Fremont's peak in the Gabilan Mountains the flag is run up on a flagpole erected by the Fremont Memorial Association with fitting ceremonies in honor of the "pathfinder" and his troops who paved the way for bringing California into the Union. It was at San Juan also that another historic incident occurred, for there the land and naval forces of the United States first met on July 18, 1846. The mission town was a focus of activity in the earlier days and its townspeople, infused with the spirit that animated the first comers, are wont to recall the early events which played so conspicuous a part in California history. This year the celebration will be held today and tomorrow. At the invitation of the Fremont Memorial Association, the prime mover in the patriotic festivities, Judge Maurice T. Dooling, former president of the Native Sons, will be the master of ceremonies and will raise the flag on Sunday, the plan being to make the trip to the mountain with a large delegation of members and invited guests. Preceding this climax to the annual celebration, a grand ball will be held in San Juan tonight and Professor Crawford of the University of California will give a lecture on Halley's Comet. San Juan Bautista's yearly celebrations have attracted attention all over the State and are an impressive tribute to those whose deeds are written large in our annals.

A New Salon Attempt in New York

At irregular intervals some moneyed blue-stocking in New York courageously essays the foundation of a salon. So far all these attempts have been failures, probably because the New York of today is considerably different from the Paris of other days. But at any rate, the idea of a salon is a very fascinating one to moneyed blue-stockings and its revival may be looked for intermittently. Only a few days ago Mrs. Isaac L. Rice made an attempt to start a salon. Mrs. Rice started a Society for the Suppression of Unnecessary Noises which silenced the sirens on the Hudson River, but she does not regard poets as makers of unnecessary noises, despite their sometime siren tones and there were lots of poets invited to Mrs. Rice's apartments at the Ansonia. It was a very swell affair with fashion and formality "sicklied o'er by the pale cast of thought." From the New York Sun and a letter from Herman Scheffauer I have culled some very interesting details about this swagger literary function.

California Well Represented

With Edwin Markham and Herman Scheffauer representing the poetry of California, Gertrude Atherton representing our fiction and Mr. James D. Phelan in the role of a flaneur and patron of all the arts, it must be admitted that the west was not without its influence on the birth of the salon. To be exact, it was hardly a salon which was inaugurated on this occasion. It was rather a poets' union. While the plans are still vague, inchoate, as becomes poetical plans, it is probable that other affairs will be arranged in Mrs. Rice's beautiful apartments where more sandwiches will be consumed, more tea drunk and more pale thoughts interchanged. The idea of forming a stock company for poets was broached by George Sylvester Viereck, a poet of purple passion and dark mysterious evil. Viereck conceded that the shares might not sell at par right away but he thought the poets might wait for dividends. Edwin Markham wanted to found a Society for the Lovers of Poetry with Dante and Beatrice as charter members.

Poets' Union, Local Number One

Just who suggested the idea of a union is not quite clear but its advantages were so obvious that Gertrude Atherton who dislikes unions, was almost in despair. A union, she argued with Mr. Phelan, would make it sound as if poets had to labor. A union, replied Mr. Phelan, could strike for the eight hour day, not to speak of more cents to the square stanza. Viereck returned to the charge for his stock company. "At first we could sell our stock for a song," said Mr. Viereck. "Mark Twain is a corporation and why should not poets be incorporated. Like as not Shakespeare was only a trust or a title company with Bacon as a dummy director. Poets must be seen as well as heard. We have no place in this country where poets can be viewed as they can in Westminster Abbey. Present conditions are dreadful. You wish to see a poet. You have to go to Hoboken or the flats of Harlem or Staten Island and then you only see one or two. We might have a parade if necessary. I think such a celebration would inspire interest in poetry, stimulate prices and ultimately pay for itself." Herman Scheffauer told how they recited poetry in the dark over in England. It was highly effective. Poetry, Mr. Scheffauer added, must be heard fully to be appreciated. A musical accompaniment to the recitation of a poem was something particularly subtle. One was affected one way and another quite differently, but no one could remain wholly insensible to the poem's heightened charm. "But what I should most like to see in this organization," said Mr. Scheffauer, "is naturalness. In California the poets of the Bohemian Club lounge under the trees and read poetry there. Isn't there some place here, Central Park or the Battery, where you could loaf and invite your souls? For New York is indeed a chilling environment to the poet." Edwin Markham, who will furnish the authentic looks for the poets' union, waited until they beseeched him to prophesy. Mr. Markham said he didn't care so long as they made the organization broad enough to include the lovers of poetry. "There are only three ways of reaching conclusions on life," said Mr. Markham. "One is called philosophy; the others are poetry and religion." Religion, he explained, was only poetry put in practice. Markham's philosophy cast something of gloom over the company, but the reading of original verses by all the poets present brought the affair to a successful close.

"Really," said the callow youth, "I am no longer a mere boy. I've got a little hair on my lip now."

"Yes," replied Miss Pepprey, "and perhaps in a few weeks you may have another one."

The Thunderer Now Under Harmsworth's Control

Over the wires the other day came news of the death of Arthur F. Walter of the London Times. A fact not generally known is that with Walter's death the Thunderer passes under the absolute control of Alfred Harmsworth, Lord Northcliffe. The Times was under the control of the Walter family for more than a century. It was founded by John Walter in 1775. He left the management at his death in 1812 to his son, another John Walter, who held it until his death in 1847, when a third John Walter succeeded and held the management until 1894. He was succeeded by his son, Arthur Frazer Walter. Under the last named the Times supported Lord Salisbury's Ministry in its South African policy in 1899 and the succeeding years preliminary to the Boer war, but criticised the conduct of the war after hostilities had begun. While Arthur Frazer Walter's father was at its head the Times made the great mistake of its career, the publication of the "Parnell letters," also known as the "Pigott forgeries." In an effort to regain the losses which ensued from this great blunder the son took the Times company into the general publishing field. In 1898 it undertook a reprint of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica," and the Times book club was one of his projects. This extension of the scope of the newspaper caused considerable unfavorable comment among other publishers. Shareholders outside the Walter family brought an action in 1906 against the family which had controlled the publication since its inception; but the suit was settled amicably by the conversion of the Times, formerly a partnership, into a limited liability company, and disclosures of the inside history of the paper were avoided. Under the new arrangement Mr. Walter became chairman of the board, and this post he retained after the purchase by Lord Northcliffe, already owner of the Daily Mail, of the controlling interest in the Times.

The Exposition Site

According to the Examiner President Bourn of the Spring Valley Water Company purposes exploiting the Merced Rancho property as a site for the Panama-Pacific Canal Exposition. This is the site that was recommended by Town Talk immediately after it was determined to hold an exposition. No better site can money be spent to greater advantage for the city. The Merced Rancho should be made a part of our park and boulevard system. If the money to be spent on the adornment of a large tract of land to render it suitable for an exposition were spent on the Merced Rancho then the city would have another beautiful park, with buildings for museums and other purposes; that is, provided the land were purchased from the Spring Valley Company.

A Composite Portrait

Let us examine the most recent portrait of that sterling champion of the people, Mr. Gifford Pinchot, the one drawn by Secretary Wilson. An impressive portrait this, if for no other reason than that it is the handiwork of Secretary Wilson, a gentleman who enjoys universal confidence, and who is not at all under suspicion of being unduly friendly to the iniquitous ones who have been responsible for the awful crime of national prosperity. Secretary Wilson took the witness stand in Washington last Tuesday to inform the Ballinger-Pinchot investigating committee that Mr. Pinchot, the great exponent of conservation and friend of posterity, was guilty of misrepresentation. Mr. Pinchot had sworn that Secretary Wilson had given him permission to write to Senator Dolliver the letter that caused his (Pinchot's) dismissal for insubordination. The facts of the matter as presented by Secretary Wilson are of some importance, shedding light as they do on Mr. Pinchot's ability as an intriguer, and revealing him as a typical reformer, full brother to Mr. Glavis and not more or less worthy of confidence or credence. It appears that Mr. Pinchot with a view to avoiding blame for something he knew was discreditable went to Secretary Wilson to make sinister use of that old gentleman. He asked Mr. Wilson for permission to send Senator Dolliver a letter about departmental matters. This was a reasonable request, it being customary to furnish members of Congress information that they required about departments of the government. The request was granted, whereupon Mr. Pinchot wrote a letter obviously designed to bring scandal on President Taft's administration. "Mr. Pinchot wants you to believe," said Secretary Wilson, "that because I raised no objection to his writing letters to Senator Dolliver regarding departmental matters he had a right to write what he did. He had no such authority from me. I knew nothing of it." Is this not a composite portrait in which may be traced not only the lineaments of Pinchot, but those of Glavis as well and also those of some of the glorified patriots of California?

The Disappointed Baconians

There was a great flourish of newspaper trumpets some time ago when a number of American Baconians went to England to find, by the aid of a cipher, a box of manuscripts hidden in a cave on the river side of an old castle. It was a romantic quest, a hunt for buried treasure free from all suspicion of mercenary intent, a high adventure in the interest of English literature. If the quest had been successful, the English-speaking world of literary men would now be quaffing deeply from a new well of undefiled inspiration, for of course the compositions which Bacon had hidden in that fantastic hiding-place would have been the equal of or maybe superior to the masterpieces to which he is supposed to have attached the name of Shakespeare. But most unfortunately there is no treasure trove; silently as the Arab, the cipher-inspired seekers have returned to their homes on this side of the Atlantic, sadder but no wiser men. Digging on the river side of an ancient castle the searchers found, as might have been expected, the foundation of an ancient wall and one report says that they also found the handle of an old box. The handle, however, was not attached to a box, so it did not answer the purpose. Either somebody else found the box of manuscripts and left the handle behind or—there was no box of manuscripts. The outcome might have been foreseen. The cipher on which the quest was based was constructed, not from one of Bacon's own works or from a play of Shakespeare, but from Sir Philip Sidney's "Arcadia." Of course this circumstance made it necessary to assume that Bacon wrote "Arcadia" and the assumption was blithely made. Assuming things is one of the easiest stunts of the Baconians.

Some Hard English Names

The following note has been handed over to me by Tantalus who thinks that as it does not deal with a matter of purely social interest, it is within my province to answer it:

Editor Town Talk: In last week's paper you spoke of the difficulty of pronouncing Taliaferro. Well, I happened to know that it was pronounced Tollifer or Tulliver; also that Cholmondeley is Chumley. But I've probably been mispronouncing Mrs. De La Pasture's name during all the years that I have found pleasure in her novels. Will you kindly set me right? Very sincerely, E. K. W., Berkeley.

Mrs. De La Pasture's name is pronounced as if written Delapatoor. It is no disgrace to mispronounce a name of this sort, Tantalus' opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. There is no rule for the whims of pronunciation in English nomenclature and it is useless to attempt to master certain names unless one is thrown in contact with their owners. If E. K. W. of Berkeley lived in London, for instance, he would never find Berkeley Square unless he asked for Barclay Square. Of all the odd things in the world there is nothing odder than the English pronunciation of English proper names. The famous Enroughty, pronounced Darby, is hardly to the point, for the scape-grace member of the decent family, assisted to escape to the colonies on condition that he change his name and thus cut the connection with his respectable relatives, practiced a bit of trickery by which, having received the benefits of clemency, he retained the original spelling of his patronymic, simply giving his name orally as Darby. It appears, however, that Lord Byron called himself Byrn (Burn) while the Cowpers are Coopers; Majoribanks is Marchbanks; Wemyss is Weems and St. John becomes Singin. Arcedekne is transformed into Archdeacon and the Colquhouns expect to be addressed as Koohoons. The Duchesnes are Dukarns and the Bethunes, Beetons. The English of Menzies is Mynges and of Knollys, Knowles. Gower is Gorr and Dalziel, Dael; Glamis becomes Glarms when given orally; Geohegan is transformed into Gagen and Ruthven into Riven, while Dillwyn is only Dillon. In Abergavenny the av is silent, and in Hertford the e has the sound of a and the t is unheard. Geographical names furnish as many pitfalls for the unwary. Cirencester is Siceter; Pontefract is Pomfret; Woodmancote is Woodmucket and Hallahon, Horn. You write Hadiscoe but you inquire for Hadsker and if you really want to find Grassington you ask information concerning Gerston. Gunthwait becomes Gunfit on the English tongue, Eckdale is Ashdale, and Brighthelmstone, Brytun. Brampton is to be called Brian or Brawn and Utrame, Ooram. Meddlethorpe is Thriethrup and Uttoxeter, Tuxter. Pevensey is rendered as Pinsey; Rampisham, Ransom; Crostwight, Corsit; Holdsworth, Holder; Kircudbright, Kircoobry; Ilkley, Ethla, Cockswold, Cookwood and Marylebone sounds more like Marrowbone than what it looks like.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY MORTGAGE SHOULD NOT BE RENEWED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5272, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN LYNCH, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court from the verified petition of MICHAEL COSTELLO, Administrator of the Estate of John Lynch, deceased, praying for an order for leave to re-mortgage certain real property belonging to the said estate that it is for the best interest of the said estate that the said real estate should be re-mortgaged.

It is therefore ordered that all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court on Wednesday, the 6th day of April, 1910, in the Courtroom of said Court in the Grant Building, at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the said City and County, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause, if any there be, why an order should not be made for the re-mortgage of the said real estate.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four consecutive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco.

Done in open Court on the 2nd day of March, 1910.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

The Editor in His Anecdotage

Setting Him Right

It is said that during one of Mr. Moody's meetings a worker approached a young man with the question, "Are you a Christian?" The young man looked up, smiling good-naturedly as he replied: "Oh, no sir; I am one of the choir!"

Misunderstood

An eccentric Maine preacher was recently driving along a country road, and overtaking a young man tramping his weary way on foot invited him to a seat in his sleigh. After he was comfortably seated the preacher rolled the whites of his eyes up under the visor of his cap, and said, in sepulchral tones: "Young man, are you prepared to die?" With an ear-piercing scream and a back somersault over the back of the sleigh, the young man made for the dense woods, and has never been seen in those parts since.

Cautious Approval

A small darkey and his sister were in the back yard of a wealthy Southerner's house. The girl was admiring things and exclaiming: "Wouldn't you like to live here?" Sonnyman was more contained, and after digging around the hydrant he replied: "Some mighty good fish bait here."

Pat's Absent-Mindedness

Three men, a barber, a baldheaded man and an Irishman, were traveling together. Not liking the looks of the place where they were to rest over night, they decided that one should keep watch while the other two slept. The barber was to take the first watch, the Irishman the second, and the baldheaded man the last. The barber amused himself by shaving the head of the sleeping Irishman, and promptly on the stroke of twelve, said: "Pat, wake up!" Pat, half awake, yawned, and passing his hand over his head said: "Holy Moses, he's gone and waked up the baldheaded man when he should have waked up me."

Bessemer's Invention

Sir Henry Bessemer's discoveries in steel-making brought him great wealth and many honors. He came to London a poor boy from a country village. In two years he was pursuing a method of his own invention for taking copies of antique and modern bas-reliefs in a manner that enabled him to stamp them on card-board, thus turning out an infinite number of embossed copies of the highest works of art at small cost. This process, if made known to the unscrupulous, would have opened a wide door to fraud; for by its means there was not a government nor a paper seal of a corporate body which any common clerk could not forge in a few moments to absolute perfection. The disclosure of it at that time would have shattered the whole system of the British Stamp Office. The secret has been carefully guarded to this day. At the period referred to it was reckoned that the British government lost $500,000 annually by the fraudulent transfer of old stamps to new deeds and other legal papers, the tax being thus evaded. Bessemer invented a new system, which was adopted by the government, but he never got even thanks for it.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Dept. No. 10. Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of OTTO FERRENBACH, Deceased.

Jessie R. Ferrenbach, the Administratrix of the Estate of OTTO FERRENBACH, deceased, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on Monday, the 11th day of April, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10, Probate—of said Superior Court, in the city and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administratrix to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, OTTO FERRENBACH, as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Dated, March 1st, 1910.

Endorsed: Filed March 1, 1910. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By H. G. Benedict, Deputy Clerk.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—In the security market of the recent week we find what has appeared like much manipulation for distributive purposes in the leading speculative issues, stocks bought for support two weeks ago. How far this selling has been successful to insiders we do not know, but at the close of the session today it looks as if the market had turned the corner of the rally and would now work to a lower level again. Some betterment has been much heralded of trade conditions, etc., recently. This may be true, but it is a serious question how long this will last when we are facing a labor crisis over the country as a result of abnormal commodity prices. The technical position of stocks in Wall street is undoubtedly sound as a result of commission houses being depleted of highly speculative accounts, but the economical conditions of the country are not good and such, we believe, will be an influencing factor in security values ere long.

Wheat—Crop damage claims have again diverted attention from the dull demand current for cash wheat and the lack of public interest shown in old crop months. Nevertheless, the alacrity with which the market responds to news that in ordinary years would receive very scant attention and less respect, shows that there is something in the market besides fear of crop damage. The visible supply this week promises to be about a standoff, to a small decrease. In either event the visible will be around 14,000,000 bushels less than on March 1 last year. Primary market receipts during the last seven months are about 15,000,000 bushels larger than those of a year ago. This increase has been readily absorbed. With a visible supply smaller by 14,000,000 bushels from a primary movement that was larger by 15,000,000 bushels than a year ago, when supplies ran down to the lowest total in many years; in fact, almost to the danger line, it would seem that there was not much real fear that the remainder of the difference in size between the last two crops—about 72,000,000—could not be readily taken care of.

Corn—Although corn prices worked a little lower last week and the market acted heavy a good part of the time, the general position seems to be a little better than it was. Primary receipts fell off about 1,400,000 bushels from those of the preceding week and were about 800,000 bushels smaller than for the corresponding week last year. Country shippers are plainly up in arms against the acceptance of such extreme discounts for low grades as are represented in present markets, but in the event of mild weather there will probably be continued pressure of such grain on the market.

Cotton—The action of the market in the last few days only confirms our convictions and previous statements. After a drop of 103 points, to about 14 cents for the May option last week the market again turned, with every indication of inherent strength, particularly in the near months. Though when, as we have stated, the market takes such a material drop, prices get down to a basis that attract large buying by spinning interests and exporters; it is not believed by spot houses that any advance will go very far. The pronounced strength of the near positions, especially abroad, is credited to the calling of a large amount of April cotton, estimated at about 115,000 bales and the covering of hedges against this cotton would naturally bring a large amount of buying. It is not believed that any advance will go very far, maybe to 15 cents or thereabouts, as it has twice before on these rallies, as prices are not receiving much speculative support and the market is largely in the hands of professionals who are, almost to a man, against high prices for the present and will take the short side again on any bulge, and, in fact, we recommend this side until consumers show more interest. The long side should be carefully considered, if not avoided. The statistical position indicates a small surplus at the end of the season, but enough to meet requirements. The new crop prospects must soon be the controlling feature and aside from manipulation must be watched carefully.

Copper—While prices in some quarters have been rather firmly maintained, the market has felt the lack of demand and the trading in consequence has been very light. There has been quite a change in sentiment in the last few days as to the price of crude, or manufactured material and that is, that consumers can, for the present at least, get all they want at a reasonable price. This is a temporary wave of sentiment that does not seem to be founded on facts as statistics go, and in the better informed circles the opinion still prevails that the staple will bring 15 cents before the end of April. There have been some wide fluctuations in Lake, and on its intrinsic value it is a purchase around its present price—70 to 71. This stock is used as a leader in the copper market. Chino has real merit and taking the same in conjunction with Lawson's wide advertising it really should sell higher, as should a great many other of the better grade of stocks. In fact, at these prices the general market seems like a good purchase, although we still believe, that in sympathy with the New York stock market, and the general conditions, a material rise is not warranted in stocks for the near future. For the time being influence, pro and con, seems pretty evenly balanced and we see no reason for taking any decided stand one way or the other. We are inclined to think, however, that the next big movement will be upwards.

Auto Notes

The Pacific Motor Car Company has shipped to the E-M-F and Flanders reepresentatives, Mr. A. B. Mire at Modesto, two cars; one car to Chris. Sieber & Company at Woodland and eight cars to Simon Newman Company at Newman.

Fred Haas, purchasing agent for the Union Commercial Company, is the owner of an Oakland "Forty" roadster which will be driven to Santa Maria by Bert Lichenberg. The company has recently bought an Oakland "40" for use in the sugar beet fields.

The Pioneer Company's cars, particularly the Hudson and Chalmers, sold in Sacramento and vicinity with marked success. This is indicated by the arrival of S. M. Phillipps, the Sacramento agent of the Pioneer Company, who is in town arranging for another shipment of cars.

An Interesting Group at Luncheon

There was an interesting group lunching together at the St. Francis the other day. It included Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Whitney, George Whittell Sr., and George Whittell Jr. The interest centers in the presence of George Whittell Jr. It was only a few years ago that he was the devoted fiance of his hostess. Their engagement was announced and the usual fuss was made over it. Pearl Landers was the most popular belle in society and her collection of engagement cups numbered over two hundred. Suddenly one day each cup was returned to its sender with a note from Miss Landers explaining that her engagement to Mr. Whittell was discontinued. Soon after this young Whittell began to fill columns in the newspapers with his matrimonial exploits. A contract marriage was annulled only to be followed by his wedding with Miss Josie Cunningham of the Anna Held forces. Pearl Landers married Vincent Whitney a year or so after the shattered romance with George Whittell. The merry luncheon party of last Saturday proves that the breaking of heart ties is taken lightly these days.

Miss Maude Fay's Embarrassment

It is small wonder that Miss Maude Fay, the beautiful local girl who has made her mark as an operatic singer in Germany, was greatly embarrassed by the rumor that Gertrude Atherton had made her the heroine of her latest novel. It will be remembered that Miss Fay visited this city at the time when Mrs. Atherton was putting the finishing touches on the novel and that the novelist entertained her. Owing no doubt to their intimacy in Munich and San Francisco and to the fact that it was known that Mrs. Atherton's heroine was an operatic singer, the rumor flew about that the character had been drawn from Miss Fay. Both Mrs. Atherton and Miss Fay emphatically denied this statement more than once in my presence and exhibited the greatest anxiety about its circulation. Miss Fay seemed greatly embarrassed by the story while Mrs. Atherton was both irritated and amused. Now that "Tower of Ivory," the story in question, has been published, the reason is quite apparent. The heroine of the story is a woman with an awfully bad past. Although she has scaled the heights of operatic success when the story begins, her previous career was shockingly bad. She was raised in the coal country of Pennsylvania and ran away with a commercial traveler at any early age. Then she lived for thirteen years as a demimondaine in New York, giving up this degraded existence only when she discovered that she had a wonderful voice. Is it not natural that Miss Fay and Mrs. Atherton should object to the silly story which made the beautiful and brilliant daughter of a local family the prototype of this remarkable woman?

Society Girls at the Baths

It has lately become the fad for society maids and matrons to congregate every Friday morning at the Lurline Baths. Last Friday a jolly party included Mrs. H. McDonald Spencer, Mrs. Gerald Rathbone, Miss Virginia Jolliffe and Miss Mary Josselyn. In their taffeta silk bathing suits they made very charming pictures and their swimming was exceptionally good. Mrs. Rathbone with her wealth of Titian hair reminded many of Billie Burke as she dove into the tank. Mrs. Brickell with her glorious blonde curls that fell in ringlets about her face was another who attracted particular attention. An Eastern lady on a visit here was exceedingly enthusiastic about the beauty of face and form of these girls. She said that she had never seen so many splendid looking women at any baths which she had visited and as she was known to be an ardent swimmer who had traveled a great deal, her praise was taken as having particular worth.

Indorsement for the Simple Life

That was a soul-stirring debate at the California Club a few days ago wherein the champions of the simple life and the champions of the strenuous life measured wits in defense of their predilections. It was a battle of intellects with no quarter given and at its conclusion the champions of the simple life had routed their opponents at every point. This is interesting; it arrests attention; but I doubt whether it is epoch-making. Far be it from me to underestimate the influence of debates at the California Club upon current conduct. I have not forgotten so soon how the efforts of the California Clubsters sliced the baby off the platter of a restaurant poster and put a lobster in its place. Achievements like that would give a cynic pause. But this matter of the triumph of the simple over the strenuous life in the California Club reminds me of the Dutch taking Holland. Life has ever been simple to the verge of plainness at the California Club; the strenuosity of existence has never had a look-in there. When the ladies of a certain swagger club where bridge is played into the wee sma' hours for big stakes debate this question and after deciding that the strenuous life must go, enter whole-heartedly into the inauguration of the simple life, I will be impressed. Also I will be tremendously interested when the millennium comes.

The Battle of Royal Chefs

All fashionable London, writes a friend who is traveling in England, is agog with excitement over the battle-royal which is being waged by two chefs who tickle the palate of King Edward. It is a battle of sauces and cunningly contrived dishes and the king does not care how long it continues because since it began he has fared better than ever before. The two chefs who are contending for supremacy in the science—or is it an art—of catering to the sovereign's appetite, are employed respectively in Buckingham Palace and in the beautiful new home in Grosvenor Terrace of Mrs. Keppel, the king's chum. The chef at Buckingham Palace enjoyed undisputed priority for many years. He is Mr. Menager and he superintends the king's gustatorial menage at a salary of $10,000 a year. He does not live in the palace but close by and when he arrives at eleven o'clock every morning his first care is to inspect the lunch menu prepared by his first assistant and also the menu for breakfast the following morning. He then prepares the dinner menu for the following day, a task which occupies him usually a couple of hours. No two of Mr. Menager's dinners are alike. Certain dishes are from time to time repeated, frequently at the request of the king, but the general scheme of each dinner is always different. Always Mr. Menager is experimenting with new dishes and new sauces and it is not unusual for him to spend months on the elaboration of a particular viand. One of his sauces was only perfected after three years' experimentation and the king is exceptionally fond of it. Arrayed against this chef is the chef who served for years in the establishment of the Dowager Duchess of Manchester and who, after her death, went into the service of Mrs. Keppel. The king always liked to dine at the home of the dowager duchess and when she died he planned to hire the chef for his own kitchen. But when Mrs. Keppel forestalled him, he was delighted and as he dines frequently at her charming abode, he has the services of her chef without paying for them, at least directly. There is a great deal of jealousy between the two chefs and at the present time, Mrs. Keppel's chef has the better of the argument.

Amy Crocker to Go Abroad

News comes to me that Amy Crocker Gouraud intends to go abroad to live, but whether this plan was formed before or after the recent death of her husband I am not sure. Mrs. Gouraud is far from enjoying robust health and it is surmised by her friends here that her desire to be near a celebrated Parisian physician in whose ability she has the greatest confidence may have something to do with her determination. I understand that she is now disposing of all her American interests, preparatory to leaving New York. Mrs. Gouraud has a fad for adopting children; she is raising two youngsters in England and one in America and may add others to the

To Judge Feminine Character

At last I have discovered an infallible touchstone by which to estimate the characters of my feminine friends. Henceforth the riddle of womankind will be easy of solution for me and I will never again make a mistake in gauging the depths and shallows of those members of the gentler sex who have hitherto been a deep mystery, resisting every mental effort I made to fathom their impulses, their meaning, their likes and dislikes. A professor of the University of Berlin has put me in possession of the method by which I may avoid those mishaps into which mere man always falls in dealing with lovely woman. This professor declares that it is possible to judge a woman's character by the music she prefers. Thus, women who admire Saint-Saens are well-balanced, those who like Massenet are timid, those who love Wagner's music tend toward megalomania, those who prefer Flotow are vulgar, those who rave over Gounod are romantic and Liszt enthusiasts are ambitious. Admirers of Beethoven's symphonies are inclined to be vain while those who "go in" for Strauss, not the Strauss of "Salome" and "Electra" but dear old Johann of the dreamy waltzes, are light minded and shallow. These of course are but the elementary predications of the new method. I have avoided mention of Chopin and Bach, Schubert and Verdi and Puccini, because I wish to prosecute some investigations before I impart publicly all the principles of this fascinating discovery. I am now engaged in applying my touchstone to various women and tremble on the verge of some startling revelations.

The Triumphs of the Waltz

From friends who have spent the winter in England I learn that the waltz has been completely rehabilitated as the general favorite among dances and that the two-step which America sent to Europe is losing its popularity by perceptible degrees while the older dances are utterly neglected. It is predicted that next season will see the waltz queening it over all its rivals in fashionable circles while the imported two-step will go the way of the cake-walk to oblivion. English fashions are quick to reach the United States, so I look for a similar result in this country, though of course it will come more slowly and will not be so general as in England. While the waltz will regain favor here, it will never succeed in crowding the two-step off the dance cards as long as there are men and women who insist on a dance of easy and leisurely steps. Because the two-step is simpler, more quickly learned and a great deal less fatiguing than the waltz it will always remain, at least as the stopgap of the program. But the waltz, for a long time forced to share sovereignty with the two-step, is surely coming into its own once more. There are good reasons for this and one of them is undoubtedly the fact that waltz music is of a much higher character than the music of deux temps. Masterpieces like Johann Strauss' "Beautiful Blue Danube," Rodolphe Berger's sensuous "Amoureuse," Depret's subtle and fragrant "Sourire d'Avril" and the haunting "Valse Bleue" of Margis were bound to return to sway the feet of the present generation as they swayed the feet of its grandparents. The new waltzes are of such excellent musical quality, too, that they are bound to overshadow the monotonous two-step. The venerable Waldteufel has recently composed a fine waltz entitled "Rosee" and the once famous Coote has been writing some delightful new ones. "The Merry Widow" waltz, of course, enjoys an unprecedented vogue and a number of English composers have been laboring with considerable success to remove the reproach that English musicians are unable to compose a good waltz. Joyce's "Vision of Salome" has taken so well that Wern, a Hungarian, has written a "Reve de Dalilah" and Kandt a "Dream of Cleopatra." So it seems that the days of the romping dances have gone and the grace and dignity of the dreamy swaying emotional waltz are to be fully restored to our ballrooms.

The Neustadters Entertain

One of the most enjoyable affairs given recently at the Cliff House was the "Chinese Supper" tendered by Mr. and Mrs. Neustadter to a number of their friends with Mr. and Mrs. Bernheim of New York as the guests of honor. Although called a "Chinese Supper" the decorations only were Chinese, the center piece of the table being a miniature village. The table was extremely attractive, owing to the decorative taste of Miss Block. Among those who enjoyed Mr. and Mrs. Neustadter's hospitality were Mr. and Mrs. George Roos, Mr. and Mrs. I. W. Hellman, Mr. and Mrs. Sanford Goldstein, Mr. and Mrs. A. Silverberg, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Roos, Mr. and Mrs. Julian Hart, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Reiss. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Stellheimer, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Walton, Mr. and Mrs. J. Silverberg, Miss Ehrman, Miss Appenheim, Miss Jacobi, Mr. Ehrman, Mr. Leon Greenebaum, Mr. Haber and Dr. Frankenheimer.

Miss Kemble to Give "Salome"

Miss Margaret Kemble who has already this season charmed large and discriminating audiences by her interpretation of Strauss' "Electra" and Dukas' fantastic "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue," will give an interpretative study of Strauss' "Salome" on Monday afternoon at three o'clock at the St. Francis. At this particular time when all lovers of music are taking a keen interest in Strauss' work on account of the varied criticisms which have followed the New York presentation of "Electra," there is sure to be added interest in Miss Kemble's latest presentation. After a foreword on the music and an interesting description of its production abroad, based on her own experience, Miss Kemble will read the drama, adding an analysis of the themes and the music as a whole. The illustrative piano playing will be done by Miss Laura Anderson, a gifted young San Franciscan whose intelligent and dramatic interpretation of "Electra" and the Dukas music have already won her many encomiums.

singer with a baritone voice of pleasant quality which he uses easily and with no sense of effort in a wide range of songs. One of his best songs is Loewe's "Erlking," a composition the rare beauty of which is appreciated even by those accustomed to the wonderful Schubert setting. In this song Mr. Chamberlain shows strong dramatic quality. Following is the program which Mr. Chamberlain will render: "Where'er You Walk," from Semele, Handel; "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," from Acis and Galatea, Handel; In Questa Tomba, Beethoven; Selve Amiche, Caldara; Vittoria Mio Core!, Carissimi; Row Gently Here (Tom Moore), Schumann; When Through the Piazzetta (Tom Moore), Schumann; Waldesgesprach, Schumann; Erlkonig, Loewe; The Happy Lover, Old English; Orpheus With His Lute (Shakespeare), Carl Busch; Under the Greenwood Tree (Shakespeare), Carl Busch; Neuer Fruhling (Heine), Mario van Overeem; Freebooter Songs, William Wallace.

Prominent Men Play Golf at the Potter

W. C. Witherbee, a prominent New Yorker who is at the Potter in Santa Barbara, with H. W. Taft; Charles L. Taylor, confidential secretary to Andrew Carnegie; C. W. Baker, in charge of the sales department of the United States Steel Company, with headquarters in New York, and George Singer, a well known resident of Pittsburg, have been on the Potter Country Club golf course during the greater part of their stay. Mr. Witherbee, as well as the other three members of the notable quartet, was most favorably impressed with the Potter links in its present condition and stated that with a little improvement and care it could be made the best in the west. These men played a 36-hole match on Sunday and after another game on Monday, counting the two as a 72-hole match, the teams were only one ball apart. Mr. Andrew Carnegie has been a most enthusiastic spectator from the verandahs of the club house, where a most excellent view of the entire course is obtained, and just as soon as the condition of his knee will permit he hopes to get down on the course himself. As it is now almost healed, this will probably be in a few days' time.

In the Social Spotlight

Among the many passengers sailing from New York, March 5, on the mammoth "Kaiserin Auguste Victoria" of the Hamburg-American Line, are the following Californians: Hon. J. D. Phelan, Hon. and Mrs. Spencer Eddy, Mr. Leonard Wiessberg, San Francisco; Mrs. R. Koppenhagen, Los Angeles; Mr. and Mrs. Edward Jacobus, San Jose; Mrs. Geraldine Shotter, Master Oliver Shotter, Sacramento; Mr. and Mrs. Arthur V. Bright, Miss Helen Bright, Stockton; Mr. Walter F. Berger, Miss Irene Berger, Santa Barbara.

Recent arrivals at the Hotel Victoria include Miss Jeanette Powell of Marysville, and Mrs. J. H. McKune of Sacramento. Mrs. McKune is the guest for a few days of Mr. and Mrs. J. O. B. Gunn.

Mr. and Mrs. Bayliss C. Clark are down from their home in Sutter Creek for a few days, and are guests at the Hotel Victoria during their stay in town.

Mrs. T. G. Atkinson of Eureka has taken aparements at the Hotel Victoria, where she is to remain for several weeks.

Miss Cecilia O'Connor entertained at luncheon during the past week, her guests numbering a small coterie of friends who shared her hospitality at the Hotel Victoria, where Miss O'Connor is spending the winter.

Miss Daisy Ryan was another of the past week's luncheon hostesses, and her guests were invited to the Hotel Victoria.

Miss Alma Thane, who with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Thane has been domiciled at the Hotel Victoria for several months past, had a party of young friends as her guests at dinner there during the week.

Miss Dora Thayer of San Rafael presided at a prettily appointed dinner of eight covers at the Hotel Victoria, where the Thayers have been spending the winter. Miss Thayer's party occupied the artistic private dining room of the Victoria.

Mrs. H. H. McGowan and son of Paraiso Hot Springs, Monterey County, have been the guest of Mrs. Bemon Ogden at San Mateo.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Moore, M. M. Robbins Jr., Mrs. C. N. Beals, John E. Bennett, Roy Carruthers, E. Winsby, Martin Schneider, R. L. Perry, T. S. Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. E. Lydes, E. A. Clark and C. E. De Camp.

The Beringer Musical Club gave its fourteenth piano and vocal recital last week at Kohler & Chase Hall before an unusually enthusiastic audience. The surety and apparent ease with which every number of the program was given, made a deep impression upon the hearers. Prof. Jos. Beringer and Mr. Harry Samuels opened the program with Schumann's A minor Sonata for piano and violin, and vocal and piano selections were given by Miss Irene De Martini, Mrs. H. J. Widenmann, Mr. Harry Bultman and Miss Frances Westington, Miss Zdenka Buben, Miss Sadie Bultmann and Mr. Melton Mowbray.

Miss Jane Hotaling entertained a jolly house party recently at Sleepy Hollow in honor of Miss Page of Chicago. A few days ago Miss Hotaling was taken ill with the measels, so society will miss her for a few weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick V. Stott will leave this week for New York on a visit to the parents of Mr. Stott. They will be away five months.

My dear Bess:—

Apologies, a thousand of them, for not keeping you posted last week as to progress on my place. So many things happened I hadn't time to look at a pen. Tom who is really just as crazy as I about our new plaything insisted upon hunting up some of the old Italian places in San Francisco just to see if the country had spoiled our appetite for that sort of jaunting Sh! don't breathe it aloud, and neither did he, but I could see that the planting of the jonquil and narcissus in a correct line in our corner of the Crocker Tract was of far more importance to him than all the enchiladas and frijoles the Quarter could offer, good though they were.

We've been putting in trees all this week, nice big ones, so we wont have to wait years for them to be something more than twigs. And a whole hedge of bamboo. It is so feathery and graceful. One space we've reserved for a wild garden and have just thrown broadcast poppies, pink, yellow and crimson; bachelor buttons; some oats (so the bachelors may have the companionship they like) and daisies—doesn't that all sound fascinating?

In one corner some hollyhocks and sunflowers will very soon, in this adorable climate, be tall enough to peek over the wall they are to beautify. Come over soon and I will show you the enchanted spot.

Yours,

—Claire

Taking Pinero Frivolously

"Mid-Channel," the latest Pinero play in which Ethel Barrymore appeared in New York, has not been taken quite as seriously in London as the knighted author might wish. Max Beerbohm, no prude, called it "Mid-Gutter" and a weekly paper publishes this parody:

'Mid-Scandal, or, His House in Disorder

A Lurid Problem Play by Sir Arthur Pinero

Scene: Ballroom in darkest Mayfair. A retired alcove.

Cinderella (pale and haggard): No, I cannot marry you! I have a past! (Blue lights as customary in fashionable drawing-rooms.)

Prince (worn, dishevelled): A past! Naturally, if you are in the best society. Tell me, what is it? Put me out of this suspense! Have you written a book?

Cinderella: No—not so bad as that! (Moans.) I am in disguise—I am only a scullery-maid! (Muffled thunder.)

Prince: Ha! I suspected something of the sort. Your manners are not coarse enough for a girl in really good circles. But I—(he places his hand wearily to his forehead)—I, too, have a secret!

Cinderella (gasping): A secret?

Prince (hoarsely): Yes—I am a thief!

Cinderella: Of course—all the heroes in the higher-class drama are thieves just now.

Prince: I mean, I have stolen your shoe! (Produces the glass slipper from his coat-tails, together with a bottle of poison, and a bible.)

Cinderella: A thief! That accounts for your having robbed me of my heart! (Shivers. Takes revolver from her pocket provisionally.)

Prince: Ah! (Clutching poison bottle.)

Cinderella: Oh, oh! (Wrings her hands, balancing revolver on her head for the moment.)

Prince: Then this is the end? (Exit to the grounds outside in the darkness, where a revolver shot is heard.)

Cinderella: And we part for ever! (Drinks chloroform casually.)

The lights are lowered. Music—valse (Chopin's "Marche Funebre").

Orpheum Circuit Invades Europe

Morris Meyerfeld Jr., president of the Orpheum Circuit, who has been absent in the East for the past two months returned home last Sunday and announced that he had succeeded in the object of his visit. "From the moment," said Mr. Meyerfeld, "that Mr. Martin Beck and myself became aware that Mr. Alfred Butt of London, managing director of Europe's finest music hall, The Palace, had secured what is known abroad as 'The Barrasford Tour,' we determined if possible to obtain a part of it and as I have already stated we have been successful. By the new arrangement we become part owners of 'The Barrasford Tour,' consisting of The Alhambra, Paris; The Hippodrome, Liverpool; The Hippodrome, Leeds; and The Hippodrome, St. Helena, with joint booking associations with The Palace, London; The Palace, Manchester; The Alhambra, Glasgow; The Empire, Sheffield; The Empire, Nottingham, and other important British provincial music halls. Our affiliations with the Kohl and Castle, Frank Tate and Anderson and Ziegler theatres of the middle west and the important vaudeville houses of B. F. Keith, F. F. Proctor, Percy G. Williams, Hammerstein and M. Shea in New York and other large eastern cities, permit us to book acts from coast to coast and we shall now be able to continue them direct to England and France and to give them time in all the best music halls there. To the list of theatres already secured in the near future several other European music halls will shortly be added, including one in Berlin where Mr. Beck already holds a desirable location in Shiffsbauerdamn Strasse. Gradually the Orpheum will extend its field to Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Havana, and the principal capitals of the South American republics. We have theatres in Winnipeg and Duluth approaching completion and intend immediately to erect a beautiful Orpheum in Salt Lake City. The contracts for the New Orpheum in Los Angeles are now being let and it will open its doors this fall. We have purchased the Auditorium, Kansas City, and intend to devote it to popular priced vaudeville." Mr. Meyerfeld will leave for London in May to confer with his new associates.

"The Merry Widow" Returns

The gayest Viennese operetta that every came out of the music-mad capitol is "The Merry Widow," which plays a return engagement in this city at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks commencing Monday night, March 7, with matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays. Lehar, who wrote the music, has established himself as the only living successor to the line of light opera writers beginning with Offenbach and ending with Sullivan. He has all of the abandon and dizzy riotous melody of the Parisian composer and all of the scholarly and emotional effectiveness of the composer of "Pinafore." The book is ingenious and witty. That there isn't a dull moment in "The Merry Widow" is too well known and too extensively advertised to require mention. Mabel Wilber will be the Sonia, with George Dameral as the Prince Danilo. Others of prominence in the cast are Oscar Figman, William V. Strunz, Harold Blake, Charles Edward Wright, Sophie Barnard, Louida Hilliard, Winifred Marshall and Viola Napp. The Savage English grand opera orchestra will be under the direction of Frank Mandeville.

Robert Edeson at the Van Ness

Robert Edeson, than whom few players of the present generation enjoy greater favor with local theatregoers but whose remarkable success in the East has caused his visits here to be altogether too few and far between, returns next week to San Francisco, after an absence of five seasons. Beginning on Monday night he will appear at the Van Ness in his latest stellar vehicle, a play of modern American life, "A Man's a Man" by Anna Steele Richardson and Henry Leslie Friedenberg. This new drama which has been pronounced by critics in other cities as a better medium for the display of Mr. Edeson's talents than even "Strongheart" in which he scored so great a success, is one of the season's real successes and one of the most interesting native dramas of recent years. Differing radically from recent dramatic offerings, "A Man's a Man" treats of the evils of modern divorce from an entirely new viewpoint, and introduces Mr. Edeson in a brand new line of characterization. The scenes of the play are divided equally between New York City and the capital of a western state, and the story has as its basis the attempt of an unscrupulous mining magnate to debauch the legislature that he may gain success for the social and political ambitions his newly found riches have aroused in him. As is his custom Mr. Edeson brings with him a supporting company of unusual excellence.

The Myrtle Elvyn Concerts

That beautiful young American virtuosa, Miss Myrtle Elvyn, will give her first recital at the Garrick Theatre this Sunday afternoon, March 6, presenting an unusually varied and interesting program which will include the Leschetisky arrangements for left hand alone of the sextette from "Lucia," Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," some Chopin and Mendelsohn numbers, the Schubert-Liszt transcriptions of "Hark, Hark the Lark" and "The Erlking" and some novelties by Claud Debussy and Erich J. Wolff. The second concert will be given Thursday night when Schumann's "Scenes from Childhood" will be given complete and works by Bach-Tausig, Brahms, Chopin, MacDowell, Moskowski and Wagner-Liszt will be included in the offering and by request the artist will play Schulz-Evler "Arabesques" on "The Blue Danube Waltz." Miss Elvyn's farewell recital will be given Saturday afternoon, March 12, when a special program for students will be given. Among the works to be played are the Chopin "Sonata" in B flat minor (the one with the glorious funeral march), Schumann's "Toccata," Brahm's "Rhapsodie" in B minor and numbers by Mendelsohn, Schumann-Liszt, Schubert-Liszt, Moszkowski, Dvorak and Liszt.

"The Gingerbread Man" at the Savoy

The last performances of Rex Beach's stirring story of Alaskan life, "The Spoilers," will take place at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the matinee Sunday that always welcome musical fantasy, "The Gingerbread Man," will be presented in San Francisco for the third time. This is one of the red letter events of the season and the only regret is that the engagement is limited to one week. "The Gingerbread Man" is a man of quality, as his cohorts of vocalists and comedians, the dainty music of A. Baldwin Sloane and the clever lines of Frederick G. Rankin, will attest. There is quality in "The Gingerbread Man," and also class, and that statement covers a great deal of ground. The cast includes Ross Snow, one of the funniest men on the stage and a tremendous favorite here, Wally Helston, an acrobatic dancer and comedian of rare repute, Garrick Major, a splendid baritone and actor, Inez Girard and Helen Keers, prima donnas, Rose Murray, the daintiest soubrette on the American stage, and important others, including a large and comely chours. The usual matinee will be given on Saturday, with a bargain matinee on Thursday. The big musical review, "Wine, Woman and Song," which held the boards of the Circle Theatre, New York, for four hundred performances, will follow "The Gingerbread Man" at the Savoy Theatre, the cast including Bonita, the famous beauty.

New Leading Man at the Alcazar

As a medium of introducing their new leading man the Alcazar managers selected "Classmates," and the play will be given its first stock company presentation in San Francisco next Monday evening. It was written by William C. DeMille and Margaret Turnbull, and served Robert Edeson as a starring vehicle throughout one season. In the role created by Mr. Edeson, that of a West Point cadet, Mr. Desmond scored the most emphatic success of his recent engagement in Kansas City. It not only enables him to appear to eye-pleasing advantage in the natty uniform of a West Pointer, but gives him opportunity to prove that he can act impressively without sartorial aid. His best work is done in the third act, where he is seen in tattered garb and seemingly at starvation's door in a South American jungle. In the cast with Mr. Desmond will be the full strength of the Alcazar company, Evelyn Vaughan having the role of Sylvia and Will R. Walling appearing as Stafford, with all the other favorites in equally well-fitting parts and a number of extra young people to fill the stage pictures in the first act. The jungle scene promises to be one of the most beautiful ever displayed in the Alcazar.

Good Features at the Orpheum

Lottie Williams, a great favorite in this city and for some time past a successful star in the East in popular plays, will appear in Edmund Day's one-act play, "On Stony Ground" at the Orpheum next week. Miss Williams as a slangy happy-go-lucky waitress in a cheap restaurant, has a role which exhibits her at her very best. The Charles Ahearn Cycling Comedians who came direct to the Orpheum Circuit from the Hippodrome, London, where they were an immense sensation, will be included in the novelties. Charles and Lily Charlene will present their drawing-room entertainment. Mr. Charlene is a remarkably expert juggler and Mrs. Charlene is not only a skillful xylophonist but also a very beautiful woman who costumes handsomely. Mank's All-Star Trio which consists of Harry W. Cline, the world's champion billiardist, Calvin W. Demerest, ex-champion and Albert P. Cutler who has challenged Cline for the world's championship trophy, will be a special feature of next week's program only. They will introduce a unique, scientific and amusing sketch by James Madison called "A Night in a Billiard Parlor," which is an excellent vehicle for fancy exhibition shots. Next week will be the last of Felix and Barry, Winona Winter, the little Cheer-Up Girl, Reynold and Donegan and Clara Belle Jerome, assisted by William Seymour and her Eight Dancing Toodles.

Tilly Koenen, the Lieder Contralto

The next great vocal star to be offered by the Greenbaum management will be Tilly Koenen, a contralto from Holland who is said to be a marvelous interpreter of the lieder of all countries as well as a contralto with an exceptional range and great beauty of voice quality. She has created a furor in every city fortunate enough to secure her for an appearance and has been recognized by the leading critics as one of the very finest concert artists that have ever visited America. Her programs are of exceptional variety and interest and at her opening concert announced for Sunday afternoon, March 13, at the Garrick Theatre she will sing a long and attractive list of works. Equally varied and delightful offerings are promised for the other concerts scheduled for Thurdsay night, March 17 and Sunday afternoon, March 20.

"Light Eternal" at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing next Monday evening, the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse will revive one of their earliest successes, "The Light Eternal," the piece that was given its first professional production by them nearly five years ago. It is a play with an unusual history. Martin V. Merle, the author, wrote it while a student at Santa Clara College, and it was first performed by his fellow students at the college theatre. Its success was so great that requests came to the college faculty to allow a production of it in San Francisco. They consented, and the drama crowded the Alhambra Theatre for three nights. Later on Mr. Merle rewrote it, introducing female characters, and it was then that the Bishop players took it up and started the play on its career as a success that has made it a familiar one in every city of the country. Since it has been seen in Oakland the play has had the advantage of a New York City production, and the polishing that comes with it and is now, according to the author, a better play than ever before. Sydney Ayres appears next week as the young hero, Marcus Valerius and Elizabeth Stewart who has been specially engaged during the illness of Blanche Hall, will be seen as the Princess. All the other favorites will be found in the cast, and the usual excellent scenery will be provided. "The Girl of the Golden West" follows.

Maud Allan Coming

At last San Francisco is to see one of the barefoot dancers of whom we have read so much and from all accounts by far the most charming and graceful of them, Miss Maud Allan. It is a strange fact but the three most famous classic dancers hail from San Francisco: Maud Allan, Isidora Duncan and Gertrude Hoffman. Miss Allan is not only a great stage favorite but a social favorite as well and it is no uncommon thing to see the equipages of some of the foremost families of England drive up to the theatre with the family escorting Miss Allan to her work. Four appearances will be made in this city and one in Oakland under the joint direction of Will L. Greenbaum and Martin Beck. In order to give Miss Allan's work the proper setting an orchestra of half a hundred players is already being organized by Mr. Paul Steindorff. These performances will certainly be a novelty.

At the Macdonough

"The Gingerbread Man," one of the most delightful comedy operas of recent years, will be at the Macdonough for the matinee and night of Friday, March 4 and the night of March 5. Starting Monday, March 7, McIntyre and Heath will play an engagement of one week at the same theatre with matinees on Saturday and Sunday. They will give "In Hayti," the very funny play with which they are making all San Francisco laugh at the present time.

Klaw and Erlanger's massive production of "The Round Up" will follow "The Merry Widow" at the Columbia Theatre. It is said to be even a greater presentation than the managers' "Ben Hur."

LOTTIE WILLIAMS
The favorite comedienne who will appear next week at the Orpheum.

Odd Things in the World

One of the features of night life in the New York Tenderloin that surprises and amuses visitors from out of town is the stunt that several proprietors of the gaiest and most unconventional restaurants prepare for their patrons. They hire a quartet of well dressed men and women, give them a table prominently situated, serve them wine and an assortment of dishes calculated to attrat attention, and make a signal at the proper moment. Suddenly the four arise and sing a popular song, accompanied by the orchestra. Strangers in New York are not expected to know that the quartete is hired for the occasion and is made up of course of professional singers. They get the impression that the performers are well known Broadway artists who just happened to be taking supper in the restaurant and are singing to amuse themselves. The restaurant proprietors say that the trick has a distinct commercial value.

On his way home one evening last October from Karbenning railway station, in central Sweden, a young man when passing through a small wood was vigorously attacked by an eagle owl. Alighting on his shoulder, the bird inflicted some severe wounds with its powerful beak and claws, and when beaten off it carried off his cap in token of victory. Some years ago several similar attacks by eagle owls occurred during the summer months in the province of Vester Gotland, in one of which an unfortunate old man lost an eye. A correspondent of the Swedish periodical Fran Skog och Sio states that in the part of Vermeland to which he belongs there was an eagle owl which became well known for its repeated attacks on human beings who chanced to come near its abode. While cutting timber one day a man was assailed by the bird, which drove its claws into the upper part of his body. He managed to get rid of it, but it at once came on again, when a blow from his axe put an end to its further attentions. A peasant in the parish of Stammar, Nerike, had a similar experience in April last. He was fetching water from a lake close by his house when an eagle owl suddenly flew at him. A kick made it retire a few yards, when it came in contact with the fence. This seemed to irritate it, for it returned to the attack, but the man seized it by the neck, tucked it under his arm and carried it off home. On the way the owl's mate kept flying around in unpleasantly close proximity. Ultimately the captor had to despatch his prisoner, his wife and children being much scared at its formidable aspect.

superficial chronicles or vulgar dreams of the scribblers. Purporting to be biographies of Lincoln, they have been written by journalists or lawyers who knew as little of the man of whom they wrote as they did of the dwellers in other planets. The only at all interpretative biography of Lincoln—and by far the best—has been written by a Quaker Englishman, Henry Bryan Binns.

Lincoln was one of those mysterious personal forces that bring with them the silences from which they come; that tarry a little while upon an earth that never really sees or hears them; that light up the thick darkness for the moment they are here; that remain inscrutable to the end; and that go back into the silences, without any man knowing whence they come or whither they go. They come, they go, as if earth were a momentary halting-place upon a long quest. They are always the supreme national types; and they are always essentially unknown by the nations to which they come—either glorified by the nation's rejection or falsified by its acceptance. Yet always are they so much more than this. They are universal types as well—more infinite and unsearchable than the heavenly spaces. As one of these, Lincoln looms across the centuries, above racial changes and the shifts of nations, belonging at last to no time, to no special people. He is more akin to Aeschylus or Beethoven, to Moses or Mohammed, to Jesus or Mazzini, than to those whose names we commonly set beside his own. He differs from each of these, of course, as these differ one from another; but he is of the same mystery, the same power, the same glory. We may think of him as the greatest mystic who ever took to politics. He did not show what he saw nor the way in which he walked. There were many things he might have revealed; but he knew the world could not bear them. He said but little of what he really thought; and the little he said was as if by accident, flashing from the clouds that enveloped him.

And what he said, and what his life meant, has had no actual bearing upon our subsequent national development. To truly say this, one has only to glance at the uninterrupted decadence that has proceeded since his time. The declivity down which the Gadarene swine precipitated themselves into the sea is not so steep as is the descent of the nation from Abraham Lincoln to Theodore Roosevelt. This hero, the most deceptive and degrading personal force of our public life and history, has carried the nation in the hollow of his hand; and he may do so again, when he returns from the joy of his African slaughter.

The nation has fallen on flagrant times. We are deep in political decadence. Doubtless the world has never known such moral pretentiousness, such worthless bombast as the America of the present presents. Probably there has never been such brazen and unashamed hypocrisy, such inadequate and insincere professions of reform, such spiritual rottenness, such inclusive corruption of the human soul. In spite of the criminal character of our municipal and state and national Governments, in spite of the increasing brutality of our public life, in spite of a suppression of free speech that will soon place us behind Russia, we still boast ourselves the great free nation. And we impose this falsehood upon Europe. But in no nation of the world is there so little freedom for the human spirit, so little intellectual integrity, so little moral initiative, as in America. The Puritan blight is indeed upon the land. The real America, the America of Lincoln and the middle rivers, the America of the pioneers and the prairies, is in the tomb. Or let us say that America is unborn.

But the real America will come unto birth at last. We shall have a harsh and terrible capitalist culmination. We shall have the Empire we want, with Caesars more ruthless than Rome ever knew. Our economic machine, and its inevitable political form, will prove the most destructive of historic tyrannies. The new Dark Ages, spreading from America, may envelop the world. From America will proceed the great catastrophe, the breaking up of what we call civilization. But there will arise a new America, a new human type. It will be the America that we Americans do not now know—the America whose seed is the frontier people of the first West, whose sign is Abraham Lincoln, and whose fulfilment will be a commonwealth that is at once economic and social and spiritual; a commonwealth that is the living synthesis of inclusive association and unhindered individual liberty.

Their game was a success. The waiter spoke in an undertone and walked softly; they smiled behind his back. Lucia peeled a peach, and breaking off a piece offered it to Frederic with a loving gesture. Frederic took it and kissed her fingers. The waiter saw and pretended not to see, hurrying away for the coffee. They shook hands and congratulated each other with admiration. Never in their lives had they been more entertained.

They found it all quite natural, even their own mutual indifference. Or, rather, the position did not appear a dangerous one, so serene were their hearts. They continued the game like two children, satisfied with a new play discovered by chance. Frederic understood because he had lived; Lucia guessed because she was a woman; and it interested them both.

"Sir Frederic, do you not think that we ought to smoke cigarettes?"

"As we light them we must exchange glances, then we can exchange cigarettes."

"And watch the smoke sadly."

When the waiter came to clear the table they were smoking. A noise of wheels was heard outside. Lucia gave a cry and almost fell into Frederic's arms, trembling.

"Good God! You will kill me with this emotion," he murmured, supporting her, and pretending to reassure her.

"It is a cart, lady," the waiter ventured to remark.

"Very good. You may go," said Frederic severely.

What hearty laughter They had not laughed thus in years. They felt invigorated, refreshed by this July afternoon. They sat discussing all sorts of things, as in the park, and joked over the manners and customs of the whole world. Every now and then the waiter passed the open doorway without turning. They smiled again and renewed their conversation. They left after an hour of chat, descending the stairs arm in arm. Turning they saw in the doorway the cook, the scullion, and the waiter, looking after them.

And they went away gaily, refreshed and calmed, through the dust.

Arrived at their hotel, Lucia slept soundly for three hours. That evening she did not see Frederic. The following morning she received a telegram from her husband, summoning her to Milan for a tour of the lakes. This was very welcome, for Castellamare was becoming monotonous. She wrote a note of farewell to Frederic, and departed by the earliest possible train. Frederic read the note as he was shaving, shrugged his shoulders, and went for a bath.

For three years they never saw each other, heard no news of each other. But the very first time they met again, one evening in a box at the theatre in Florence, without speaking, without touching hands, before many people, their eyes met in a glance of ardor which united their two lives. And it was a stormy tempest of passion that overwhelmed them.

tle Henry!" (one of his sons), and, turning to me sobbing, "Order them to go back and look for the child. Quickly! The Insurrectos are going to take him."

He died on the 22d, during the afternoon. He had a good heart, too simple perhaps; and the country has been just to him. His memory will never be blotted from mine. God keep him in peace.

As there was now no other lieutenant left, I had immediately and officially to assume the command, with all its incidents and dangers. For some days the command had practically been mine, but now the circumstances could not but be aggravated and the difficulties seriously increased by our recent loss. I well knew what was expected of me in the future, if I grew not disheartened on the way, which was yet very long and thorny. But I was still in good health, and I did not falter in my determination for a single instant.

It was now the one hundred and forty-fifth day of the siege. There remained under my command thirty-five privates, a trumpeter, and three corporals, almost all of them ill. To care for these sick men, I had only one doctor and one Hospital Corps man. To feed them, I had a few sacks of flour, all fermented and forming a tough mass, and a few other sacks that had contained chick peas, but now had nothing in them but dust and weevil; not a scrap of beef, that from Australia having been used up during the first week in July; a few pieces of bacon, swarming with maggots and, moreover, repugnant to the taste; a very little very bad coffee; of wine, which had been finished in August, only the casks; of beans, a very few, and bad; plenty of sugar, but not a grain of salt (which we could, however, have easily had while we were yet trading with the people of the town), which we had been in want of ever since we shut ourselves up in the church; and some tins of badly damaged sardines.

This was all very little, considering the progress of the epidemic, the fatigues of the siege, and the remoteness of any possible relief. But we still had enough ammunition, a flag to defend while there was a cartridge left, and a sacred depository, that of the remains of our dead comrades, to guard against profanation by the enemy. It was possible for us to resist, and we resisted.

To deceive the enemy as to the condition of his force Captain Cerezo adopted a very original ruse:

I continued to refuse to receive flags of truce. But since this might cause the enemy to suspect that it was due to the discouragement of the soldiers, and as these same communications, dangerous as they might be, often brought us something from the outside, and always something new, which relieved the tedium that was oppressing and consuming us, I thought to deceive the enemy and at the same time to raise our spirits and divert our minds by devoting some portion of the time to merry-makings, which, although forced, might cover up the real situation to those both within and without the church, and also enliven our minds and hide our anguish.

These so-called merry-makings consisted of hand-clappings, merry cries, and snatches of song, which angered the enemy and made him cry out, "Sing away! you will soon have to weep"; and which kindled in us the recollection of other and happy days, and of that country to which perhaps we would never return.

Recollections so bitter! Comedy! pure comedy! in which we forced ourselves to be actors in spite of our wills, which opposed it. Painful recollections! but which, nevertheless, truly strengthened us.

In order to celebrate those merry-makings, those masks of laughter with which we tried to cover our faces, corroded already as with cancer, I ordered out into the corral every afternoon all persons not on duty, whether sick or well, as long as they could move their hands, sing a verse, or contribute in any way to the hilarity.

As already said, this maddened the enemy, who exhausted his repertory of insults and threats, and tried to reduce us to silence by redoubling his fire. But he only succeeded in stimulating us, for the simple reason that all his vociferation and firing acted on us as a sort of provocation, a sort of stimulant, like the excitement that warms one up, in a contest of skill.

Some idea of the extremity to which the besieged were reduced may be inferred from the fact that about this time the captain and the surgeon used to steal out of the church at night, risking death, for the purpose of eating—grass! The craving for green food was irresistible. Here is the account of a successful sally:

On the day following my conversation with the doctor, December 14, at half past ten or eleven in the morning, a most unusual hour for such an enterprise, I called Corporal Jose Olivares Conejeros, a man of great courage and completely in my confidence, and ordered him to take fourteen of the most suitable men; to go out with them secretly, crawling one by one, the only way possible, through the opening that led into the trench of the sacristy; and, when all were ready, the bayonets being fixed without noise, to make a sudden rush, deployed as skirmishers, and surround the house that was on the north side of the church.

One of the men, carrying long pieces of bamboo and some rags well soaked in petroleum, was to set fire to the house; the others to fight desperately and resolutely. The rest of the force, which I posted at the loopholes, were to support the attack, to increase the confusion by their firing, to cause as many losses as possible, and to prevent the putting out of the fires.

Everything was carried out as planned, and with results that were so necessary to us. I tried to pick off the sentry who was on post at the house referred to, and was well entrentched; but he very soon saw my men and fled, blind with fear and spreading consternation among his own people.

The flames themselves, the rapidity with which they spread through the town, the impetuosity of the charge, the precision of the fire which we poured into them from the church (although we tried to avoid the useless expenditure of ammunition), and the irresistible terror that was communicated from one to another, promptly decided a general flight, which cleared the field in less time than it takes to tell the story.

Apart from the surprise, which had just produced one of those miracles such as are related in the military history of all time, there were two powerful reasons, two fixed notions, latent in the Filipino mind, which no doubt contributed to the result: one was the traditional one of Spanish superiority, which we had just demonstrated; the other was the violence, the fury, with which they must have considered us possessed.

On account of the great confusion, we could not estimate the enemy's losses, but I suppose they were not wanting. I have since heard that one of their leaders, Gomez Ortiz, he of the time of the suspension of hostilities, was killed. One of their sentries, stationed on the south, was killed and remained where he fell, abandoned by his friends. The flames of the fire, passing over him, destroyed his body in a short time.

The town was destroyed, except a few of the more distant houses, which we left standing, so that in case any troops should come to relieve us, the necessary lodgings for them would not be wanting.

We proceeded at once to destroy the trenches that surrounded us so near at hand; and, as the fire had razed the fortified houses which served as flanks and points of support, we soon cleared a regular military zone of sufficient width to allow us to open the doors in the south face of the church, which had been closed since the beginning of the siege.

To this advantageous expansion, which, aside from bettering our local condition, afforded us freedom for offensive returns, we had the satisfaction of adding a good supply of pumpkins, pumpkin leaves, and all the savory fruit of the orange trees in the plaza—whatever might be, or appeared to us to be, edible.

If to all this it be added that we did not have even one man wounded, I do not think it an exaggeration to regard that rash, mad enterprise as a fruitful and victorious feat of arm. The importance of it should be measured by the evils it remedied.

With the airing of the church, the new eatables so fresh and green, as the doctor had craved them, and the hope which our success could not fail to inspire, it was soon apparent that the epidemic was abating.

The vigilant enemy being farther away, it was now possible, when the firing was not too severe, to allow two men to go out daily and bring in sackfuls of pumpkin leaves, plantain shoots, and various herbs; with which was increased and improved the already scanty ration that we could deal out from our provisions. Foreseeing that if the siege should become formal again, it would not be possible to secure this store, I arranged to provide a supply more nearly at hand. Finally, taking advantage of the time given me by the stupefaction of the enemy. I succeeded in clearing the corral of all the filth it contained.

The question of edible vegetables made it necessary for us to utilize as a garden all the available ground, having in view the possibility of gathering them even though we should again be hemmed in closely. For this purpose we worked a small piece next to the entrance to our trench, and in it we planted peppers and wild tomatoes, which are abundant in those countries. The trench itself and its ditches were covered with pumpkin vines, which in a short time gave them the appearance of a green field.

All bore promptly; but the pumpkins, much deteriorated, were no bigger than hen's eggs, partly due also to the thickness of the sowing. We had to pull them up when they had reached this stage, because otherwise they would fall of themselves and it would not be possible to eat them.

Auto Notes

What promises to be the most unique and crucial test to which an automobile has been subjected is the proposed run of the E-M-F from Khartoum to Cairo, Egypt, in the reception to be tendered ex-President Roosevelt upon his arrival in the Soudan. An invitation to the Roosevelt party offering the free conveyance of the ex-President and attendants in E-M-F cars for 1,500 miles has been forwarded by George C. John, New York representative of the E-M-F, to the ex-President, care of Sir Reginald Wingate, sirdar of Egypt. In the event of the program meeting with the ex-President's approval, this will be the first time that an American built automobile will have traversed that section of the world. The plan is to meet the Roosevelt party at Khartoum and then follow the Nile to Cairo, where the automobile enthusiasts will arrange a banquet with the assistance of the leading citizens of the city in honor of the great American. At this festivity it is the intention of the E-M-F people to present to the ex-President a loving cup appropriately inscribed as a token of the love and esteem in which he held by patriotic Americans everywhere. All members of the American colony in Cairo are to be invited to the banquet. Special arrangements will be instituted to convey whatever game the Roosevelt party desire to bring along, and a number of E-M-F cars will be refitted especially for this purpose. E-M-F automobiles will also be at the disposal of messengers, and no detail that will add to the pleasure and comfort of the Roosevelt party will be overlooked. All machines in the Roosevelt column will be decorated with the national colors, in addition to flags of all nations. The desert tour of the E-M-F cars will afford the most striking illustration of the advance of western civilization yet offered the Egyptians. A product of the youngest nation, they will show the oldest country in point of civilization how transportation is effected in the new world.

The Diamond spirit of progress is well typified by several Diamond adjusters who have quarters in the Akron, Ohio, Y. M. C. A. Building. At regular intervals these men meet and discuss the fine points of their specialty. A feature of this discussion is an adjustment of tire trouble with the user who has a grievance against Diamond Tires. Of course, the kicker isn't a real user of Diamond Tires—enough couldn't be found to carry on the debates—but a man not employed at the Diamond factory usually represents the owner with the grievance. He has a different kick each time, and backs up each with a different mood,—angry or impassionate—excited or self-possessed—and so on. The adjuster meets each mood to the best of his ability and strives to make a perfectly fair, amicable and satisfactory adjustment. An expert is always on hand to act as judge and he decides whether the adjuster carried his case through properly. Following the adjustment, there is a general discussion in which the flaws—if there were any—are picked out and criticized, and the good points emphasized.

While the E. R. Thomas Motor Company have not made any decided changes in their 1910 models, particularly in their two larger ones (the Models F and K), their Little Six and Town Car show several refinements and additions. For 1911 the company will market three chassis, a Thomas Model "M" 6-40, the "K" 6-70 and the "R" Town Car 4-28. The new Long Stroke motor which has attained such popularity in Europe and which engineers have conceded to be the best form of engine construction has been made one of the essential features of both the new Thomas Model M and Town Car. The advantage of the Long Stroke engine is that it does not have to revolve so fast to deliver its power. In other words, the long stroke motor will wear for a much longer time than a short stroke motor.

Mr. Harry L. Todd of the Anglo & London Paris National Bank, San Francisco, has purchased an E-M-F.

Discarding all consideration of motor efficiency, finish and so forth, there are, after all, four things to consider in the purchase of an automobile, said Calvin C. Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Co., local representatives of the Chalmers Motor Company. "Those are the elements of safety. In using an automobile the first and most important consideration is whether or not it is safe. The elements of safety are the first things I always point out in talking to a prospective customer. And all other things being equal, one should certainly use that car in which the elements of safety have been most satisfactorily worked out. These elements are, briefly, a strong frame, strong steering connections, strong wheels well fastened to the axles, and big and strong brakes. Not only do I believe that the record of the Chalmers car proves it superior to other makes in motor efficiency and general dependability, but certainly no car has such provisions for the safety of passengers. Note the frame; of channel section, heat treated steel, larger and better made than in any other car of the same weight and power. The steering connections are the best, strong enough for a 60 horsepower car. The wheels are of extra strength and the rear wheels are in addition to the usual hub flanges and bolts, bolted to the brake drums. The brakes are really in a class by themselves. The foot-controlled transmission brake is plenty strong and sufficient enough for all ordinary uses. But in addition to this there is the emergency brake on the rear axle, with stronger and wider bands than on any car of the same power. But such is the power of the transmission brake that it is a rare thing to see a Chalmers driver use the emergency brake for the purpose of stopping his car. In my opinion, these elements of safety have done as much as victories in road and track races, endurance contests and hill climbs to give Chalmers cars their reputation for absolute dependability."

Charles C. Hampton, Marysville agent for S. C. Chapman, is in town looking for more Oaklands. The demand for this car has become so great in the territory controlled by Mr. Hampton that he fears that he will not be able to secure enough cars to go around.

Hichens' "Bella Donna"

Though it is by no means essential to the understanding and appreciation of Robert Hichens' new novel, "Bella Donna," the finest piece of work which he has yet produced, an additional pleasure is in store for readers who are already familiar with his grand descriptive volume concerning the temples of Egypt, for the scene of the story is laid almost altogether in the Nile valley, and the historic monuments are in its background. The brooding mystery of the desert and the mysticism of the Orient fill its pages, though the beautiful lady whose career it concerns is at once the most modern and the most ancient of her sex. Mrs. Ruby Chepstow of London was divorced by her wealthy and aged husband, and providence in the form of death intervened in time to rescue her co-respondent from a marriage with her. Greedy, selfish and egotistical, she elected to make the most profitable use of her remarkable beauty, but along with her greed for possession there went a corresponding passion for extravagance, so that, having passed her fortieth year, and virtually "played herself out," she was face to face with comparative poverty, middle age and for her, obscurity. By the time she had reached this crisis in her affairs there arrived in England Nigel Armine, a young man in comfortable circumstances, heir apparent of a title and the large estates of his brother, Lord Harwich, who was ten years older, childless and in a condition of health which made life extremely precarious. Armine, who was deeply interested in Egyptian land projects, had come home on a short visit, and it was his ill fortune to be thrown into contact with Mrs. Chepstow. He was an ardent enthusiast, a born leader of forlorn hopes and lost causes, singularly trusting and innocent for a man of his experience, and in him "Bella Donna" saw her opportunity, and at once began to dress and act her part. Nigel's most intimate friend was a fashionable physician who was as much of a psychologist as a physicist, and, however difficult it would have been under the most favorable conditions, to have enlightened Armine, Mrs. Chepstow cleverly took the lead and closed the doctor's mouth effectively. Armine was optimistic. He believed in the regeneration of mankind in the concrete and in the abstract simply through faith and timely upholding, and Mrs. Chepstow managed her case so adroitly that he was readily convinced that she was victimized by the inhumanity of womankind. He drew a parallel between her case and that of Mrs. Browning, and was satisfied that if she could be removed from her uncongenial atmosphere of ostracism and distrust, the good which he believed her natural character would flourish apace. First in love with his own enthusiasm, he speedily fell in love with her, married her and carried her off to Egypt, where, he thought, she would take an interest in his projects for his sake if not for their own. Mrs. Chepstow had never been in love with anything or any one but her own sweet self, and her plan in marrying Armine was to become, in brief time, Lady Harwich, and by reason of her rank and her regeneration, to take a place in British society where she would be in a position to pay off old scores. Armine was so simple-hearted that it never once entered his mind that she had considered the probability of his succeeding to the title. He made no mention of the imminent birth of an heir to his brother, and when, in the course of a few weeks, there were twin sons born to him, he was genuinely and unaffectedly glad. The effect on Mrs. Armine was precisely the opposite, but clever actress that she was, she contrived to make him believe that her inward rage was caused only by the assumption that he had thought she would be so affected. On the steamer leaving Naples for Cairo there chanced to be a Turkish Egyptian millionaire, Mamoud Baroudi, who was enough of a psychologist and connoiseur in women to read Mrs. Armine correctly, and, directly that she learned of the disappointment of her ambition, he being at hand, she began a flirtation which was actively carried on during Armine's absence at the scene of his work, and later, almost under his eye lashes. A more mismated couple, a more thoroughly hoodwinked spouse, it is impossible to imagine, or a more heartlessly clever woman. Hitherto "Bella Donna" had had but to signify her desire and she had men at her feet, but Baroudi was a new species, and his lordly indifference to her inclinations, his calm superposition of his own desires, was a spur to her infatuation, for infatuated she was, too deeply infatuated and too calmly certain of her own dominance to make allowance for the unknown—the Oriental temperament. Baroudi was in high favor with the English officials and he had neither intention nor inclination to do anything that could antagonize them. His rule was to make gain without loss, and he understood perfectly that any open alliance with the wife of an Englishman of good repute would interfere with both his pleasures and his profits. Despite his Occidental education, he was thoroughly Oriental at heart, and secret intrigue had charm that open dealing did not possess. One of the diversions which Armine planned for his wife was a journey by boat up the Nile. When they began the pilgrimage he was a thoroughly fit and healthy man, but in the course of a very brief while he became ill of some mysterious disease diagnosed by the tourist doctor, after data furnished by Mrs. Armine as sunstroke. Dr. Myer Isaacson, far away in London, received a gossipy letter from a patient of his traveling in Egypt in which she mentioned the condition Armine appeared to be in, the letter coming on the heels of Armine's own reference to his superb health. Isaacson both disliked and distrusted Mrs. Armine as much as he liked and trusted his friend, and almost on the spur of the moment he decided to take a needed vacation and go to Egypt without announcing his intention to the Armines. Apparently Armine's illness was a topic of general comment, so much so that Isaacson, a special student of poisons, came to the conclusion that it was no natural or climatic ailment that affected him and made hasty preparations to overtake the Armines. The lady's evident fright, her artful lying and misrepresentation, her determined efforts to keep the doctor from seeing the patient confirmed his suspicions, and brought him to threaten police interference if she did not step aside. Balked of her determination to remove her uncongenial husband, who all this time was growing more firmly attached to what he believed to be his devoted nurse, "Bella Donna," driven to desperation in her desire to be with Baroudi, takes the final step of forcing herself on him. Already she has precipitated a quarrel between Armine and Dr. Isaacson, for Isaacson, determined to save his friend, has accused Mrs. Armine of administering poison to him. Now, Armine, still believing in her honor, tells her of the accusation and she, hoping that he will discard her and that Baroudi will then be forced to take her in, confesses the crime and flies to her Egyptian lover who, however, true to his rule of getting what he wants without losing anything, turns her out sans ceremony. Now she turns again to Armine, but Dr. Isaacson having been called to minister to him by one of the oriental servants, sees her and closes the shutters, and our last glimpse of this most amazing adventuress is as "she made her way to the gate of the garden, passed out to the deserted track beyond, and disappeared into the darkness, going blindly towards the distant hills that keep the Arabian desert." Though the backbone of the plot promises little that is appetizing, the novel is singularly free from any suggestion of grossness. It does not promise "pleasant entertainment," but readers who look for something besides the sensation of being tickled with a straw will find a full meal of strong meat presented to them, and though there are five hundred and twenty-seven pages of medium fine print there is nothing that can be spared. The descriptive portions are most interesting and the revelations of Oriental character enlightening. "Bella Donna" is easily one of the greatest books of the year, and the absence of carelessness and slipshodness in the writing, faults almost universal in these days, would alone attract attention to it. Published by the J. B. Lippincott Co. of Philadelphia.

The New Hudson Touring Car has just arrived and been put on exhibition. This five passenger machine which is becoming markedly popular in the East, is attracting a great deal of attention in San Francisco. It will sell for $1300 delivered here.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED TO THE EXECUTOR FOR THE SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5260, Dept. No. 10.

In the matter of the Estate of TERESA MURPHY, Deceased.

Valentine J. Smyth, as the Executor of the Last Will and Testament of TERESA MURPHY, deceased, having this day presented to this Court a verified petition praying for an Order authorizing and directing him to sell, as a whole or in parcels, and at either public or private sale, the real property and the whole thereof belonging to the Estate of said decedent, which is in said petition particularly described, and it appearing to this Court, from such petition, that it is necessary to sell the real estate and the whole thereof belonging to said estate for the purpose of paying the debts against said estate and the expenses and charges of administration, and it also appearing from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate, and those interested therein, to sell the said real estate and the whole thereof, for the purposes and reasons set forth in said petition; and this Court having thereupon and now and here directed that said petition be filed herein, and the same now having been filed accordingly, and being now on file herein:

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court at the Courtroom of Department Number 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, at the Southeast Corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Tuesday, the 15th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said executor for the sale of the real estate, and for the sale of the whole thereof, and for the sale of the same at either public or private sale, as said Executor shall judge to be most beneficial for the said Estate.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published once a week for four (4) successive weeks prior to the said 15th day of March, 1910, in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 7th day of February, 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 26,821.

HARDA ZOIE, Plaintiff, vs.
NICHOLAS ZOIE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Nicholas Zoie, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and abandonment of the plaintiff without any sufficient cause or reason and on the further ground of defendant's wilful failure and neglect to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life while having the ability so to do; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1909.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,115, Department No. 4.

In the Matter of the Application of JOSEPH KASIMER JANKOWSKY to Change Name.

It appearing from the written application filed in the above entitled Court on the 17th day of February, 1910, by the above named Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky praying for an order that he be permitted to change his present name, to-wit: Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky to that of Joseph Kasimer John, and that he is a resident of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California: and,

Good cause appearing to me therefore, it is ordered that all persons interested in the above entitled matter are hereby directed to be and appear before the above entitled Court in Department No. 4 thereof at its Courtroom in the Grant Building at the Southeast Corner of Seventh and Market Streets, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of April, 1910, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. and then and there show cause if any they have why the application of Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky for change of his name to Joseph Kasimer John should not be granted.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order to show cause be published for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which the above Court finds to be the one most likely to give notice to the parties interested in the hearing of said petition and the granting thereof. Weather Lore

If the horns of the new moon are but slightly tipped downward, moderate rains may be looked for; if much tipped, expect a downpour. On the other hand, if the horns are evenly balanced, it is a sure sign of dry weather. Some one says in Adam Bede, "There's no likelihood of a drop now an' the moon lies like a boat there." The popular notion throughout New England is that when the new moon is turned downward, it cannot hold water. Hence the familiar sayings of a wet or a dry moon.

If the Stormy Petrel (Mother Cary's Chicken) is seen following in the wake of a ship at sea, all sailors know that a storm is brewing, and that it is time to make all snug on board. As touching this superstition, I find the following entry in the Rev. Richard Mather's Journal: "This day, and two days before, we saw following ye ship a little bird, like a swallow, called a Petterill, which they say doth follow ships against foule weather."

Therefore, in honest Jack's eyes, to shoot one of these little wanderers of the deep, not only would invite calamity, but would instantly bring down a storm of indignation on the offender's head. And why, indeed, should this state of mind in poor Jack be wondered at when he hears so much about kraaken, mermaids, sea-serpents, and the like chimera, and when those who walk the quarter-deck readily lend themselves to the fostering of his delusions?

A mare's tail in the morning is another sure presage of foul weather. This consists in a long, low-hanging streak of murky vapor, stretching across a wide space in the heavens, and looking for all the world like the trailing smoke of some ocean steamer that is sometimes seen long before the steamer heaves in sight. The mare's tail is really the black signal of the advancing storm, drawn with a smutty hand across the fair face of the heavens. Hence the legend—

"Mackerel sky and mares' tails
Make lofty ships carry low sails."

If the hedgehog comes out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and sees his shadow, he goes back to sleep again, knowing that the winter is only half over. Hence the familiar prediction—

"If Candlemas Day is fair and clear,
There'll be two winters in the year."

The same thing is said of the bear, in Germany, as of the hedgehog or woodchuck.

The Germans say that the badger peeps out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and if he finds snow on the ground, he walks abroad; but if the sun is shining, he draws back into his hole again. At any rate, the habits of this predatory little beast are considered next to infallible by most country-folk in New England.

A similar prediction carries this form: On Candlemas Day just so far as the sun shines in, just so far will the snow blow in.

"As far as the sun shines in on Candlemas Day
So far will the snow blow in before May:
As far as the snow blows in on Candlemas Day
So far will the sun shine in before May."

From these time-honored prophecies is deduced the familiar warning—

"Just half your wood and half your hay
Should be remaining on Candlemas Day."

An old Californian predicted a dry season for the year 1899, because he had noticed that the rattlesnakes would not bite of late, a never-failing sign of drought which few, we fancy, would feel inclined to put to the test.

An unusually cold winter is indicated by the greater thickness of apple skins, corn husks, and the like.

If the cattle go under trees when the weather looks threatening, there will be a shower. If they continue feeding, it will probably be a steady downpour.

The direction from which the wind is blowing usually indicates what the weather will be for the day—wet or dry, hot or cold—but here is a rhymed prediction which puts all such prophecies to shame—

"The West wind always bring wet weather,
The East wind wet and cold together,
The South wind surely brings us rain,
The North wind blows it back again.
If the sun in red should set
The next day surely will be wet;
If the sun should set in gray,
The next will be a rainy day."

This falls more strictly in line with many of the so-called signs which, like the old woman's indigo, if good, would either sink or swim, she really didn't know which; or like the predictions of the old almanac makers, who so shrewdly foretold rain in April, and snow in December.

—The Weather Prophet.

A Ready Manager

A barnstorming theatrical company was touring the interior, where they were billed to play "Romeo and Juliet." The leading man approached the manager.

"Boss," he said, "I've got to have fifteen cents."

"Fifteen cents?" growled the manager. "You're always yelling for money. What do you want the money for?"

"What do I want the money for?" repeated the leading man, bitterly. "I want it for a shave, that's what I want it for. I can't play Romeo with five days' black beard on my face."

"Oh, well," said the manager, "you won't get no money out of me. We'll change the bill to 'Othello.'"

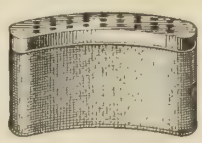
HAVE YOU HEARD ABOUT THE WELKOM WARMER?
Endorsed by the medical profession and hospital authorities as the only modern and sensible substitute for the Hot Water Bottle.



Size 3¼ x 5½ inches; weight four and one half ounces.
NO WATER TO HEAT, NO RUBBER TO ROT,
causing the bag to burst and scald the patient.

The WELKOM WARMER is made of metal, and is heated within one minute by the lighting and insertion of a paper tube containing a tasteless, smokeless and odorless fuel generating a heat of uniform temperature which lasts two hours at a cost of less than one cent. It is curved to fit any portion of the body and when in use is placed in a bag to modify the heat and held in place by means of a belt allowing the wearer to move about at will.

As a pain killer the WELKOM WARMER has no equal as it can be put into action instantly, thus avoiding heating water and waiting for the kettle to boil.

Complete outfit including Warmer, bag, belt, box and 10 tubes of fuel sent prepaid to any part of the United States upon receipt of $2.00.

SAN FRANCISCO TOWN TALK

H-O

Your Forefathers Ate It

Our sturdy pioneers gained strength and muscle from a diet of oatmeal porridge. To hew down the forests—to build up homes—to conquer the soil—to lay the corner stone for the foundation of our present prosperity—all required good, substantial food. Their out-door, active life gave them power to digest the ordinary Rolled Oats.

But that was long ago. Today, indoor life and sedentary habits have compelled the people to seek a food capable of being assimilated with the least severe tax on the digestive organs. Our patented steam-cooking process acts directly on the starchy element of the oats and makes them thoroughly digestible. Fifteen minutes' boiling is all that is required to prepare H-O oatmeal for the table.

Use H-O oatmeal for a few mornings and be convinced of its goodness.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling, and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats." Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

The Sympathetic Strike

When the labor leaders of Philadelphia invoked the principle of the sympathetic strike it was because they realized that they were in desperate straits and regarded it as expedient to resort to desperate measures. As there was available an abundance of non-union labor the union could not effectively cripple the traction system. So it was decided to blackmail the whole community. The sympathetic strike is a species of blackmail. By the sympathetic strike union labor seeks to coerce people with whom they have no quarrel. The unions demand that these people shall espouse their cause and coerce recalcitrant employers. Coercion is the purpose of the sympathetic strike, and the penalty of resistance is suffering and distress. Upon no principle of morality can the sympathetic strike be defended or justified. It is a much more vicious instrument of oppression than the boycott. Yet we are told that the Philadelphia strike has the support not only of the people of Philadelphia "but of every liberty-loving man, woman and child in the United States." Fortunately the authority for this statement is neither infallible nor universally respected. The foregoing quotation is from a despatch over Mr. William R. Hearst's "special leased" wire to the Examiner. Mr. Hearst's idea is that nobody loves liberty who does not also love blackmail and anarchy.

Another Reformer Stripped to the Bone

Mr. Gifford Pinchot, it appears, is not the angelic idealist that his friends and admirers would have us believe. It appears that he is a typical, up-to-date reformer; in other words a politician with neither an intelligent nor a tender conscience, distinguished by a sequestration from the sentiments of generosity and fairness. We have insisted that the reason the star-eyed goddess languishes through the years despite the enthusiasm with which she is worshiped is the discredit that is brought upon her by her friends. And once more are we afforded an instance that illustrates and exemplifies. The star-eyed one has had but few more ardent champions than Mr. Gifford Pinchot. He has served her in the capacity of high priest, and all the worshipers in her temple have paid tribute to his zeal, and with fervent amens testified to their hearty concurrence in his exhortations. As the apostle of conservation, with "God and my country" as his motto, Mr. Pinchot made quite a stir in the land. Making the goddess of reform his accomplice to legalize his crotchets, he went about like a voice in the wilderness, with "conservation" as his shibboleth, teaching us that everything else was but vanity and vexation of spirit. And the people believed in him, and rose up in their wrath and demanded conservation and more conservation, conservation till the end of time. Of course the multitude didn't stop to inquire what conservation meant. That it means we should quit developing our resources on a large scale for the reason that prosperity has become an unpardonable sin has not yet been revealed to the multitude, but Mr. Pinchot has. The Pinchot apocalypse came last week at Washington when the great reformer was silhouetted against the background of the Ballinger-Pinchot investigation so distinctly that even those that ran might have read the symbols of his unprepossessing personality.

Suppression of the News

Shocking was the revelation of Mr. Gifford Pinchot in the role of a subtle little trickster; especially shocking to his friends of the press, the Machiavellian gents who employed him to bring scandal on the Taft administration. When Mr. Pinchot, the deus ex machina of the Great Conspiracy, was exposed to the public gaze his muckraking friends were thrown into a state of rout, of confusion worse confounded. Our own lovely and fragrant Bulletin bared its emotions by consigning to the waste basket the whole story that came over the Associated Press wire. Thus in one day was emphasis given to the characteristic littleness of typical reformers. The white light that was thrown on the meanness of Pinchot in Washington by some mysterious process produced a darkness in the columns of the pharisaic evening journal, imparting to that paper something of the eloquence of one of Whistler's nocturnes. For the Bulletin, it will be remembered, has a holy horror of distortion or suppression of the news. But whereas the Bulletin, being self-evident, cannot suffer in public estimation, Mr. Gifford Pinchot is to be commiserated on his downfall. Before lending himself to the purposes of the muckrakers he was a man of considerable prestige; a fanatic perhaps, but universally regarded as a gentleman of good instincts, sensible of all the gradations of decency. But now it appears that like most reformers when they get horsed on an idea, he does not scruple at a piece of mean trickery when he deems it essential to the carrying out of his designs. Unquestionably his enthusiasm for conservation is inspired with honest motives, but like all narrow-minded puritans he cannot conceive of anybody with honest intentions holding views not in accord with his own. Unquestionably he believes that Secretary Ballinger is dishonest, and to make out a case against that gentleman he doesn't mind stooping to dishonesty himself.

The Curse of Gold

Without knowledge of the cause of an evil it is hard to find a remedy. The discovery of the cause is the first step toward the abatement of everything that produces disorder or irritation in the body politic. Let us therefore acclaim the Hon. Coe Crawford, Senator from South Dakota, who has successfully brought his intellectuals to bear on the mystery of the hour—the high cost of living. Senator Crawford has discovered that high prices are due in very great part to the increase in the production of gold. This he proves by a table of statistics showing that high prices are worldwide and that the value of a dollar, measured by its purchasing power, in Europe as well as in this country has been steadily decreasing for more than ten years. As from $202,251,600 in 1896 the production of gold increased to $412,532,900 in 1907, or more than 100 per cent, it is evident that the yellow metal has had considerable influence on the cost of living. Although the population of the United States increased enormously between 1896 and 1909, the circulation per capita rose from $21.41 to $34.93, an increase of 63.15 per cent. Of no little importance in this connection is the fact that an individual who deposited one dollar in a savings bank in 1896 could buy no more with it after thirteen years of compound interest at 4 per cent than he could have purchased at the time the deposit was made.

From the statistics gathered by Senator Crawford it is evident that compared with the influence of gold depreciation the effect of combination or monopoly on prices has been inconsiderable. Of course exceptions are to be noted, as for example, in the case of the local combination which keeps prices at a high altitude by converting fish into glue. The tariff has had some effect on prices, but every article whether it is protected or free has grown dearer. It may be a consolation to know that it is not the rich or the Government that is grinding the faces of all of us, but it is decidedly discouraging to learn that Senator Crawford, despite his discovery, regards the situation as hopeless. He says that the rise in prices will go on, for there is no halt, but a steady increase, in the production of gold. With all his talent for diagnosis Senator Crawford has no skill in healing. Let us hope that among our statesmen may be found one fiancier with the genius to solve the problem.

Another Word on American Journalism

A correspondent who thinks our strictures on American journalism are unwarranted reminds us that to the journalism of this country the world is indebted for a Greely and a Godkin, "great thinkers and great patriots." Why Greely or Godkin should be regarded as benefactors of mankind we cannot conceive; nor would we consider it to the credit of American journalism that it could claim as its own nobody that equalled the founder of the "Tribune" or the founder of the "Nation" in those qualities of the mind and heart that are essential to genius and nobility. On the roster of American journalism are the names of many distinguished men,—most of whom are dead. If we had more great journalists in harness we should have fewer yellow journals dedicated to the mob. As the power of the press for evil increases there is less demand for honest, sincere journalists. There is no call nowadays for clear and honest thinkers, wielding a fearless and independent pen, but there is demand for unscrupulous writers, for men devoid of intellectual honesty who will give expression to the coarse ideas of mercenary publishers. In the days of Horace Greely American journalism was on a much higher plane than it is today, but in the lifetime of Laurence Godkin it was a considerable distance on the downgrade, and nobody was more keenly sensible of the fact than that distinguished editor, as our correspondent may ascertain by reading his "Life and Letters." It would not be wise to cite Godkin as an authority on the dignity of American journalism. Godkin, the son of an Irish Presbyterian clergyman, came to this country with the idea that he would find here living demonstration of those democratic principles of government which with him were bred in the bone. He soon became an ardent patriot. In 1865 he founded the "Nation," an independent, serious weekly review, and in his editorial capacity won fame and power as a publicist and as a prophet of the new gospel of liberty and progress, of honesty and rationality. The best years of his life he devoted to the task of persuading our politicians to observe some of the rules of decency and common honesty and our journalists to be moderately truthful. He labored in vain, and he went back to his native country in disgust. In one of his letters he gives this description of the situation in this country at the time of his withdrawal from journalism: "An immense democracy, mostly ignorant, and completely secluded from foreign influences, and without any knowledge of other states and society, with great contempt for history and experience, finds itself in possession of enormous power, and is eager to use it in brutal fashion against anyone who comes along, without knowing how to do it, and is therefore constantly on the brink of some frightful catastrophe like that which overtook France in 1870. The spectacle of our financial condition and legislation during the last twenty years, the general silliness and credulity begotten by the newspapers, the ferocious optimism exacted of all teachers and preachers, and the general belief that we are a peculiar and chosen people to whom the experience of other people is of no use, make a pretty dismal picture, and, I confess, rather reconcile me to the fact that my career is drawing to a close. I know how many things may be pointed to as signs of genuine progress, but they are not in the field of government. Our two leading powers, the legislature and the press, have to my knowledge been running down for thirty years." These words were written long before Mr. William R. Hearst began tinting American journalism with the vivid yellow of his personality, long before the public taste was educated down to the manners and modes of thought of a Theodore Roosevelt. A faithful picture of the American democracy of this period would be in more sombre colors than the one drawn by "Larry" Godkin, and the reason is American journalism.

When Government Comes High

According to Senator Aldrich the United States Government wastes $300,000,000 a year. He doesn't tell us how it is wasted, but it is not hard to find out. During Mr. Roosevelt's administration we started on a great national spree, and we have been on it ever since. Uncle Sam's annual income in the period of Mr. Roosevelt's official orgie was $600,000,000, but he was spending much more than that, and that is why we have been devising new tax schemes to raise the wind. Mr. Roosevelt was a most expensive luxury. With this great conscience compeller in the saddle we spent more money in one year than during the year of the Spanish war, and almost as much as the average yearly expenditure during the four years of civil war. It is due to Mr. Roosevelt, however, to say that he led us into extravagances out of congenital zeal for that mystic, impalpable and imponderable desideratum, the "greater good." When a Mighty Hunter goes after big game he must be well equipped, as we may learn without going to Africa. When a great nation goes in for paternalism under the guidance of an erratic father it must make generous provision for all the conceivable needs of its citizens. For example, it must be considered important to cure sheep and cattle of scabics, to propagate, test and distribute seeds, bulbs, and plants. Therefore we must give the Secretary of Agriculture $1,125.000 a year in a lump sum to spend it as his sound judgment dictates. Under a binding obligation to posterity as we are we must follow out Mr. Finchot's policies at a cost of $3,986,000. The Forest Service which consumes this paltry sum is Uncle Sam's pride and pet. Conscious as we are of the destructiveness of moths it is natural that our statesmen should seek to prevent the spread of these pests, and this they do in masterly style if we may judge from the size of the appropriation for the purpose. It is $300.000. With all our bureaus for the eradication of this and the propagation of that we are truly generous as becomes an opulent World Power. Even our beloved Bureau of Chemistry which ascertains for us how much poison the average stomach can stand gets lump sum appropriations of $?00.CC0 to be expended as somebody sees fit. The commissions, too, are well cared for. The Interstate Commerce Commission received a lump sum appropriation the other dav of $800.000 with specific limitation on only $54,500 of that amount; also, an appropriation of $350,000 to be used in the discretion of the commission to enforce compliance with Section 20 of the Act to Regulate Commerce as amended by the act of June 29, 1906. This is the commission that proudly numbers among its members the Hon. Franklin K. Lane of California who learned what law he knows at the expense of the generous people of this city and county, and thereafter spent several years of his life unsuccessfully chasing jobs until Mr. Roosevelt discovered that Providence had endowed him with special faculties for running the transportation business of the country. From all that we have learned about lump sum appropriations we are inclined to place absolute credence in what Senator Aldrich says about the waste of public funds. To President Taft's credit be it said considerable retrenchment has already taken place as a result of his urgings, but of course he is not to be expected to do anything so revolutionary as to abandon entirely one of the most sacred of his predecessor's policies—that of enlarging the scope of governmental duties in order to perfect a pretext for imposing more taxes on everybody who would be unduly prosperous.

Perspective Impressions

If the Democratic party of California prefers defeat to success and professions to performance, the Hon. Theodore Bell is its logical candidate for Governor.

Attorney-General Webb has come to a conclusion with reference to the Republican machine entirely satisfactory to the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Webb isn't the first man that forcswore allegiance to the machine after learning that his allegiance wasn't wanted.

General Otis has been severely reproved by the Bulletin for alluding to the patriots of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League as the Link-Roosters. It is a sacrilege, argues the purest of journals, to trifle with the name of Lincoln, but there is no objection from the same source to the employment of the prestige of the martyred President to serve the selfish purposes of a lot of scurrility-loving jobchasers.

Expressional Dancing in New York

By Helen M. Stocking

Being a Brief Dissertation on the Latest Art Form to Engage the Attention of the Metropolis, with Particular Reference to the Exquisite Work of Isadora Duncan and the Exotic Charm of Maude Allan

Of those who look for the latest news of music and drama in the morning paper, or take up a magazine, picturing stage celebrities and happenings, by the evening fire, relying confidently on Father Knickerbocker for a "new and exciting story," I wonder how many realize how hard pressed the good old man would have been lately, had it not been for the dancers.

The new melodrama with its shocks, thrills and dramatic realism came like a dash of cold water that leaves one gasping. But after having been fairly immersed in the deluge which followed, the "strong emotional scene" lost its power to any longer rouse audiences to shouting, or cause individuals to faint or grow hysterical, and became an old story. Yes, the theatre could surely go no further in its attempts to excite a new enthusiasm! There was "Electra." But "Salome" had already made familiar that utmost limit of sensational drama and musical expression and significance. What could go further in adding to the dramatic realism of modern opera than Mary Garden's impersonations, once so sensational when convincing operatic acting was still a novelty? What could be conceived, to surprise the ear or excite the mind undisturbed by the recent concerts of ultra-modern music—such as entire programs of Debussy compositions?

But the looms of art spin with the eternal evolution of all things, so they produced, with beautiful consistency, the only possible climax,—inarticulate expression in all its manifold varieties, old and new. Surely, not since the old art of pantomime and primitive bodily expression gave way before Western progressive ideas of how things could be better expressed, has there been such universal, enthusiastic interest in the application of art principles of expression to motion. The progress of this enthusiasm here has been the reverse of the natural course of the evolution of the dance.

It began with that champion of intricate modern ballet work, Adeline Genee. Circumscribed as are her superb technique and exquisite art to ballet requirements, she is the matchless embodiment of the poetry of pure motion. She expresses the beauty one feels in the flight of a bird, the dancing of a dandelion puff on the breeze, the flutter of a butterfly.

But renewed interest in folk dances and the popularity of drama without words, indicated an awakened desire for a more adequate expression of human emotions and aspirations, which was to be gratified by a form of motion art other than the dance, so called; namely, the simple expression of natural woman enjoying music in her natural way, and the essentially artistically inarticulate expression of life's keenest and most subtle emotions.

I wonder if it is possible for anyone to appreciate or sympathize with the rage for this modern phase of aesthetic dancing which has taken possession of New York, without having seen Isadora Duncan. It is a profanation of her art to describe it, but all its profound suggestiveness in art and the philosophy of living could inspire many pages. This lovely woman, unaffected and unashamed in her simple Grecian drapery with unclad limbs and feet, moving with the dignity of naturalness, radiant with the fullness of spirituality and the pristine beauty of life, free from material consciousness, and the ugly habits of embarrassment, unnatural clothing and imitation, is surely a vindication of natural woman. A sculptor could find innumerable statues in her classic poses, a musician, inspiration in her interpretations and enravishing rythms, a poet, the very essence of an emotion in her expressions.

Miss Duncan's dancing whetted the public taste of a now apparently insatiable appetite, by which innumerable dancers of all description are profiting.

There is Ruth St. Denis, with her superb body, remarkably trained muscles, wonderful mobility, and picturesque setting to her Eastern dances.

Exquisite Rita Saccheto with her piquant and charming pantomime and remarkable technique in symbolic dances has become a great favorite.

But Maude Allan is the latest subject of agitation. And how refreshing and full of zest are these arguments about the "technique," "interpretation" and "temperament" of these artistes of the dance, after the old rehashed debates of more familiar arts! Although the form of Miss Allan's art is similar to that of Isadora Duncan, it is very different in spirit. Her characteristic qualities of exotic charm and sensuous beauty of person and movement, though very fascinating, do not seem inspired by the mental concept, the superb aspiration which imbued Miss Duncan's slightest movement with significance.

Much of Miss Allan's extreme mobilization of body, especially of hands and arms, seems used to no purpose, so that, although one has glimpses of unusual power for expression, it by no means always reaches an all-satisfying conviction. The "Vision of Salome" is not worthy of her or her art. It is an abhorrent spectacle, with no sufficiently great significance or inspiration of art in its interpretation, to vindicate it.

That the very beauty and freedom of this art should give license for the vulgar sensationalism which is crowding the vaudeville theatres and music-halls, and flaring from bill-boards is indeed hard to bear.

However, even this may be in a measure offset by the comprehensive culturing forces of the present fad of cultivating expressional dancing as an accomplishment. The programs of society and amateur affairs are quite given over to dances. The costume introduced by Miss Duncan is no longer a sensation, for it is seen in the opera ballet and at all sorts of entertainments.

However, not until one sees an amateur—perhaps capering naively about in what looks very much like an abbreviated "nighty"—can one realize how distressing and excruciatingly ridiculous this dancing, even with the best intentions, but uninspired and uncultured, can be. Nevertheless, I have also seen an amateur, after only eight months' study, give expression to an unusual temperament in a dance demanding limited technique, which was one of the most fascinating in interpretative qualities.

The ballet has attained such popularity and importance that the Metropolitan Opera House this season gives special performances of dances and pantomimes which constitute the greater part of the evening's entertainment. A ballet school has been opened in connection with the Opera House where American girls can obtain free instruction and be utilized in opera performances when capable.

And now comes the sensational Russian dancer, Pavlowa, the news of whose debut, soon to take place, is exciting such great expectations. And so—"on with the dance."

The Siege of Baler

(This is the third and last installment of an extended review of a book entitled "Under the Red and Gold," written by Captain Cerezo of the Spanish Army, translated by Major F. L. Dodds of the United States Army and published by the Franklin Hudson Publishing Company of Kansas City. It is a narrative of the Siege of Baler which was sustained for three hundred and thirty-seven days by a small Spanish detachment against a large force of Filipinos in a little church in a remote part of Luzon. The story is one of the most amazing series of sufferings and heroic deeds ever written and it deserves to be widely known. In last week's Town Talk the review of the book brought the siege forward to its one hundred and eightieth day. Many of the soldiers had died of beri-beri and wounds, the provisions were almost exhausted and the Filipinos were pressing the assault more warmly than ever. Yet Captain Cerezo refused to capitulate.)

It was a melancholy Christmas which the weakened and hungry Spaniards spent in the little Church of Baler. Their repast consisted of pumpkin, preserve made of orange skins and coffee. The only cheering thought in the mind of the captain was that the ammunition was still plentiful. This is how Captain Cerezo was impressed by the coming of the New Year:

And now came the night of December 31, the last of the year, the first of 1899, the one hundred and eighty-fourth of the siege. The last page of the American calendar disclosed to my eyes the now useless piece of pastboard to which it had been glued, and on tearing it off I had a feeling, painful, indefinable, which might well be called romantic, but—what more romantic, after all, than that same tenacity in defending ourselves? Regard it as you will; but I, who, starving for sleep and without hope of succor, had gone on tearing off those leaves, seeing them disappear like dead comrades—I, who with the dwindling of that calendar saw also the disappearance of our carefully doled out ammunition and rations—I could not regard with indifference the disappearance from its place of that which left exposed traces of the past with all its bitterness and sadness.

The new year appeared to come sinister and dark, with despair at its end; and I felt an irresistible faintness, an oppression that was suffocating me, the want of some one in whom I could confide my anxieties and the heaviness of the duty which was crushing me: and I had to shut myself up in silence.

The garrison was being quickly reduced to extremities:

But the rice was all gone by this time, and we had to devote ourselves to hulling the seventy cavanes of palay (unhulled rice) that the deceased Padre Carreno had bought. The task is wearisome and always difficult to those unaccustomed to it; exasperatingly slow and at that time with results little gratifying; since, in consequence of the very bad manner in which we were obliged to store it, and our inability to properly expose it to the sun, it cost a great deal of labor to separate the hull grain by grain. In doing so all delicacy and care was used, all the care demanded by, I shall not say necessity, but hunger; and even then not a grain came out whole, which caused a great deal of loss.

As the condition of the troops did not warrant calling upon them for unnecessary labor, I had to reduce the time devoted to this work to so many hours daily, to get out only what was indispensable for the ration, and this with rice that was dirty, powdery, unfit. I leave it to any one to imagine how tempting it was, seasoned, in such a condition, with tinned sardines half unserviceable, intolerable bacon, or pumpkin leaves, and without salt. To give it something of a flavor, we mixed it with some small wild peppers, very sharp (red peppers might be considered sweet as compared with them), which are very abundant in that country.

Nevertheless this was the best the garrison of Baler had daily from the beginning of the year 1899, when it had already sustained one hundred and eighty-four days of siege, when forty had passed since we lost our commandant, when the ration of flour, which ought to have been 500 grams, had to be reduced to 200, and when I found myself under the necessity of cutting off the small advance of five cents every three days, which, in order to compensate for the deficiency of rations, had been given to each man since the beginning of the siege.

Refusing to surrender and receiving with scepticism the reports of the Filipinos that Spanish sovereignty had been destroyed in the islands, the captain continued his defense, even disregarding the following letter which was conveyed to him:

"The treaty of peace between Spain and the United States having been signed, and the sovereignty of these islands having been ceded to the latter nation, you will evacuate the place, bringing away with you armament, munitions, and the treasure-chests, being guided by the verbal instructions that, by my order, will be communicated to you by Don Miguel Olmedo y Calve. God keep you for many years. "Diego de los Rios.

"Manila, February 1, 1899."

Here is the way the captain argued with himself:

It is very certain that the delights of Baler could not have been the cause of my doubts and delays. Nobody more than ourselves desired to put an end to it all, to change those scenes, to finish it at once, if the circumstances had warranted it. But then, I had to bear in mind Article 748 of the Field Regulations, which says: "Remembering that in war all kinds of deceptions and ruses are resorted to, even when a written order from superior authority is received to surrender the place, its execution will be suspended until its complete authenticity is made certain, sending, if possible, a person of confidence to verify it verbally." It was unequivocal and I was not in a position to ascertain the authenticity of that order; I could not quit that post of honor without satisfying myself that I was not the victim of a ruse; that afterwards my credulity could not be imputed to my desire; that I was, in fact, obeying orders. All these were considerations which, apparently, in the general subversion of things, were not borne in mind by those by whom they should have been taken into account.

Captain Cerezo discovered a conspiracy among some of his detachment to escape from the church to the enemy and this darkened the gloom of the situation. A more cheerful incident was the straying of some carabao within range of the soldiers; they killed one:

We had a protracted feast. It was useless to attempt to restrain the soldiers. So great was their hunger that they became almost insane, and it was necessary to allow them to do as they pleased in cutting off pieces of the meat, which they roasted and devoured. For this reason the meat lasted only three days; and it is hardly necessary to say that the men ate so much the first day that their stomachs suffered. When this supply was all gone, we repeated the chase, killing another carabao; but this time we were compelled to get it in under the enemy's fire.

As there was no salt, nothing could be preserved, and after two days the meat became totally unfit to eat. We had to lie in wait again, and a third carabao served to replenish the provisions, although very transitorily. On this occasion we hit two of the animals; but when, on the following day, we tried to get the second one in, it was already swollen and beginning to decompose.

About this time, the end of March, Aguinaldo sent more troops to assist in the attack on the church and the brave

Le Bretonne

By Andre Theuriet (From the French)

One November evening—it was St. Catherine's Eve—the iron gate of the Central Prison at Auberive turned on its hinges to let out a woman. She was about thirty years of age; she was dressed in a faded stuff gown; her pale face, queerly framed in a plain cotton cap, wore the dull, puffy, waxy look that is developed by prison life.

She was a prisoner just discharged. Her companions in durance called her La Bretonne, the woman from Brittany. She had been condemned for murdering her infant, and it was just six years since the prison van brought her to the Central.

After having her own clothes restored to her, and receiving at the registrar's office the small sum of money she had earned while in prison, she found herself free—free at last, with an official pass viseed for Langres.

The Langres stage-coach had gone. Stumbling in her movements, awkward, shrinking with fear, she made her way to the principal inn of the place, and, in tones that betrayed her lack of self-confidence, asked for a night's lodging. But the inn was full, and the host, who was never particularly anxious to harbor "any of that lot," directed her on to the public-house at the other end of the village.

More scared and awkward than ever, the woman at length found the tavern, which, strictly speaking, was merely a canteen frequented by navvies, and knocked at the door. The landlady came, looked the intruder over from head to foot with a mistrustful eye, and, doubtless scenting in her visitor a woman from the Central, finally sent her away, saying that they had no beds to let.

La Bretonne dared not insist. She crept away, hanging her head, and at the bottom of her soul there arose a dull hatred of this world that cast her out. There was no help for it; she must walk all the way to Langres.

It was the end of November, when night falls early. She soon found herself in the gathering dusk on a gray road that ran through a wood. The north wind blew boisterously, scattering the heaps of dead leaves and whirling them through the air.

Six years of sedentary confinement! She no longer knew how to walk. The joints of her knees seemed stiff; her feet, accustomed to wooden clogs, felt cramped in these new shoes; before she had gone two or three miles they were blistered; she was tired already. Shivering and weary she sank down on a heap of stones, and asked herself whether she would have to perish of cold and hunger, here in the blackness of the night and beneath the icy wind that was chilling her through.

Suddenly, as she sat there in the deserted road, she fancied she heard, between the gusts of the wind, someone singing, or rather crooning, in low tones. She listened intently, and recognized the monotonous cadence of one of those caressing strains that are sung as cradle-songs for children.

She rose to her feet and went in the direction of the voice. At the turn of a by-path she perceived a glimmer of light that shone redly through the trees. In five minutes she stood before a mud-walled hovel; the roof, covered with sods of turf, was supported at the back by a ledge of rock. A ray of light came through the one window.

Anxious at heart, she summoned up courage to knock. The singing ceased. A peasant woman came to the door.

She was about the same age as La Bretonne, but already worn and aged with toil. Through the rents in her short gown showed her dull and sun-dried skin. Her red hair straggled in disorder from beneath a scanty stuff cap. She stared wonderingly with her gray eyes at the stranger, whose face indeed wore no usual expression.

"Good evening," said the peasant woman, holding up the primitive lamp which she had in her hand. "What do you want?"

"I'm tired out," murmured La Bretonne, and in her voice there echoed a hollow sob. "It's a long way to the town, and if you would take me in for the night, you would be doing me a great kindness. I have money and could pay you for your trouble."

"Come in," said the other, after a moment's hesitation. Then she continued, though in a tone rather of curiosity than of mistrust: "Why did you not stay the night at Auberive?"

"They would not take me in." La Bretonne's blue eyes fell. Her conscience pricked her, and she added: "Because, you see, I have just come out of the Central, and that does not make people inclined to trust me."

"Ah! Well, come in, all the same. I'm not afraid, for I've never known aught but trouble myself; and one can't leave a Christian outside the door in this cold. I can make you a bed of heather."

She went beneath a shed and brought thence several armfuls of dry heather which she spread in a corner near the hearth.

"Do you live here alone?" asked La Brettone timidly.

"Yes, with my little maid, my gachette; she is going on seven—I earn our living by working in the woods."

"Your husband is dead?"

"Yes," returned the woman shortly. "The poor gachette has no father. Well, we all have our troubles. There is your bed, and here are two or three potatoes, left over from supper; it is all I have to offer you."

She was interrupted by a child's voice from a dark receptacle beyond, separated from the room by a partition of boards.

"Good-night. I must go to the child—she is frightened. Try to sleep sound."

She took the lamp and disappeared into the adjoining closet, leaving the room in darkness.

La Bretonne ate the potatoes, lay down on the heather and tried to close her eyes; but sleep would not come. Through the partition she could hear the woman, La Fleuriotte, talking to her child in a low voice. The arrival of the stranger had roused the child, and she would not go to sleep again. La Fleuriotte rocked the little creature in her arms and kissed her with endearing words.

Such an outpouring of tenderness awakened a confused maternal instinct hidden away in the breast of the single woman, condemned in that bygone time for having strangled her newborn child. If things had not gone wrong, she mused, her little lad, her very own, would now have been just the age of this little girl. At the thought, at the sound of the childish voice through the partition, she shuddered to her inmost being. Some gracious foundation was being laid in her embittered heart. She had a great longing to weep.

"Come, my gachette," said La Fleuriotte's voice, "be quick and go to sleep. If you're a good girl, mother will take you to St. Catherine's Fair tomorrow."

"St. Catherine is the fete-day of little girls, isn't it, mamma?"

"Yes, lovey."

"Does St. Catherine really and truly bring children things to play with?"

"Yes—sometimes."

"Why doesn't she ever bring any to us?"

"We live too far off. And, besides, we're too poor."

"Then does she only brings things to rich children? Why, mamma? I should like to have some things to play with, too!"

A Jury-Packing Proposition

At a meeting of the judges of our Superior Court the other day a remarkable resolution was offered by one of them touching the subject of the impanelment of juries. It provided that on the drawing of a special venire in any department the judge thereof should have the privilege of supplying the sheriff with an advisory list. What the nature of the discussion was that followed the offering of this resolution I have not been informed. I know only that the resolution was beaten. The ground upon which it was beaten is not of record, but it is natural to surmise that a majority of the judges are of the opinion that it would be hardly in accord with the principles of justice for the whole court to give countenance to a scheme by which any judge might pack a jury. Who the judge was that introduced the revolutionary resolution I do not know, but I am sure there are many men who would bet a thousand dollars to a nickel they could name him if given two guesses.

The March of Evolution

Airy, fairy Lillian's daughter singing in an underground cafe! Has she come to this? Thus is one impelled to phrase the question, for there is a suggestion of downfall in the idea. But Dorothy Russell is not on the toboggan. It's the other way about. The underground cafe has come up in the matter of talent. Furthermore in the evolution of social customs we have come to look upon the tenderloin cafe beneath the surface not as a "dive," as it was called in the vulgar past, but as a place of amusement inside the pale. A quarter of a century ago when the Tivoli began educating the public taste, music lovers with the courage of their passion for opera bouffe sat at round tables, drank beer and applauded the singers. But most of them were Germans, and they were but following a national custom. By slow degrees the polite American in whom puritanism was uppermost overcame his scruples and joined his Teutonic fellow-citizens in the beer hall. As with the people so it has been with the mimes of the stage. Some years ago no first class artist would condescend to appear in vaudeville. Now many of the twinkling stars of the drama are on the circuit, and San Francisco has been slowly enticing high price vaudeville talent beneath the sidewalk.

Sandy Signs Dorothy

To "Sandy" McNaughton, the impresario of "The Breakers" and the Beau Brummel of the night life, belongs the credit of having persuaded Dorothy Russell to fascinate the habitues of the tenderloin with the breezy personality of her mother's daughter. Realizing that competition was taking on a keener edge every day McNaughton felt that it behooved him to reach out for something sensational in the market, and when he learned that the dashing Dorothy was at liberty he sent her a contract. She signed. To "The Breakers" she agreed to come for $250 a week. From which we may judge that the cost of amusement is no small item in the expense account of our vaudeville cafes. Miss Russell was to have opened her engagement last Monday night, but much to her manager's disappointment she failed to appear. She was in town, but hospitality was so abundant and urgent that professional duties were not permitted to engage her attention. For Dorothy Russell is popular in the smart set. The Johnnies dote on Dorothy. Hardly had she arrived when automobiles galore were at her service. A gay representative of our most fashionable jewelry house, a scion of a noble banking house and other rich young men with a taste for art were on hand with the keys of the city volunteering to give Dorothy the time of her life and Mr. McNaughton believes that she had it. Miss Russell, by the way, is a cultured young woman. She graduated from one of the most fashionable convents in the East and was later polished off in Paris.

The Cudahy-Lillis Affair

None of the elements of melodrama were lacking in the attack made upon Jere Lillis by John P. Cudahy of Kansas City. A theatrical writer of long experience could not have imagined a more sensational situation. Merely as a picture that group in the Cudahy house is compelling. It is an early hour of the morning and the room is lighted by electricity. On the floor, bound, bleeding and crying for mercy, lies Lillis. Over him stands Cudahy, calm but ruthless, his clothes smeared with blood. The chauffeur stands by. For a moment the terrified face of a servant-girl is seen at the door. The policeman enters. Here is drama of the penny-dreadful kind, but drama of real life just the same. There is only one thing lacking in this stage picture; we are left in doubt as to the nature of the injuries inflicted on the victim. This defect would be remedied on the stage, but in the present case we can only draw our own conclusions. The motive for the attack is clear enough to be easily guessed; the nature of the injuries is a little more uncertain. This fact undoubtedly lends interest to the melodrama; it piques curiosity. Feminine curiosity in particular will be aroused by this mysterious aspect of the case. In time of course it will be completely satisfied. The wonderful mental telegraph which carries unpublished facts from one end of the world to the other will inform the curious in due course as to what sort of an attack Cudahy made on Lillis. Many will guess this for themselves; these are the wise ones not unfamiliar with the vindictive methods of enraged husbands.

California Precedents

California has had two cases which will help the speculative to solve the mystery of what happened to Lillis. On one occasion a dentist in Oakland was the aggressor; on the other a well known young citizen of San Jose. The latter case excited a great deal of interest on account of the parties being well known. The San Jose wife was spending the summer at Santa Cruz and hubby became suspicious of her fidelity. Apparently he satisfied himself that she was guilty, for one day he went to Santa Cruz with a friend, sought out the man in the case and treated him as Cudahy treated Lillis. Then, as now, the papers referred to the attack euphemistically as "slashing." After the San Josean had slashed his wife's paramour he was locked up in jail and great indignation blazed forth against him, especially among the women of Santa Cruz. It is said that some of the more ardent feminine spirits wanted to lead a mob to the jail, capture the slasher and lynch him. Both of these cases resulted in convictions. Whether Cudahy who was arrested for disturbing the peace will suffer for his offense remains to be seen. The two men in San Quentin were prosecuted.

"It's dish-u-way, sah," explained old Brother Swank, to a befuddled friend: "Orthodoxy am de doxy dat I makes muhse'l —dat I's de orthor of, yo' un'erstand. Uh-well, and dis yah hectordoxy am de udder man's doxy dat he's allus uh-hectorin' me wid. Do dat make it cl'ar to yo' apprehension, Brudder Tarr?"

Boke Reproved by Gayley

My sympathy goes out to Professor Boke of Berkeley. Repudiated by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, contemned by a Fremont Older, it is hard for him to stand up against the tyranny of his fortune. That marble-hearted fiend, ingratitude, has struck serpent-like into the tender roots of his confiding heart. Familiar as he is with the aphorism, We seldom find people ungrateful while we are in a condition to render them services, he must realize that like his paper "The Liberator," he has been steadily dwindling into insignificance. But to add to the poignancy of his grief comes Professor Gayley, of Berkeley, a veritable Jeremiah of the academic groves, lamenting the balmlessness of Gilead, the absence of physician there and the presence of Boke. Thus does he swat the zealot of reform:

> Time was when academic etiquette forbade the university professor to participate in political contests. Now there are those who dare to inject the university into prejudiced affairs; even into criminal cases pending in courts. They have joined themselves to the idol of Parade.

This is reproof that even so sublime a soul as Boke's must find extremely hard to bear. The criticism or censure of a hostile partisan Brother Boke can lightly laugh to scorn, but not the bitter animadversion of one of his own academic family. Everybody knows that Gayley knows Boke intimately, and therefore everybody will conclude that Gayley's conception of the motive that has inspired Boke's aggressive righteousness, is in a measure authoritative. And it's as though Gayley had borrowed from Gay:

> By outward show let's not be cheated;
> An ass should like an ass be treated.

Boke's only consolation is that he is in polite company. Other pink-cheek professors hardly dry behind their ears were in sympathy with Boke in his assaults on the citadels of corruption. One old Greek whose name I have forgotten was on parade in the very temple of justice, and President Wheeler, himself, injected the university into criminal cases, going so far as to lament that the Supreme Court had not administered mandrake to its conscience the while it flirted with a great moral issue.

Hearst Visits His Los Angeles Paper

When William R. Hearst first arrived in this city there were rumors of all sorts of changes in the different departments of his newspapers. This was not unusual for Hearst has a habit of overhauling his papers at intervals and decapitations very frequently follow by wire. Although there have been no changes in this city, the Los Angeles Examiner has just experienced an upheaval. Hearst went down to Los Angeles one day and stopped in front of the bulletin board outside the Examiner office. The southern business manager was with him. "Who writes these bulletins?" asked the proprietor in his boyish voice. The business manager told him. "He makes a very funny G," commented Hearst and within a few minutes the writer of the bulletins was receiving a call-down which made him much more careful of his penmanship. That was the beginning, for Hearst went through every department, criticising with minute knowledge. One result of the upheaval was that James R. Nourse ceased to be city editor, his place being taken by Howard Morton, formerly of this city. Before Morton returned to the Pacific Coast from New York a short time ago he was the New York correspondent of the Hearst papers in California, his duty being to keep them supplied with news of particular interest to the people of San Francisco and Los Angeles. This position is now occupied by Fred Myrtle. Myrtle went from this city to Washington to investigate the alleged conspiracy of powerful interests to monopolize Alaskan coal lands. It was expected that he would return when that work was finished but instead he was assigned to New York. He will be greatly missed by the choice spirits of the Cosmos and Bohemian clubs.

Another Stanford Shrieker

Patient of all doctrinaries of every degree of littleness I give ear to Professor B. Estes Howard of Stanford Jr. University who has been uttering himself at the top of his voice about the shortcomings of the legal profession. "If we had more hanged lawyers we should have fewer hanged juries," says the Stanford professor. This is good stuff. It tickles the ears of the groundlings, and gives Professor Howard the impression that he has a pretty knack for epigram. Professor Howard said many good things about the legal profession, but most of them have been said before, and better than Professor Howard said them. Doubtless if Professor Howard would familiarize himself with the science of law he would be able to discuss the legal profession more intelligently than he did in his recent lecture. Being entirely ignorant of the law, knowing no more about it than Professor Boke knows about the precession of the equinoxes, he has about the same idea of the legal profession as a hog has about astronomy. Consequently he exposed himself to more ridicule than a man of his talents is able to heap upon lawyers. Before a man is admitted to the faculty of a university it ought to be made certain that he knew it to be prima facie evidence of asininity for him to discuss dogmatically any subject of which he was ignorant. Now Professor Howard is not a lawyer. His specialty is political science. I'd like to see him pass an examination in it.

After Grove L.'s Scalp

There were a number of Sacramento men in town the other day, including Ruhstaller the brewer, and from them I received the interesting intelligence that at last Grove L. Johnson is to be forcibly retired from private life. This is a bit of intelligence which I beg leave to accept with incredulity. Grove L. Johnson is one of the hardest men to beat in the whole State and I have an idea that he will stay in the Assembly just about as long as he cares to. The would-be legislator who is being groomed for the race with Johnson is one Jimmy Duffy, a saloon-keeper. The fight will be made on Johnson's record in favor of a Sunday closing law which, according to Duffy's friends, is an unpopular measure in Sacramento. It undoubtedly is unpopular with saloon-keepers, but I doubt whether old Grove L. would ever have espoused it unless it had been popular with his particular constituents. It will be very interesting to watch the assault which young Duffy will make upon the entrenched position of the Nestor of the legislature, even if he goes the way of all the rest of Grove's opponents to political oblivion.

A Warning to Gilmour

That grave and reverend patriot, Dr. Chester Rowell, first citizen of Fresno, will (in the words of a lesser light in the field of civic righteousness) "get" Mr. J. Hamilton Gilmour if he doesn't watch out. Mr. Gilmour is the editor of the Fresno Herald. He is an irreverent cuss, and he wields a trenchant pen in the use of which he plays havoc at once with Dr. Rowell's dignity and peace of mind. Dr. Rowell is a man of infinite forbearance, but that priceless virtue is becoming burdensome. Under Mr. Gilmour's persistent badgering Fresno's exemplar of good citizenship is just beyond the point at which he could say in the words of his most beloved hero, "This world surely is wide enough to hold both thee and me." Not that Dr. Rowell has thought of reaching for his blunderbuss; he is an invincible stickler for the laws of his country. In his philosophy there is no wrong that has not its remedy in the courts of the land. What Dr. Rowell has in pickle for Mr. Gilmour is an instrument which the law sanctions and approves. Through the columns of his own paper he has served notice on the pestiferous editor that patience is beginning to take on the aspect of a vice. By way of warning he has uttered himself as becomes a righteous prophet in the form of a parable. He has told Mr. Gilmour of the pitfall that one Charles M. Shortridge digged for himself in San Jose. Mr. Shortridge pestered the righteous Hayes brothers through many weary months, disguising his cruel innuendoes in the graceful drapery of a pyrotechnic language. Encouraged by the forbearance of his victims he went on taunting and jibing until one day he charged them with incendiarism, and then like a bolt from the blue they invoked the law and Charley went down under its heavy hand. From which I should infer that Dr. Rowell draws the line at being dubbed a fire-bug.

Why Negroes Are Lynched

I listened the other day to a discussion of the latest case of negro lynching in the South. As usual it was denounced as an outrage. The comments were the familiar ones that are made whenever a colored man is slaughtered for his sins. Harry T. Creswell, the attorney, who was born and raised in Alabama, was one of the group in which the discussion was carried on, and he took a deep interest in all that was said. Presently he told a story. He said that some years ago at a dinner in this city given in honor of an English engineer who was touring the country the subject of negro lynching came up for discussion. The Englishman remarked that it was a subject to which he had given much thought, and that he had come to the conclusion that the people of the South either had very little confidence in the jury system or no respect for their judges. Among the guests at the dinner was the late Judge Garber who promptly told the Englishman that he was mistaken. "The people of the South," said Judge Garber, "regard the jury system as a noble institution and they have very high respect for their judges, but they also hold their mothers, wives and daughters in high esteem and they consider it more honorable to commit murder than to suffer women to go upon the witness stand and testify to the brutalities inflicted on them by colored fiends."

Emil Bruguiere Out of Trade

It becomes my duty to record the fact that Emil Bruguiere is no longer in trade. After a brief but interesting career as the local agent of Red Top Monopol champagne, Emil has received his dimit and with perfect good humor has returned to the less exacting role of an idle boulevardier with no business responsibilities. Hereafter the Bruguiere cartouche will not be fashioned in the graceful shape of a wine bottle and the Bruguiere pasteboard will contain no reference to the house of Monopol. The severance of the ties that bound Emil to the world of trade came a few days ago. When the wine agent received the letter which announced the cutting off of his generous salary he read it and tossed it aside as nonchalantly as he has all other printed and written harbingers of trouble. Bruguiere has long since clothed himself in an armor of indifference against which the slings and arrows of fortune rattle in vain. He will take this opportunity of enforced leisure to pay a visit to his mother in Paris.

John Inglay, Knocker

The Panama-Pacific Exposition is still in embryo, not for five years will it flower, but already the knocker is abroad in the land with his little hammer. In the New York Sun of two weeks ago appeared the following letter:

To the Editor of The Sun—Sir: We are going to have a "world's fair" here in 1915; no doubt the promoters are going to profit by the experience of other fairs. I don't think they are going to spend millions for buildings to exhibit the arts and sciences in (at least I haven't heard of it) while the people are scrambling to see the great Salome dance.

Here one only hears the question, What shall we call the "midway"? The Zone, the Canal, the Barbary Coast, Chop Suey avenue, etc., have been suggested. If Congress gives us that $5,000,000 we will show the visitors a "midway" that will become almost as famous as our Barbary Coast.

One genius has suggested that the plan of the fair be a gigantic wheel; all the exhibits in a building shaped like a hub; the tire to be a five mile automobile racetrack; the spokes to be "midways," bearing all the most appropriate names. You are all invited. —John Inglay.

San Francisco, February 14.

Now does anybody know John Inglay? His name does not appear in the city directory, but from his use of the plural pronoun it is evident that he wishes to be regarded as one of us. Perhaps he ran up here from San Diego just to get the local postmark on his letter.

Death of Mrs. James H. O'Brien

The death this week of Mrs. James H. O'Brien, wife of the widely esteemed railroad builder and popular chief of "The Cabinet," brought a keen sense of loss and a feeling of sorrow to a very large circle of people. Mrs. O'Brien was a woman of many beautiful traits of character, and by her kindliness and the sweetness of her nature endeared herself to all that knew her. Her funeral services took place at Sacred Heart Church, which was crowded to the doors. In the throng were people who had come all the way from Santa Cruz, the city of her birth, to pay the last, sad tribute of affection. The officiating clergyman was Father Joseph McQuaid, who delivered a beautiful and touching sermon. The interment took place at Holy Cross Cemetery.

A Terror to Anarchists

When the State Constabulary of Pennsylvania descended upon Philadelphia two weeks ago a great change came over the spirit of the rioters. For days Philadelphia had been under a reign of terror. An army of 5,000 policemen found it impossible to restore law and order. Within six hours after the arrival of Captain John C. Groom and his little detachment of 250 men a condition of widespread anarchy was stamped out. The history and character of the State Constabulary of Pennsylvania is of some interest. It is a body that should serve as a model in other States. The State Constabulary is a direct outgrowth of repeated strikes with consequent rioting in the coal regions of Pennsylvania. Time after time the anthracite region especially was terrorized during prolonged strikes, with all the murder, arson, dynamiting that unionized labor seems to consider its special privelege in industrial disputes. The most serious insurrection of this nature occurred years ago when Sheriff Martin and his little band of deputies were seriously threatened at Latimer and saved themselves from a mob of 3,000 desperate rioters by giving a single volley from their sixteen shooters. The Constabulary was organized by ex-Judge George H. Troutman, an experienced cavalryman and a former scout in the Union army. Shortly after the last great strike in the coal mines when Theodore Roosevelt usurped the authority of the Governor of Pennsylvania just as the latter had thrown 10,000 infantry, cavalry and artillery into the field to smash the insurrection Troutman formed a small, mobile body of State police. He determined that whenever possible it should be recruited from troopers honorably discharged from the United States cavalry. He declared that his native State should have a body of hard riding, swift striking, powerful men, who would go where they were ordered, smash into a mob and without a moment's hesitation shoot to kill when so ordered by their commanding officers. He reasoned that one or two displays of such soldierly qualities in times of anarchy would do more than anything else to prevent like disorder in future. The experience of Pennsylvania in the last few years, since the State Constabulary has been in existence has fully borne out Judge Troutman's views. There has not been a serious strike in the coal regions since the troop was organized.

statement that although these Africans wear no clothes their morality is of a very high order. The Kavirondos are a very handsome race and they exemplify the old saw that beauty unadorned is adorned the most. The only covering they ever put on their bodies, men and women alike, is a smearing of hippopotamus fat which gives them the appearance of animated bronze. According to Anthony Comstock's theories of the evil effects of nudity these aborigines should be a very immoral lot, but they are nothing of the kind. The males are polygamous, being allowed as many wives as they can support, but they never associate with their wives during the nursing period which lasts from two to three years. Unmarried men are looked upon as worthless, so bachelors are scarce in the tribe. Violation of the marriage vow is punished by death. A striking proof that the Comstockian habit of mind prevails in America is found in the general amazement of editors that the naked Kavirondoes should possess a strict moral code. Evidently these editors are little versed in the relation of modesty to civilization and morality; they should read Havelock Ellis for the latest word of science on this interesting theme. Good old Montaigne would also give them light by which to steer clear of the vulgar error to which Anthony Comstock has dedicated the greater part of his activities. Montaigne, if I am not mistaken, was the first man to say that morality was largely a matter of geography. If he did not put it that way, at least he implied it by the arguments and illustrations given in his essay on the customs of the Isle of Cea.

The Comstock Fallacy

Foolish old Anthony Comstock imagines that libidinosity is stimulated by every exposure of the human form, particularly the feminine form. That of course is a fallacy of the grossest kind. To prove it, compare the effects upon an immature mind inclined to sensuality of a nude like the Venus of Velasquez and one of those nudes that are found in bar rooms. Velasquez shows the goddess of love in the glory of her beauty absolutely undraped. The bar room Venuses usually have draperies suggestively arranged to pique curiosity by a pretense of hiding what the sensual eye seeks. When theatrical managers discovered that a phalanx of tighted Amazons did not appeal to the bald-headed row nearly as much as a bevy of dancers in long draperies which they manipulated in such a way as to show a well turned ankle, a shapely calf and a flash of dainty lingerie, the old extravaganza died and musical comedy was born. The managers were merely applying a profound truth of human nature, the truth which lies at the bottom of curiosity and makes anticipation so sweet. The chorus girl in tights was like the bathing girl at the seaside; all her charms were revealed and therefore cheapened. But the dancing girl in trailing skirts is like the pretty girl who lifts her dress in crossing the street; the revelation, made with seeming unconsciousness, is piquant and irresistible. When this principle is applied to theatrical productions by managers who cater to lickerish taste, the resultant exposure is carried to vicious extremes, but the mistake is never made of allowing it to appear obvious or intentional. That would spoil the effect. The vulgar Salomes who imitate the chaste dancing of Isadora Duncan are careful not to create the impression that their exhibitions of nakedness are an end in themselves; hence the disgusting cant about their "art." These are truths which Anthony Comstock and his followers have never mastered; if they had their occupation would be gone. They would hold up their hands in horror if it were suggested that a lovesick youth be cured by the sight of his goddess in undress, but that was the remedy proposed by old Robert Burton, one of the wisest of men, who got the idea from Plato.

"Ma, I didn't know the Browns kept horses."
"They don't, my dear. What made you think so?"
"I heard Pa telling a man on the street yesterday that Mrs. Brown has the finest carriage of any woman he knows."

The Slandering of Hoefler

Every little while some example of the wanton abuse of the liberty of the press occasions reflection on the urgent necessity of at once amending our libel laws and making provision against the cowardice of trial judges who are averse to giving speedy satisfaction to persons with a just grievance against brutual newspapers. The latest example of this kind may be found in the experience of Attorney Ludwig Hoefler in his capacity as the guardian of two minor children. Disgruntled relatives of the children resolved the other day upon instituting proceedings for the revocation of Hoefler's powers. They drew up papers charging him with all sorts of crimes, and before filing them in court gave them to the newspapers for publication, and the newspapers had no scruples against publishing them. Aside from the fact that the charges were not sworn to and that the papers were not of record, it ought to have been apparent to any person of intelligence, from the reading of the papers, that there could have been no foundation for the charges. The newspapers of this city, reckless and bold as they are, have been seldom guilty of a more cruel piece of injustice. Is it not rather terrifying to feel that any citizen may at any day suffer from the same species of miscreancy?

A Measure of Our Extravagance

There came to me the other day an amazing proof of the mad extravagance in which the people of this city are indulging. It came indirectly from one of the local heads of the Bradstreet financial agency. According to this man the automobile dealers of this city submitted to Bradstreet's during the past year the names of from 1100 to 1300 local people who wanted to buy automobiles. The buying of an automobile is not usually a cash transaction; hence, when the automobile dealers are in doubt as to the financial standing of a prospective customer they apply for information to Bradstreet's. During the past year they were in doubt as to the credit of from 1100 to 1300 prospective purchasers. The amazing fact is that in every case the Bradstreet people reported unfavorably on the names. Most of the would-be motorists, it was found, owed bills all over the city. Is it any wonder that business men complain that money is scarce while the purveyors of amusement are waxing richer every day?

The Final Word in Advertising

Looking over the advertisements in a cheap periodical for women published in the East I happened on one which seems to embody the very last word in the booming of a marketable commodity. At the top of the advertisement is given a picture of what is described as a seven-piece bed set consisting of two blankets, two bleached sheets, two bleached pillow cases and one bed spread—all full size pieces—and the public is notified that every woman in the country can get this useful and expensive set absolutely free on condition that she sell a few cans of a certain baking powder of which I never before heard. The advertisement goes on to say that the baking powder is easy to sell because with every can a full size cut glass pattern pitcher and six glasses are given away. But this is not all. Every woman who sends for the baking powder will receive, not only the bed set for herself and the pitcher and glass sets for her customers, but also, as a special premium, a handsomely designed parlor lamp. A cut of the lamp is also given in the ad. The advertisement further says: "You simply can't realize what a big offer this is until you see these beautiful premiums." This certainly is going some. I don't see how the advertising game could be carried much further, unless people were paid a bonus for using that baking powder.

The Irish

St. Patrick's Day is approaching, the yearly festival of a people whose characteristics once upon a time threatened to leaven the American temperament. There was a time when there was a good deal of anti-Irish sentiment in this country, but that was when Ireland was pouring into this country a flood of immigrants. Now we are getting our new citizens from the south of Europe and from the numerous hotbeds of socialism, and we are not at all pleased with the change. "No Irish need apply," is a sentiment no longer to be found in the "Help Wanted" columns of the dailies. We are beginning to realize that if we had more Irish people in the country we should have fewer isms and a keener sense of humor. There are no cranks or highbrows among the Irish. The Irish have a keen appreciation of oddity and incongruity. They are a merry people, and there is nothing intermittent, fitful or irregular in their gaiety. They have too much common sense to lead a forlorn hope of righteousness. They are always ready to exhibit their patriotism on the field of battle; never in any of the minor skirmishes of a Citizens' Union.

The history of Ireland a correspondent sums up for me in these words: "Island of Destiny"—of saints and of sinners, of martyrs, of patriots and statesmen, of bardic lore and poet story, of plenty and of poverty, of virtue, learning and religion, of beautiful women and prolific mothers, of woes and tribulations, of hope and despair, of suffering and heroic endurance, of martial glory and chivalric honor, of nature's adornment and scenic grandeur, of treachery, treason and deceit, of bribery and corruption, of factional jealousies and clannish wars, of betrayed confidences and misguided ambitions—oh, land of tragedies, of tears and of sorrows, thy sunlight of liberty is not yet; tortuous must be thy path ere it dawns, and yet you live on between hope and suspense, pinning your faith to the "balance of power."

"Gunga Din" at the Press Club

The members of the Press Club had the pleasure last Wednesday night of hearing a new interpretation of Kipling's "Gunga Din." There was a jinks at the club that night and among those present was Charles Dow Clark, the well known actor. Called upon to contribute to the entertainment of the "late watch," Clark recited the stirring ballad of the Indian water carrier. He gave it a setting which was immediately acclaimed much more dramatic and much more in sympathy with Kipling's usual method than that with which elocutionists have made us familiar. In Clark's presentation the teller of the tale is a drunken old soldier surrounded by boon companions in a London "pub." The talk has been of the consumption of liquor, that staple of tipsy conversation, and the veteran from "Injia's sunny clime" becomes impatient of the boozy boasting of his pals. He remembers the faithful regimental bhisti of days gone by and as he staggers to his feet, that his erect posture may give force to his hiccuppy words, he begins: "You may talk o' gin an' beer when you're quartered safe out 'ere—." Ernest Glendenning used to recite the same poem at the Press Club, but he gave it in conventional albeit in very impressive fashion. The applause for Clark was long and loud. Earlier in the evening Professor Willy, the marvelous Parisian hypnotist, gave a hair-raising exhibition of his uncanny powers and Miss Toby Claude, the petite Irish girl who created the part of Fi Fi in "A Chinese Honeymoon" charmed with her coster songs. Miss Claude has since left for Honolulu and Australia to sing in vaudeville some songs written for her by Thomas Grant Springer of the Press Club.

A Christian Science Testimonial

It was at a meeting of the local Christian Scientists and various neophytes were giving testimony to the results which had followed their first application of the teachings to the needs of life. A certain charming but rather innocent matron who belongs to quite a swagger set here arose in due course. "I have a marvelous circumstance to relate to you," she began; "something which has stimulated my faith wondrously. A short time ago my favorite cat had four kittens, but alas, they were all born blind. I gave them Christian Science treatment and behold, in a week and a day, all the kittens obtained their eyesight." As everybody except this innocent matron knew that kittens were born blind and remained so for eight days, the silence that followed was painful.

Two "Roughneck" Stories

The San Francisco "roughneck" is a wonderful individual, with traits of character that differentiate him from the New York hoodlum, the London hooligan and all the other "lowbrow" types. In particular is he noted for his forceful humorous expressiveness. Here are two new stories that illustrate this part of him. Two longshoremen were discussing the comparative merits of their work fellows. "There is Tom Kelly," said one; "Tom is the best coal passer I know." "Tom Kelly a good coal passer," replied the other scornfully; "why Tom Kelly couldn't pass salt to a good egg-eater." A teamster was expatiating on a certain saloon in East street or, I suppose I should say, on the Embarcadero. "It's a bum joint," he summed up. "They've got a concrete floor and you can't have a fight with a friend of yours without killing him."

Trouble Over "The Ten Dollar Raise"

Young Pete Kyne of this city who has been the envy of all our story-writers since the Saturday Evening Post began publishing his yarns, is just now experiencing one of the troubles of authorship. Some time ago one of his stories entitled "The Ten Dollar Raise" was published

WHY DON'T WOMEN LIKE TO COOK?

¶ Why do American girls shun home work?

¶ Why nowadays are there so many cafe meals? so many dinners downtown? So much less home-hospitality?

¶ It's partly because cooking with wood or coal in the old-fashioned way, building fires, fetching fuel, carrying out ashes, is a dirty duty for any woman. It's drudgery.

¶ Menial work is for the menial! Americans are not naturally menials, and even foreigners soon quit American kitchens for a cleaner job or more pay.

¶ It isn't the cooking that women dread. Watch a pretty girl at an electric chafing dish!

¶ It's the unnecessary work about the ordinary stove, the long wait for proper heat and then the unneeded heat afterward, no hot bath-water without a preparatory and continued kitchen fire, the greasy task of filling kerosene lamps.

¶ But gas makes cooking on a modern range quick and clean, and wastes no heat. Gas produces hot bath-water in five seconds with an instantaneous water-heater.

¶ Electricity gives a clean, brilliant, safe, and ready light, toasts bread right on the dining table, keeps a flatiron hot while you are using it, operates a suction sweeper that absorbs dust and germs from carpets, rugs, and upholstery.

in the Saturday Evening Post. It was an interesting story with good dramatic possibilities and a vaudeville sketch-writer of Chicago, Evelyn Weingardner Blanchard by name, promptly appropriated the plot. She had been engaged to write a sketch for Charles T. Schleuter and his wife, a vaudeville team hailing from Oakland and she was promised $500. When the sketch was submitted and $100 was paid on it, Schleuter discovered that it had been plagiarized from Kyne's story and promptly notified him. As Kyne had not parted with the rights of his story, he had an excellent case for damages, but Schleuter has determined to sue on his own account, just to teach unscrupulous sketch-writers a salutary lesson. I believe that actors are compelled to be constantly on the alert against this sort of work and they are willing to make common cause with writers against those who crib their material. This affair will turn out to Kyne's benefit, for it will advertise his wares and no doubt Schleuter will be willing to pay him for the dramatic rights of the story.

Emotional Stage Folk

Those who keep track of things theatrical have been treated recently to two outbursts of that peculiar quality which is generally called "the artistic temperament." If this terms means anything at all, it probably applies to those intellectual attributes which make an artistic career possible, but in its vulgar usage it covers all the weaknesses, vices even, which artists have in common with lesser mortals. It is a cant phrase like "eccentricity of genius" which nearly always connotes something disagreeable and repellant. The ebullitions of artistic temperament which the newspapers described within the last few days were distinctly unpleasant. Miss Eva Tanguay, a vaudeville player, let her artistic temperament rule her so strongly that she stabbed a stage-hand with a hat pin. Miss Fritzi Scheff, the prima donna, gave way to her artistic temperament to the extent of deserting her company when an understudy for her role made good with the audience. Miss Tanguay, from all accounts, sings vulgar songs to the accompaniment of vulgar posturings, so she is not a high class member of the theatrical profession. Nevertheless her great success on Broadway and the popularity of her pictures in the magazines entitles her to the possession of an artistic temperament and raises her assault upon the stage-hand above the level of an ordinary offense. It is hardly worth while to dwell on it further than to suggest, in defiance of all the canons of the artistic temperament, that it seems to have been simply an exhibition of extremely bad temper with murderous trimmings.

The Case of Miss Scheff

The case of Miss Scheff is much more interesting. Miss Scheff ought to have the artistic temperament in its best sense, for there is no doubt that she is one of the best light opera singers in the world. She has a pleasant stage personality, considerable acting ability and, one would naturally suppose, a well cultivated mind. Yet she has allowed herself to be dominated by one of the meanest of weaknesses, jealousy. One would suppose that after attaining the exalted position on the stage which Miss Scheff occupies, a player would be free from this petty failing; or that, if she yielded to it at all, it would be evoked by the achievement of another singer on her own level or above her. Miss Scheff, however, was jealous of an understudy, one who could not conceivably injure her standing. With her beautiful voice, her radiant personality and her towering position, Miss Scheff yields to an emotion of which a great-minded person would be incapable. Is it possible that one may be a great artist and still be small-minded? Must we, keeping other outbreaks on the part of operatic stars in view,

FACTS about the Hupmobile

The Hupmobile claims the right (and that right is conceded by discriminating owners) to travel side by side with the best products of motordom.

When you buy a Hupmobile you buy a quality and a degree of excellence with which the price has nothing to do.

The man who owns a Hupmobile will tell you that it is as sturdy and staunch and strong as the costliest cars.

Every part that contributes to power and speed and staunchness in the Hupmobile is precisely as good and fine as the same part in the best big car.

The Hupmobile will go anywhere that a big car will go; climb any hill the big car will climb; and do anything the big car will do except that it will not carry the same number of passengers.

Hupmobile, $850. — 4 cylinders. 20 H. P. Bosch magneto. Selective gears.

Investigate these facts—let us demonstrate this marvelous "little big" car to you.

conclude that one may be gifted with a great voice and still lack the other great qualities that are expected of an artist? Some great singers have been almost divine on and almost diabolical off the stage. Some have interpreted masterpieces of music as though inspired and have been woefully illiterate and uncultured. Is a voice a gift which does not necessarily imply the gift of brains or of a great soul? These are hard questions to answer, but they insist on presenting themselves on an occasion like this when a great singer disappoints those who have gloried in her voice by showing herself a very mean woman.

Mose Johnson—"I feels terrible sick, 'Liza Jane."
'Liza Jane Johnson—"Huh! nuffin' thah mattah wiv yo' dat physician says, 'ceptin' chronic indolence and congested circulation."
Mose Johnson—"Umph! ain't dat enuff?"

Lady Hope Kept Lodgers

May Yohe Strong, I see, is having recourse once more to the divorce courts. The news comes from Portland. When I last heard of this temperamental woman she had reached the dreary level to which she had been so surely drifting for many years—she was keeping a second class lodging house in Seattle. That meant that even the managers of the inferior circuits were no longer willing to pay for the exploitation of her personality. When the former Lady Francis Hope played an engagement in a cheap theatre in Sacramento I thought that she had reached the bottom, but a second class lodging house keeper is really the limit of sordid descent. I believe that May's mother is with her and that Putnam Bradlee Strong is in Macao, China, trying to win a competence for the wife who is engaging in divorce proceedings. I imagine he still loves her. A newspaper quotes May as saying that she realizes that she has wasted her past and only desires to forget. There is no doubt that she is sincerely trying to make old age as comfortable as possible for her mother. The newspaper states that Mrs. Strong is still a very handsome woman, heavier than in the olden days but with the same brightness in her big black eyes and the same clear beauty in her olive complexion. I think this is a charitable exaggeration; May Yohe has aged and when I last saw her she bore visible marks of the ravages of suffering and the pace that kills.

The Hope Diamond

They say that May Yohe Strong shudders when the Hope diamond is mentioned. Well she may, for though her fate has not been as tragic as that of others who possessed it, she has not escaped from its baleful influence. What a curious record that gem has! Jean Tavernier, who stole it from a Hindu god, was torn to pieces by wild dogs. Marie Antoinette, who begged for it and got it, was beheaded. King Louis XVI, who owned it, was beheaded. Princess De Lambale, who wore it, was slain by a French mob. Williams Fals recut it and died ruined. His son, Hendrik, stole it from his father and died a suicide. Henry Thomas Hope, who bought it, suffered misfortune for years, and Lord Francis Hope, his grandson, became a bankrupt and lost his wife. Simon Frankel, a New York broker, once bought it and financial trouble followed. Jacques Colet, another owner, went mad and ended his life, and Prince Ivan Kanitovski was killed by revolutionists. The Sultan Abdul Hamid bought it and was dethroned, while the man who sold it to him fell from a precipice with his wife and child. The man who guarded it for the sultan was hanged by a mob, and Selim Habid, who finally bought it from Abdul Hamid, was drowned in the wreck of the steamer Le Seyne, off Singapore. It is now in the possession of M. Rosenau of Paris.

Appealing to Ben Butler's Sentiment

Here is one of the numberless stories told on Ben Butler: The narrator had an important law case on, and believed that Ben Butler was the man to win it. Butler was in Washington, so he went to the capital, and after two days succeeded in obtaining an interview with the general, who declared that he was overwhelmed with work. He would not take the case for $1,000 a day.

"General," said his visitor, as Butler turned abruptly to his work, "I was born in the same town with you."

He grunted, but wasn't otherwise affected, so far as the visitor saw.

"Do you remember little Miss ————? And the boy who used to send notes to her, and the boy who used to take them? I am the boy who took them."

"And I am the boy who sent them," said the general. He held out his hand.

"I guess I'll take your case after all," he said. And he did, and won it.

The Hodja's Sermon

One day the Hodja was too lazy to preach his sermon. He simply addressed himself to the congregation, saying: "Of course you know, O faithful Mussulmans, what I am going to say." The congregation cried out with one voice: "No, Hodja, we do not know." "Then if you do not know, I have nothing to say to you," replied the Hodja, and left the pulpit. Next time he again addressed his congregation, saying: "Know ye, O faithful Mussulmans, what I am going to say to you?" Fearing that if, as on the previous time, they said "No," the Hodja would leave them again without a sermon, all cried: "Yes, Hodja, we do know." "Then, if you know what I am going to say," quietly remarked the Hodja, "of course, there is no need of me saying it," and he again stepped down from the pulpit, to the consternation of the congregation. A third time, the Hodja again put his question: "Know ye, O faithful Mussulmans, what I am going to preach to you?" The congregation, determined not to be disappointed again, took counsel on the question. Accordingly some of them replied: "No, Hodja, we do not know," while others cried: "Yes, Hodja, we do know." "Very well, then," said the Hodja, "as there are some of you who do know, and others who do not know what I am going to say, let those who do know tell it to those who do not know," and quickly left the pulpit.

Kee Lung and the Lawyer

Some time ago a well-known local attorney who prides himself upon his handling of Chinese witnesses was defending a railway damage case. The lawyer is a bit near-sighted, so failed to note when a Chinaman came upon the stand that the witness' clothing was of finer texture than the ordinary Coolie. Instead of following the usual questions as to name, residence, if the nature of an oath were understood, etc., the following dialogue ensued: "What your name?" "Kee Lung." "You live San Francisco?" "Yes." "You sabbie God?" "Mr. Attorney, if you mean 'Do I understand the entity of our Creator?" I will simply say that Thursday evening next I shall address the State Ministerial Association on the subject of the 'Divinity of Christ' and shall be pleased to have you attend." When order was restored the examination proceeded upon ordinary lines, but to the day of his death the lawyer will never cease to be asked if he "sabbie God?"

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—While there appears to be little change in the legislative plans of the Washington administration, leading bankers and business interests here seem to be without particular concern as to the immediate future in regard to the complete bills which will be passed at the present session of Congress. Undoubtedly, the most important factor in the outlook, as viewed by bankers, is the great promise of excellent crops in 1910, the scientific development of which will greatly increase acreage and mean the possibility of ten billions of wealth from farm products in the coming year; hence the railway companies will suffer only from lack of rolling stock to carry the tonnage. With the elimination of labor difficulties, it would seem as if the Wall street atmosphere were sufficiently cleared to advance securities values quite materially in the coming two or three months and thereby create a market for a large amount of new securities for further railroad development and such seems to be the purpose of the foremost banking institutions here.

Wheat—The highest prices of the crop year were touched on Monday last, under the exciting crop damage reports. An attempt on the part of some of the leading brokers to market some of the cash wheat held here by the big Eastern owner, failed signally after considerable sales to the local mills had been reported. This weakness in the cash article offset the sensational reports from the crop-killer and as soon as the weather took a change for the better, crop reports were lost sight of and sentiment changed decidedly to the bear side, prices receding rapidly and at the close of the week they were at the lowest point. The government report, due Tuesday, will be the annual estimate of the quantity of wheat in farmers' hands, and it is conceded on all sides that the total will be larger than it was a year ago. This was an added influence and kept the bears in ammunition. After this report is out of the way, the crop-killer will have his inning again, and judging from some of the reports that have been coming in, there is no question but what he has good grounds for a continuance of the same. That there has been damage done to the growing crop by the hard freeze, followed by a period of warm wet weather, is conceded by the best posted people in the trade, and time can only tell the extent. In the meantime we look for a very nervous market, favoring purchases on any forced declines.

Corn has followed wheat and has shared in the decline, prices being at the low point at the end of the week. The government will issue its annual report Tuesday and it is expected to be bearish, as far as quantity is concerned. This will likely be offset by the report on quality. Receipts have dropped off perceptibly during the last week, and it is estimated that the corn in transit has decreased fully 25 percent. Country roads are now pretty generally in bad shape in the northern half of the corn belt, but some improvement may be expected soon, with good weather in the southern half. There is no prospect of any relief to the trade from an export outlet.

Cotton—The apparent strength of the market last week was due to the rumors or reports of control of the available stock in New York and New Orleans by important trade and speculative interests. Report also had it that there was more inquiry for spot cotton in the south. Now, with regard to old crop deliveries, the supply and demand will be the governing factor. While the new crop arrivals which are being traded in at a discount of about 225 points will be controlled by the prospects of such new crops, and this is a situation which must be studied and watched and the pro's and con's considered, there seems to be no doubt that the severe winter has, to a considerable extent, exterminated the boll weevil in the Southwest and Mississippi Valley, and of the acreage being enlarged, and the use of fertilizer increased. Then again, Mr. Ellison, an authority on cotton, has reduced his estimate on consumption of American cotton by the world this season to only about 11,500,000 bales, whereas, last season it was 13,157,000 bales, and this English authority further expressed the opinion that there would be a further curtailment unless lower prices prevailed, as high prices have reduced the demand for goods and that the only legitimate influence of maintaining even the present levels, let alone increased values, is an unfavorable new crop condition. On the other side, the world needs a record-breaking crop for next season, fully 14,000,000 bales, and the cotton has yet to be made. The weather maps show wet and unfavorable weather east of the Mississippi, retarding farm work in the East Gulf and South Atlantic states where preparations for the next crop are becoming backward, owing to the incessant rains. Therefore, until more definite, or reliable news on the situation is received, as well as the government reports, it is advisable to use great caution and stick to the scalping side of the market.

Copper—There were some large sales of copper this last week and altogether it is estimated that 30,000,000 pounds were taken by large consumers on Thursday. It is safe to assume that this buying will be followed by further takings on the part of the smaller consumers and that we have reached a point where another buying period, like that witnessed at the end of November is at hand. The price has not changed, as far as the leading agencies are concerned, but copper offered at their prices has been absorbed, that is, at 13¾. The copper situation, for the time being, is in the hands of the producers. It is evident that a curtailment of output is necessary, if higher prices are to be realized. As to the share market, there has been quite an active market for coppers during the week, with a general tendency towards higher levels. Last week we said that we thought Lake was a good purchase at the prevailing price, 70 and 71, and the outcome has proved the soundness of our recommendation, as we thought the copper shares, aside from their intrinsic value, would respond to the strength of the New York stock market. The buying was particularly good in the Cole-Ryan issues and we continue to look forward to even better prices in the near future for such stocks as Green Cananea, Giroux, Butte Coalition, Nevada Consolidated, Miami, Inspiration, Boston Coalition, Boston

Consolidated and other recognized standard stocks. The showing of Anaconda for the last nine months is remarkable, as the stock for that period has earned $2 per share, or 8 per cent on a par of $25. The company is earning enough to meet its dividend distribution of $2 per share, something it had not done for the years 1907-08. Business throughout the country received a general setback in February which could be attributed to uncertainty over legislation, or legal decisions, and now the cheapness of money and investment absorption will probably offset the above. For the present, we see a more or less narrow copper market and just as certainly may we look for a strong healthy one in the near future and would advise the long side, especially on any recessions.

A remarkable phenomenon was observed during a thunder shower in Finland in the summer of 1908 by V. J. Laine, who was making meteorological observations for the Finnish Scientific Society. The shower approached from the east, and the thunder, which had been heard at intervals during a half hour, ceased before any rain fell at the place of observation. During approximately the same half hour the eastern horizon was completely spanned by a double rainbow, which likewise vanished before the rain came. Immediately after each peal of thunder the colors of both bows, and especially those of the secondary bow, became confused and indistinct, and the whole double rainbow appeared to vibrate rapidly. Laine explains this singular phenomenon, in accordance with the Airy-Pernter theory of the rainbow, by assuming that the concussion of the air which produced the sound of thunder also increased the diameter of the raindrops from less than 1-250 inch to between 1-50 and 1-25 inch. If this assumption is confirmed it will furnish a valuable contribution to the theory of thunderstorms, which is still incomplete.

There was a fearful hurricane, with flying stones and sand, in Pekin when the late Viceroy Chang Chih-tung's funeral procession left by the Front Gate. People said: "He was so good that the very elements acclaim his coffin," but the native newspaper adds: "How about the feelings of the hatted and robed thousands who escorted the coffin? Are their comfort and feelings not to be considered?" It is curious to note in the account of the funeral the parenthetical advertisement: "The arrangements were all carried out by the undertakers X. & Co." These arrangements included a yellow sedan carrying the posthumous title of "Wen-siang" or "Doctus Adjuvans" granted by the Emperor; bearers conveying the foreign wreaths, others carrying the honorary umbrellas presented to the late Viceroy by the people at various times, others again carrying pole boards setting forth all the deceased's honors and titles. In order to raise money the Front Gate enclosed area (not hitherto so used) has been let out as a market to two speculators.

A letter from W. J. Urquhart, chief of the White Company's western sales department, informs H. E. Doty, assistant Pacific Coast manager, that 192 orders for White Steam and Gasoline cars were booked at the Chicago Automobile Show just past. This is one of the most remarkable sales ever reported in the automobile business.

The Cudahys Known Here

Jack Cudahy who startled the country the other day in Kansas City belongs to a family which is very well known here. Mrs. Jack Casserly is his sister and Edward Cudahy, a younger brother, is engaged to marry Miss Nora Brewer of San Mateo. This marriage has been the cause of a great deal of gossip. For quite a long time it was thought in local society that the engagement would be broken off on account of sudden ill health on the part of young Cudahy. He went away for treatment and from all accounts is once more restored to sound health. The money of old Michael Cudahy, the great Chicago packer, has had a great deal to do with the social prestige of the Cudahy clan in Burlingame and elsewhere.

Talented Society Amateurs

Mrs. Fred Kohl sang several songs of her own composition at the musicale she gave last week. Both as composer and vocalist this charming society matron might win wider fame than among her friends. She has beauty too, of the Greek blonde order. More than once when Lillian Russell has played engagements here, Mrs. Kohl has been embarrassingly mistaken for the light opera queen, and strangely enough her voice is very like Miss Russell's. There is really no reason why Mrs. Kohl should not have a dazzling and successful stage career, except her lack of inclination for it. Mrs. Jack Casserly who played her accompaniments on the harp at last week's reception is another society amateur who is talented beyond many professionals. Any number of the belles and young matrons of society are gifted in a musical way. Well trained voices are quite common. But a few, as well, have the temperament that would assure them success on the stage. Mrs. Worthington Ames is one of these. She has a powerful voice, and the personality that means more than art these days. Her friend Mrs. Benjamin Lathrop was equally dowered and she has made a professional success in New York, on the concert stage, with possibly a grand opera career ahead. Mrs. Joseph Oliver Tobin's voice is of lighter quality, but she sings with all the verve and dash of a Fritzi Scheff. Mrs. Kohl, by the way, has not previously sung at any large affair for several years. Her last appearance for charity was at the Children's Hospital benefit given three years ago when her health suffered from the strain of many rehearsals in a draughty auditorium.

The Men Stayed Away

The reception at the Francisca Club last week was a brilliant success in all respects but one. There was a crowd of handsome women beautifully gowned and the decorations were exquisite. But alas, it was almost an Adamless Eden. Whether it was the stress of business or the disinclination to don afternoon attire, I do not know, but there was a most conspicuous dearth of masculinity. This made it very embarrassing for the few men who did attend. I noticed one timid young fellow, garbed in the height of fashion, standing in the doorway of Vickery's and ever and anon peering out at the throng of women who were entering the club. It was plain that he found it hard to screw his courage to the sticking place, but he finally succeeded and rushed madly up the steps, as though he didn't care what happened to him. When the Town and Country Club gave their reception last year and admitted men for the first time, their beautiful rooms were crowded and many of the masculine guests remained till the last possible moment. I wonder why the men did not flock likewise to the Francisca? Is exclusiveness so cold and repellant? No excuse can be found in the lack of interesting women, for the most interesting women in town were there: brains, beauty and wealth were all amply represented. So the absence of the men takes on an aspect of mystery.

Chatter at the Opera

The city is not yet prepared to welcome the metropolitan fashion which makes loud talking and indifference to the music de rigeur at the opera. The proof of our provincialism was given at the performance of "Madame Butterfly" last Thursday night when two young ladies in a box were rebuked for following the New York custom. These two young ladies are very beautiful and are very well known in swagger society. They were stunningly gowned and naturally attracted a great deal of attention. When the music began they commenced an animated conversation in loud tones, just as the boxholders at the Metropolitan do. What was their surprise when one of the occupants of the adjoining box leaned over and requested them to maintain silence. It seems that this person was desirous of hearing the music. The young ladies, no doubt vastly amused at this evidence of provincialism, decided to humor him and remained silent during the rest of the evening. I noticed Mrs. Langley Porter who has recently returned from abroad, in the audience that evening. She was resplendent in an elaborate black costume trimmed in jet and wore a pearl dog collar. Mrs. Rothschild who was Miss Lucy Jackson, wore an extremely handsome mauve chiffon setting off to advantage her blonde coloring. As usual, Mrs. Cyril Tobin was one of the best dressed women in the audience.

Drinking Among Our Women

Are the women drinking more than they used to in this city of devil-may-care? Or are they simply indulging their love for alcoholic stimulants more openly than of yore? I am in doubt what to think. A tolerable familiarity with the town extending over some few years does not help me to make up my mind. I am inclined to compromise by deciding that women are doing both; that is to say, drinking more than ever and more openly than of yore. In all the fashionable cafes where women lunch one or two rounds of cocktails seem invariably to precede the consumption of food and sometimes there are more than two rounds. Then beer is ordered in place of the coffee or tea that used to content them at the noon repast. The sight of two women lunching tete-a-tete with a bucket of wine beside them is not uncommon, yet I am glad to say, in the interest of good taste, that it usually excites adverse comment. Mind you, I am speaking of women whose position in our social life is fixed, women with husbands and children, not the fireflies of the tenderloin. Every afternoon the cafes are patronized almost exclusively by women who make the trip downtown on a shopping excursion the excuse for a number of highballs. Just look in some afternoon on one of the big cafes and note the number of women who are absorbing the insidious Scotch or the subtle suisesse. From two until six o'clock this state of affairs continues, a sort of feminine counterpart for the masculine cocktail route of the olden days. I have seen some women of family start home at the dinner hour after one of these sessions that have caused me sorrow and wonderment, though I am no prude. How they ever preside at the dinner table I am at a loss to explain. Perhaps they shut themselves up in their rooms and plead "headache" to their anxious husbands and children. It is a wonderful town, my masters, and more reckless since the earthquake than ever before.

Kuehne Beveridge to the Fore

Kuehne Beveridge, the sculptor whose career started right in our midst, has just achieved the limelight for the one thousandth time. Miss Beveridge is endowed with a singular felicity for reminding us of her existence; a very pleasant reminder, by the way, for she is a charming woman whom the gods touched with genius. Ever and anon she appears in print, usually on the first page of the daily or in the supplement of the Sunday paper, and her activities always make an interesting chronicle. This time Miss Beveridge has made a master-stroke in the game of publicity. It seems that she has modeled a group which she calls "The Vampire" and that its exhibition in Leipsic has evoked a great deal of favorable and unfavorable criticism. Miss Beveridge has announced her intention of bringing the sculpture to this country. That was the master-stroke and as soon as it had been delivered, the Baroness Ray von Wrede who used to be Ray Beveridge, Kuehne's sister, gave a pretty exhibition of team work. She called upon Anthony Comstock, the self-appointed guardian of American morals, and upon Collector Loeb of the New York custom house, to ascertain whether any objection would be made to the coming of the statue. Was not that a keen instance of one sister aiding another? The result was most gratifying. Loeb said that he would make no objection, but old Saint Anthony threw a fit and emitted sounds that have been published in every newspaper in New York.

When Comstock inspected photographs of "The Vampire" he went right up in the air. "This is positively devilish; it is indecent," he cried. "All that is lewd, libidinous, lecherous, lascivious or indecent must be kept from the young. There is no mind so pure that it cannot see the impure. What would be all right in the bath would be out of place on the street corner. The fall of the Roman empire began with the exhibition of the nude in art." And so on ad nauseam. It was great advertising for Kuehne and when "The Vampire" arrives there will be ructions.

A Limelight Heroine

Kuehne Beveridge has kept in the public eye all her eventful life, but her doings have always been worthy of attention. I suppose it must be twenty years now since Kuehne and Ray Beveridge, little girls in short dresses, came to this city with their mother. Mrs. Beveridge was the daughter-in-law of the well-known Governor Beveridge of Illinois. When she came to this city she was divorced from her husband and in very bad circumstances. She opened dressmaking parlors in an old fashioned house in Geary street and tried to get the very fashionable trade. Her venture was not a success and the family had a hard struggle. Finally Mrs. Beveridge married von Wrede of South Africa, a reduced gentleman. It is in that way that Ray Beveridge got her present title of the Baroness von Wrede. The von Wrede-Beveridge home was one of the most charmingly bohemian menages in town. Instead of the three Rs the girls were taught music, dancing, fencing and painting. Kuehne who gave promise of beauty that was afterwards fulfilled, picked up sculpture as another girl might pick up a doll. Ray who was slight and frail, took to blacksmithing and made horseshoes of gold and silver. Once she gave an exhibition of this unusual accomplishment at the State fair in Sacramento and was known afterwards as the "little girl blacksmith." Kuehne began posing for Marceau and other photographers and her pictures in classic poses were much admired. This led her to the stage, but after appearing with a Frohman company at the California and in stock at the Alcazar, she decided to go back to sculpture. The truth was that she had no bent for acting. So she modeled Jim Corbett and George Bromley and other local celebrities and then went east. In the east, while once more dallying with the theatrical idea, Kuehne had her first matrimonial experience and it was not pleasant.

Her Romantic Episodes

A romantic attachment sprang up very suddenly be- Kuehne Beveridge and the late Charles Coghlan and they married. It was not long before they had to separate, for it was found that Coghlan was an unconscious bigamist. The first Mrs. Coghlan who was the mother of Gertrude Coghlan, asserted her rights and Kuehne's romance was shattered. Mystery surrounded that affair and it was never satisfactorily explained just how Coghlan made the mistake of taking a second wife while he had a first. Later it was announced that Kuehne was going to marry the erratic Jim Blaine Jr., but nothing came of it except a great deal of newspaper gossip. Then, after Adalbert Hay fell out of a window and was killed, she allowed it to be known that he was engaged to her. From New York Kuehne went to London and everybody from the then Prince of Wales to Buffalo Bill was modeled at her smart studio. She spent some time in South Africa before the Boer war and made a bust of Cecil Rhodes. Finally she married one Branson of Johannesburg at Trouville. Ray developed into a striking beauty as well as a wit and when she was in South Africa where von Wrede, her step-father, obtained a good position as a civil engineer, she was the idol of the army and navy men at Cape Town. I suppose that when von Wrede rehabilitated himself he resumed the title which he had dropped in darker days. Any way he called himself a baron and Ray is now known as the Baroness Ray von Wrede, a title which makes her interference on behalf of "The Vampire" much more impressive. The statue, by the way, symbolizes the relation of the sexes as Kuehne has observed it in her experience: "the man takes all, always and the woman gives everything."

Orchids for Miss Gregg

Since her return from New York Miss Enid Gregg has been wearing orchids, always a cause for speculation among the amiably curious. She has also been the guest of honor at several informal luncheons at the St. Francis, the host being the popular son of a millionaire newspaper proprietor. The aforesaid amiably curious, putting two and two together, are wondering if the devotion of this young bachelor has reached the orchid stage, and if an engagement announcement is to be forthcoming. Miss Gregg is very young but she is a girl of remarkable charm and a cleverness beyond the average. Much of her younger girlhood was spent abroad where she was educated. Her Spanish dancing was one of the delightful features of the Kirmess. The young bachelor in question has frequently been the hero of engagement rumors, but none so seemingly well based as this.

Belles and Beaux Go A-Rinking

The younger set has taken up skating since it may not dance in Lent and a number of jolly parties have been given at the rinks. One skating party, which was chaperoned by Mrs. George Ashton and included the two pretty Ashton girls, Miss Dorothy Baker, Miss Alexandra Hamilton, Miss Leslie Page, Herbert Baker, Arthur Brown and several others of the younger belles and beaux, was to have taken place last Saturday evening but it did not. The party gathered and repaired to the rink eager for a spin on rollers. Not until they had trooped into the hall did they discover themselves guests at a Danish masquerade ball with dancing, not skating, the order of the evening. Inquiry revealed the fact that a Danish society had possession of the rink for its annual jollification and that the visitors would be made entirely welcome, hat-checks, fifty cents, ladies free. But the spokesman of the party explained the prejudice of his friends against dancing in Lent and they politely withdrew to finish the evening elsewhere. Now when a skating party is formed to go to one of the rinks, the precaution is taken to telephone there first.

Women Photographers in New Studio

When the Misses Moore and Clarke opened a photographic studio in Presidio avenue about a year ago there was a great deal of interest taken in their venture. Their friends wondered whether they would succeed in a profession seldom followed by women and were curious to compare their work with that of masculine photographers. A year's devotion to their chosen field has shown that these two women are capable of most artistic work and their success has been such that they have moved downtown. They now have one of the most attractive studios in the city. It is located on the ninth floor of the Liebes Building, 177 Post street, in the heart of the shopping district. The rooms are tastefully appointed in every way and are finished in Japanese grass cloth in soft brown and gold. The Misses Moore and Clarke have made a particular success of child photography and will continue to specialize in this at their new studio.

In the Social Spotlight

Captain J. M. Orchard writes to say that the widely circulated report of an engagement between Mrs. McClung and himself is erroneous in all particulars.

Mrs. John G. Kirchen who has been visiting her sister Mrs. Bronte M. Aikins in this city left for her home in Tonopah on Wednesday. Mr. Kirchen is the general manager of the Schwab mines in Tonopah and that vicinity. Mr. and Mrs. Kirchen have just returned from a visit of several weeks in New York. Mrs. Kirchen extended her trip to this city to visit relatives while Mr. Kirchen went on to Tonopah.

Madame Von Brandes of London is among the week's arrivals at the Hotel Victoria. She has been spending the winter at the Hotel Coronado, but is to remain in San Francisco for several weeks before going to her English home.

Lieutenant Warren E. Keishner, Medical Reserve Corps, U. S. A., and Mrs. Keishner of New York were among the passengers sailing on the Logan during the week. They arrived in San Francisco on Sunday, and during their stay were guests at the Hotel Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Wilson are visitors in town from New York and are guests at the Hotel Victoria where they have taken apartments for a month or six weeks.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included Mr. and Mrs. Grove L. Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Eustace Cullinan, A. M. Alexander, Alvah Wilson, H. H. Cosgriff, W. E. Osborne, James Scott, Miss Alice Scott, Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Chadbourne, Dr. and Mrs. George C. Pardee and Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Welby.

Miss Marion Zeile was hostess at a very pretty luncheon on Monday at which she entertained a dozen of her girl friends. Miss Hazel Cooke also entertained at bridge and afterwards at tea in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont.

Mrs. J. B. Coryell of Menlo Park who has apartments at Del Monte for an indefinite visit, is one of the most admired guests of the season. Mrs. Coryell's gorgeous gowns, her wonderful orchids, which are sent down from her own conservatories at Menlo Park, and her two little sons, all attract favorable attention. Mr. Coryell always runs down for the week-end and had as his guest this week Mr. Leon De Woele of San Francisco.

WICKHAM HAVENS INCORPORATED, 1212 Broadway, Oakland, California

Mr. and Mrs. Jack London are visiting friends at Carmel-by-the-Sea.

Mrs. A. H. Payson of San Mateo, who is an enthusiastic automobilist, motored up from Santa Barbara, and on her way stopped over for a few days at Del Monte.

Mrs. F. D. Roe of New York, who has been visiting at the Murray Hacienda for some time, left for her home in New York last Friday.

Andrew Carnegie is expected at Del Monte in a day or so. He will arrive in his private car, coming up from Santa Barbara.

Other interesting private car parties arrived at Del Monte recently, among which was one including H. S. Van Duzer, Mr. and Mrs. Robert L. Burton and the Misses Burton, all of New York. Mr. C. F. Daly, general manager of the New York Central Lines, also arrived in his private car recently with a party of friends.

Last Sunday afternoon Dr. Arnold Genthe entertained his friends at a delightful tea at his artistic bungalow at Carmel-by-the-Sea.

Among those who were hostesses at informal luncheon parties at the Fairmont during the past week were Mrs. Schmiedell who had seven guests, Mrs. L. Sloss, Mrs. Frank Preston and Miss Florence Cluff.

Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin entertained a score of friends on Tuesday in the Laurel Court of the Fairmont.

Edward C. Knowles of New Bedford, Mass., and John F. Stafford who are making a leisurely tour of the State are at the Fairmont. Dr. and Mrs. Harry L. Elsner of Syracuse are also registered at the Fairmont.

Dr. Eugene Dupuy, accompanied by Miss Alma Dupuy, are at the Fairmont, registering from Paris. Dr. Dupuy has not been in San Francisco for the last twenty-five years and is of course very much surprised at the appearance of the city since its reconstruction. He is renewing his acquaintances among the well known members of the social set whom he knew in the days gone by. Among the other distinguished foreign visitors at the Fairmont the past week were Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Hardy of Ireland, Mr. and Mrs. D. H. L. Young, Arthur S. L. Young, Edinburgh, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene de Conlon of Geneva.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Alley accompanied by Miss M. S. Alley and Arthur A. Alley are at the Fairmont. Mr. Alley is one of the largest brewers in New England and makes his home in Boston.

John H. Divan and G. H. Lamil of London are at the Palace. Both of these gentlemen are connected with the Standard Oil interests in the United Kingdoms.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Sadoc Tobin were hosts at a beautiful dinner at the Palace recently. The table was a mass of flowers. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Cooper, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin.

Among the well known railroad men registered at the Palace during the week were W. R. Jerome, general western passenger agent of the New York Central lines with headquarters in Chicago, W. G. Barnwell, general frieght agent of the Santa Fe and C. J. Birchfield in charge of the advertising department of the same system with headquarters at Los Angeles.

Children's Day at the Sorosis Club on Monday afternoon proved to be one of the most interesting affairs which has taken place this season. Too much praise cannot be accorded Mrs. J. M. Masten who planned and carried out the entire program to a successful end.

Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton was hostess at a luncheon followed by bridge at the St. Francis Tuesday afternoon. Her guests numbered sixteen.

Mrs. Frank Allen of Tacoma, Wash., who has been stopping at the St. Francis left for her northern home on Wednesday. Mrs. Allen is the widow of the late Judge Allen, and formerly made her home in this city, where her friends have given her a cordial welcome. Mrs. Eleanor Martin and Mrs. Cyrus Pierce are among those who have entertained in her honor.

Mrs. Leopold Michels presided Saturday evening at an opera box party and later entertained her thirty young guests at an elaborate supper at the Hotel St. Francis. In keeping with Mrs. Michels' artistic mode of decoration, her table was exquisitely beautiful with apple blossoms, orchids and the choicest of roses.

On Thursday Baron Von Schroeder was host at luncheon at the St. Francis and entertained several friends quite informally, and on the same afternoon, Mrs. Greenebaum was hostess to a number of friends.

Miss Margaret Kemble's interesting lecture last week on the interpretation of music served to fill the Blue Room of the St. Francis with a fashionable audience.

On Wednesday evening, March 16, the Spooks who took part in Professor Napoleon will enjoy a theatre party followed by a supper at the Palace. The young men who took part will be the hosts on this occasion, also entertaining the chaperones.

On Tuesday afternoon, March 22, the Spinners' Club will meet at the residence of Mrs. Henry St. Goar in California street. This will be Associates' Meeting and a varied program of musical numbers will be presented.

Mrs. Ramon Wilson and her attractive daughter Miss Marie R. Wilson have booked passage on the President Grant which sails from New York on May 4 and will make a lengthy stay

My dear Bess:—

Wait until you see my wild garden—that is, if the larks leave any seeds where I've thrown them. By the dozen those gay birds flocked when they saw me sowing seeds broadcast, and I stood literally by the hour flapping my arms like a scarecrow to try and protect my garden. We have had some days so warm that one can almost see the dear little leaves pushing through the earth.

The Crocker Tract, my near neighbor, is a dream of beauty, and I see many people daily walking about looking at all the lovely gardens and horses there feeling, no doubt, as I felt, before we bought our place, a large wish to possess for themselves.

We are going over plans now for our house; in between times we pore over garden catalogues.

It is still as fascinating as at first, and I can't see how we shall ever tire of our new possession, for it will be a never ending necessity to do something and that will keep us always interested, beside the changing beauty of the hills.

Anyway we just love it now and that's the main thing.

Yours,

—Claire.

The last Myrtle Elvyn piano recital will be given this Saturday afternoon at the Garrick Theatre when the brilliant young artist will play the Chopin "Sonata," Op. 31 with its beautiful funeral march, Schumann's "Toccata," Mendelssohn's "Prelude, Fugue and Chorale" and a dozen other important and beautiful works.

Once again San Franciscans will have the opportunity to witness and enjoy the delightful "Aunt Mary" of May Robson, when she comes to the Van Ness with "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary" shortly. This charming comedienne is now on her farewell tour, she having signified her intention of retiring from the stage at the conclusion of this season's work.

When Maud Allan, the famous classic dancer, appears here in the week of April 4 she will have the support of a magnificent and complete symphony orchestra of forty-five players directed by Paul Steindorff. To accommodate this body of musicians three rows of seats must be removed from the theatre. In Oakland Bishop is going to lay off his entire company one night in order to present Maud Allan.

William Desmond, Our New Leading Man

By Edward F. O'Day

The coming of a new leading man to the Alcazar stock company is an event charged with unusual importance. Time is measured in stock companies, not by years or months, but by the length of the reigns of leading men. "In Ernest Hastings' time" fixes an occurrence quite definitely, because everybody who is anybody in local theaterdom knows just when the lamented Hastings was the idol of the matinee girls. It is so with the reign of Whittlesey; in a lesser degree with that of James Durkin who abdicated the throne, like other rulers, for the love of a woman not his wife; and getting down to the present day, it is so with Bertram Lytell. Since the departure of Bertram Lytell the Alcazar has not been happy in its leading man. John Ince is not a leading man's name, in the first place; it is, if the atrocious pun may be pardoned, too ince-ignificant. But in addition Ince had decided limitations as an actor. In a part like "Pierre of the Plains," he was splendid; but he could not wear evening clothes with plausibility. That was a fatal defect; your matinee girl is in nothing more finicky than in demanding that her leading man wear his dress clothes with the superb unconsciousness of John Drew. It may be that the leading man is young enough to be John Drew's son and that his salary may not warrant recourse to a John Drew tailor; but to these minor considerations the matinee girl is haughtily indifferent. Poor Ince did not shine in drawing room scenes, so the matinee girl turned down her dainty fudge-stained thumb and the cruel manager of the Alcazar consigned Ince to the lions. Ince's successor has arrived and as I began by saying, his arrival is an event of transcendent import. He made his first appearance on Monday evening in "Classmates," that very pretty and interesting play in which Robert Edeson once starred. I presume that the new leading man realized the eventfulness of last Monday night—that he appreciated how much it meant to the audience, to the players and to the management. It is bromidic to say that there is no audience in the city like the Alcazar audience. Other audiences may come and other audiences may go, but the Alcazar audience goes on for ever. It is coherent, amalgamated, organic, it is any adjective which expresses unity. It thinks together, applauds and disapproves together, judges by a common standard. Everybody in it has practically the same ideals as his neighbor to the right and the left; and those ideals are very tolerable ideals too. Week after week you will find the same people at the Alcazar, a Monday crowd, a Tuesday crowd and so on. To an audience like that the coming of a new leading man is a function in the nature of a trial. The new leading man has been selected for certain qualities favored by the audience and the audience is on hand to find out whether he possesses them. The verdict of the audience is final; there is no court of higher jurisdiction. But the audience is absolutely impartial, with the severe impartiality of a jury tempered by the kindliness of a judge. To the players the personality of the new leading man is important in another way. A leading man with a bad temper or with overweening conceit or selfishness can spoil the morale of a stock company in a week and make every player miserable. Then too, if he is a poor actor, he will lower the standard of the company, something of which stock players in a house like the Alcazar are justifiably proud. As for the management, no need to explain how deeply it is interested in the first appearance of the new leading man. There is an intimate connection between the ability of the new leading man and the box office receipts; when the interest of the matinee girl in the leading man diminishes, the balance at the bank diminishes in an exact ratio. Why pursue this mercenary topic? Let us get down to our new leading man. His name is William Desmond, an exceptionally good Irish name, for the Desmonds have ever been a dashing race, dark, handsome and devils with the ladies. His first appearance was very happy. He was in West Point undress, the white clothes accentuating his dark complexion—black hair, black eyes and heavy black brows. Like Phryne—pardon the comparison—he won his judges by his beauty. All the women in the audience and some of the men greeted him with applause and he smiled engagingly, showing fine white teeth. It was a splendid start for a new leading man and as the acts followed one another he deepened the first favorable impression. At the end of the third act, the jungle scene, the new leading man received an old-fashioned ovation. He was grateful, but—wise man!—not anxious to make a speech. Mr. Will Walling had to urge him to the footlights for the necessary few words with repeated pantomimes. The gestures seemed to indicate that Mr. Walling approved of the new leading man and the same feeling seemed to be expressed on the faces of the other players. Well, having achieved the conquest of the audience and the company, I imagine that Mr. Desmond will have small difficulty with the management. When Mr. Desmond had finally taken the hint conveyed by Mr. Walling he stepped forward and began: "I have to obey him; he's bigger than I am." That is the truth; Mr. Walling is taller than Mr. Desmond, but I suppose every leading man can't be as tall as White Whittlesey; and Mr. Desmond, I think, is taller than Bertram Lytell. Aside from this detail of inches Mr. Desmond seems to be the sort of leading man who will last long at the Alcazar. He is a quietly effective actor with a pleasing voice that reaches every part of the theater. He seemed equally at home in the cadet uniform, the tatters of the jungle and the frock coat of society. These are matters, however, which cannot be settled decisively after a first-night inspection of Mr. Desmond. He was naturally a little nervous, more so, perhaps, after the warmth of the audience's welcome, than he would have been in the presence of a noncommittal attitude. Mr. Desmond has undoubtedly made good with his first audience.

Vesta Tilley Engaged for the Orpheum

Vaudeville managers have recently given this city the opportunity to enjoy Alice Lloyd and Harry Lauder, two members of a trio who have been for several years the idols of the London music halls. Alice Lloyd was brought to this city by the Orpheum management, while Harry Lauder came under the direction of William Morris. Now it is announced that Mr. Martin Beck of the Orpheum management has secured the third member of the trio, the inimitable Vesta Tilley. In a cable to Mr. Morris Meyerfeld Mr. Beck states that he has engaged Vesta Tilley for a twelve months' tour of the Orpheum circuit beginning on April 19 and that she will soon appear in this city. This is great news. Those who have seen Vesta Tilley in London speak of her in the same enraptured vein which San Franciscans have used in their praise of Alice Lloyd and Harry Lauder. She is a dainty player with a fine mimetic talent and she wears masculine garb with a grace that is irresistible. Her songs are cleverly worded and harmoniously set and all the boys will be whistling them within a week after her first appearance. In London not to like Vesta Tilley argues one incapable of appreciating the best that the music halls have to offer. Her appearance in San Francisco will be a great vaudeville event.

Edeson's Success at the Van Ness

Robert Edeson at the Van Ness Theatre this week has made a great hit in his new play "A Man's a Man." The star has been greeted by large and fashionable audiences who revel in the thrilling climaxes and unusual theme of the semi-political drama. As Townsend Hewitt, the dominant figure of an intense conflict which threatens four lives, Mr. Edeson has a role of greater possibilities than even the Indian hero in "Strongheart," and that its worth is recognized by local playgoers is evidenced from the enthusiastic reception that has greeted the star at the finale of every act. Henry B. Harris has surrounded his star with an exceptional company, including such well-known players as Menifee Johnson, Josephine Lovett, Helen MacBeth, Howard Hall, Maggie Holloway Fisher, Grace Henderson, Joseph Rawley, James Grady, Lawrence Windom, Elsa Mortimer, Eleanor Sheldon, Cordelia MacDonald and others. The scenic surrounding is elegant and the entire environment of the production has a lavish air. Edeson continues for another week which will bring out all of his admirers. Matinees are on Saturdays only, and Sunday night performances are included.

Charm of "The Merry Widow"

"The Merry Widow" has again put our theatregoers in a merry mood and the Columbia Theatre is playing to crowded houses with the Henry W. Savage production as the compelling attraction. Taken all in all the present production of the Lehar work is superior to the one seen here last season, for Savage has made a number of effective changes in the minor roles. Mabel Wilber has most certainly developed in her lyric work and her Sonia is the embodiment of all that is sprightly, graceful and sweetly musical. George Damerel as Prince Danilo again wins the favor of the audience, as does also Oscar Figman as the embassador. One of the new hits of the cast has been made by Harold Blake as De Jolidon. He has a splendid tenor voice and is a capable actor as well. Sophie Barnard, Arthur Wooley, William V. Strunz and Charles Edward Wright are all to be credited with effective performances. The orchestra this year is splendid, and all the delightful numbers receive an interpretation of the most perfect order. The chorus, costuming and scenic, as well as lighting effects are well up to the Henry W. Savage standard. Matinees will be given Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Tilly Koenen, the Dutch Contralto

Although comparatively unknown in this country six months ago Tilly Koenen, the Dutch contralto, has already established herself as a great favorite in the East, just as she has in Europe where she is considered one of the greatest living concert singers. This artist will make her debut here this Sunday afternoon, March 13, at the Garrick, presenting a rare program of the songs of Germany, Italy, England and her native Holland. Works by Schubert, Brahms, Paisiello, Bassani, Tosti, Handel, Richard Strauss and Hugo Wolf appear on the list and a novelty will be three Dutch Children Songs by Catherina van Rennes sung in the original. For the program on Thursday night, March 17, some novelties by the Dutch composer Heinrich van Eycken and four Malay songs arranged for Miss Koenen by van de Wall are promised, besides works by Carissimi, Beethoven, Schubert and the eight Gypsy songs by Brahms. The farewell Koenen program will be given Sunday afternoon, March 20, with works by Schubert, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauss, E. Humperdinck, Walter Rummel, Chadwick and others as the attractions.

"The Eternal City" at the Alcazar

Hall Caine's finest play, "The Eternal City," is announced as the Alcazar's offering for the coming week. It has not been presented in San Francisco since 1904, when a company headed by Sarah Truax and the late E. J. Morgan interpreted it during a three weeks' run in the California Theatre. Popular opinion then pronounced it an even greater work than the same author's "The Christian." In the cast will be seen the full strength of the Alcazar company and a number of extra people. William Desmond is sure to be impressive as the young Deputy, and Evelyn Vaughan as the girl he loves, Bessie Barriscale as her maid, Grace Travers as a woman of the people, Adele Belgarde as a Princess of Italy, Will R. Walling as Baron Bonelli, Howard Hickman as the Pope and Louis Bennison as a Socialist leader will be seen to good advantage. Mascagni, composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana," wrote entre act music for "The Eternal City," and it will be played by the Alcazar orchestra. Each of the five acts has a sumptuous scenic setting.

"Wine, Woman and Song" at the Savoy

The last performances of that delightful extravaganza, "The Gingerbread Man," will take place at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and commencing at the Sunday matinee "Wine, Woman and Song," described as a riot of life and gaiety, feminine beauty and tuneful melody, will begin a week's engagement. So great was the success of "Wine, Woman and Song" in New York that it ran for four hundred consecutive performances at the Circle Theatre and it comes to this city with the original cast, headed by Bonita, announced as the most beautiful woman on the American stage. She won the prize for pulchritude at the Actors' Fund Fair, held in the Madison Square Gardens. There is no plot to this "musical review," it being composed principally of Bonita, rollicking comedians and pretty and shapely show girls. It is described as a show that pleases young and old alike and it is loaded with new and original features from beginning to end. For the benefit of the ladies it may be stated that Bonita will appear in a bewildering array of French gowns, fourteen in number, and each one a revelation of the modiste's art. Characterizations of David Warfield as the Music Master, Robert Mantell as Richard III, Mlle. Genee, the famous danseuse, Caruso, Blanche Bates, George M. Cohan, Fay Templeton, Maude Adams, Chauncey Olcott, Jan Kubelik and other celebrities will be presented.

Testimonial at the Van Ness Theatre

A better bill than that to be offered by Mr. Paul Gerson and his players at the benefit performance on Sunday afternoon, April 3, at the Van Ness Theatre, has rarely been staged. It will contain in one program a revival of Shakespeare's great comedy, "The Taming of the Shrew" and the interesting playlet, "The Old Guard." The benefit is given as a memorial testimonial, in the name of Carolyn David, to the Bush Street Synagogue and Eternal Home Cemetary Association and the gross receipts will be turned over to them. Mr. Charles David who was the inspiration of the affair is devoting much time and attention in the hope of making it a great success. Mr. David is the treasurer of the Columbia Theatre and his many friends have graciously volunteered and are assisting him to make the performance successful. Tickets are on sale at the box office of the Van Ness and Columbia Theatres, also at the news stands of the St. Francis and Palace Hotels. The prices will range from 50 cents to $1.50.

Five New Acts at the Orpheum

Of the eight acts to be presented at the Orpheum next week, five will be entirely novel and all will reach the highest standard of vaudeville. Arthur Dunn, the diminutive comedian whose popularity in this city dates to the period when he carried off the honors in the David Henderson production of "Sinbad" as "The Old Man of the Sea," will appear in the laughable farce, "The Messenger Boy," in conjunction with Marie Glazier, a clever and attractive young actress who is also a great favorite here. A particularly novel and fascinating feature of the coming bill will be Ida Fuller's electric sensation "La Sorciere," which consists of three scenes of exquisite beauty. In the first Miss Fuller's graceful movements are performed amid a shower of silver rain, the draperies in which she is enveloped being one mass of constantly changing colors admirably blended. The others are equally attractive. Elsie Faye, Joe Miller and Sam Weston present "The Act Dainty." This trio of agile dancers made a great hit when they were last here, particularly Miss Faye. William Gould, a raconteur, will introduce his quaint and original compositions. Mr. Gould's stage career goes back to his appearance as a minstrel with Emerson and Charles Reed in this city. Violet King, a brilliant violinist and clever entertainer at the piano who is highly eulogized by the London press and is the possessor of a gold medal presented to her by the prince of Wales at Marlborough House, will make her first appearance in this city. Next week will be the last of The Chas. Ahearn Cycling Comedians, Charlene and Charlene and of Lottie Williams and her company in "On Stony Ground."

Another Week of "The Girl" at Ye Liberty

For the week commencing next Monday evening the stock players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will revive "The Girl of the Golden West," the most popular of all the David Belasco stage successes. This piece was one of Ye Liberty's banner offerings last season and the management look for it to attain even a greater degree of popularity with their patrons next week. The story of the play has been told and retold. The scenes are laid in California in the heart of the Sierras, and the time is '49. Magnificent stage settings are called for, and the big revolving stage with which Ye Liberty is equipped makes it possible to present them as they could be on no other stage in the country. Elizabeth Stewart, who is fast becoming a favorite with transbay theatregoers will be "the girl," and Sydney Ayres is to repeat his remarkable performance of "the man," while Robert Harrison will again be seen as Jack Rance and the other favorites in the roles in which they received so much praise before. After one week of "The Girl of the Golden West" "The Light Eternal" is to be given, and "Cameo Kirby" is announced for Easter week.

"The Round-Up" at the Columbia

Klaw & Erlanger's massive production, "The Round-Up," will be the offering at the Columbia Theatre for two weeks commencing Monday, March 21, with Macklyn Arubckle in the star role. "The Round-Up" is described by the press agent as the great American play of the hour. Every character and scene in the piece, we are told, breathes the life of the great southwest. It is also said to be so realistic in its very aspect that the audiences who witness it forget, for the time being, that they are in a theatre, are transported in spirit to the locale of the story, and, in their intense interest, actually seem to participate in exciting happenings of real life. This certainly is strong language and warranted to arouse curiosity. We are further informed that the dramatic incident of twenty mounted Indians riding along a ledge on a cliff in the third act and the marvelously realistic battle scene add an element of realism to the play which has rarely been equalled in the history of the American stage.

William Collier is to stage Hattie Williams' new play, having accepted that undertaking at the request of Charles Frohman who secured a Collieresque comedy for Miss Williams. Collier has a big hit in his new piece called "A Lucky Star."

Grace George has just closed her Chicago engagement in the new play "A Woman's Way" and has started West on a limited tour of the Pacific Coast which will bring her to this city next month.

Spaniards by their accurate firing caused fifty casualties the day they arrived. But a bombardment of shell and canister began to wreck the church. In the middle of April a vessel of war, afterwards ascertained to be the American Yorktown, appeared in the Bay of Baler and the besieged almost went wild with joy at the prospect of being relieved. But after days of alternate hope and despair the Yorktown steamed away after disembarking one officer and sixteen men with a Gatling gun. This small relieving force were rebuffed before they could accomplish their purpose. The Americans were attacked by the Filipino cannons while rowing ashore and one man was killed, three mortally wounded and four wounded. The survivors reached the mountains and after great hardships finally got back to Manila. Here is the condition of the besieged at the end of May:

On the 24th the beans and coffee gave out. I mean the last remains of them. There was now nothing left to eat but a few handfuls of rice flour, the dust of the palay we had hulled, and a few dozen tins of sardines, problematically edible. Our food, besides being scant, was now reduced to a kind of poultice of pumpkin leaves mixed with sardines and a little rice; but we had to reduce even these articles. Those same men who at first would not eat the leaves because, as they said, they lay like a lump in the stomach, soon had to be restrained to prevent them from going out to the trenches and devouring those leaves raw, sprouts and all, without waiting for them to grow.

For the mornings we had in place of coffee a decoction of orange leaves, which we gathered from the trees that were in front of the church. So great was our hunger, in fact, that if a dog came within our reach, a dog was eaten; if a cat, a cat; if reptiles, reptiles; if crows, crows. A certain kind of snail was abundant. The natives loathed them, but it was soon apparent that they were disappearing. All around the church there was an abundance of leafy shrubbery, and it was all stripped, the men not being deterred by the risk, not improbable, of eating some poisonous plant.

Yet the impulse of patriotism persisted in that glorious band of heroes. Witness:

The weather, the enemy's bullets, and the hurricane had badly torn the flag which was always flying at the top of the tower. To put it in good condition was one of our greatest desires, which some might perhaps call Quixotic; but to do so I had to sharpen my ingenuity. Fortunately, the cassocks that had been used to cover the images were red. I had a yellow mosquito bar. All this served perfectly in making the substitute. And one night, when we thought the time had come to renew it, we went up into the tower, and with real enthusiasm (God knows, indeed, that I say it without boasting) we changed that venerable banner, which, on the next day, waved still more proudly, appearing to challenge the besiegers and at the same time to bless us.

Certain it is that we did not add thus a handful of rice to our stores, nor one cartridge more to our ammunition; but it is no less certain that the change warmed up our spirits, and that the sight of that venerable banner waving over us under the vault of heaven inspired us with the thought that all Spain was regarding us and was encouraging us with the promise of its gratitude, if we should do our duty as good men. I say it so seemed to us, because I remember the feeling for myself, and it shone in the eyes, filled at times, of those men who were dying under my orders.

An attack on the church made with unusual force and persistency was repulsed at every point about this time and the Filipinos left eighteen dead when they fled. An officer of the insurgents renewed the proposition of capitulation but Captain Cerezo would not listen and made plans for a desperate escape from the church into the forest. While he was preparing most elaborately for this attempt which, he knew, would involve terrible sufferings and probable death for his starving, sick and wounded men, he looked over some newspapers which had been left with him during a parley. He had regarded these papers as clever forgeries, printed as a ruse to hasten his surrender, and in the following curious fashion he was at last convinced of their genuineness and of the truth of all he had heard about Spain's downfall in the islands:

On the following morning, when it was scarcely light, I picked up the newspapers again. Throughout the night the strange fact that they had been made to resemble the genuine ones in a most remarkable manner had possessed my mind, and something instinctively counseled me to read them. Without any expectation, then, that my suspicions would disappear, I began to glance over their columns, marveling at the ingenuity that had been wasted in the attempt to deceive us and to make us surrender.

I was still admiring, my mind more and more struck with the skillfulness of the work, when a small article of only two lines caused me to tremble with astonishment. It was the simple notice that a lieutenant of the Infantry Reserve, Don Francisco Diaz Navarro, was ordered to take station at Malaga. But that officer had been my companion and intimate friend in the Bourbon Regiment; it had fallen to his lot to go to Cuba; and I knew very well that he had resolved to ask for station at Malaga, where his family and his sweetheart lived.

That could not have been invented. Those papers were therefore Spanish, and all they said was true. It was then not false that the colonies had been lost, that we had been rudely despoiled, that this little bit of the earth that we had defended even to madness was not now our own; and, as Senor Aguilar said, there was no reason for our obstinacy in defending it.

There was now nothing to do but surrender and articles of capitulation were immediately drawn up and agreed to. The besieged were to lay down their arms and were to be escorted in safety to a point where they might join the evacuating Spanish troops. It is unnecessary to follow the fortunes of this little band of heroes further. They had a rough time of it on their way to Manila, what with the treachery and cruelty of their Filipino escort, but when they arrived in Spain they were welcomed in a fashion such as had never before been equalled. This review cannot better end than with the following editorial which appeared in a Madrid paper when an American force at Baler was erroneously reported to have surrendered to the Filipinos in the subsequent trouble between the insurgents and the American forces:

"A Reminder

"A telegram from the Philippines states that the North American forces stationed in Baler have surrendered to the Insurrectos.

"The surrender of these forces in the same place where a poor Spanish Detachment, without munitions, without rations, without hope of succor, withstood an enormous force of the enemy for many months, is a consoling contrast for Spain.

"The Spartan abnegation of that handful of heroes, almost naked, hungry, but indomitable, inspiring forces a hundred times more numerous with terror and respect, writing in the history of the country one of its most wonderful pages, now appears doubly great, doubly glorious.

"Baler was consecrated by the blood of martyrs and heroes, and such achievements as theirs are not to be paralleled, cannot be boasted of by any other nation. Haughty North America may have immense riches, extensive possessions, but she has no Siege of Baler, and she never will have one.

"After long months of fierce strife, of resistance to the climate, to the afflictions of fever and hunger, and of repelling vigorous and terrible attacks, the Spanish Detachment came out of Baler with colors flying, victorious, invincible.

"It was a Detachment of dying men, of cadaverous faces, of bodies devoured by fever. But under those ragged uniforms, in those breasts trembling with the fever-cold, the heart of the Mother Country was beating, formidable and unconquerable, capable, as always, of astonishing the world by its supreme valor.

"They have despoiled us of lands and blood. It is fitting that this reminder, revived by the surrender of the North Americans at Baler, cause us to turn our eyes, still filled with tears, from defeat to those sons who yonder accomplished so gallant a defense.

"That can never be torn from Spain. She may suffer calamity, but her Sieges of Baler have gained for her and will gain for her the respect of the world."

La Bretonne

"Well, some day, if you're a good girl, and go to sleep nicely, perhaps she will."

"Oh! Then I'll go to sleep, and then perhaps she'll bring me some tomorrow."

Silence. Light and regular breathing. The child dropped off to sleep, her mother likewise. Only La Bretonne could not close her eyes. Her heart was wrung by a feeling at once piercing and tender. Never before had the current of her thoughts set so strongly towards the baby-boy whom she had strangled so long ago. It lasted until the first glimmer of dawn.

When the day broke, La Fleuriotte and her child were sunk deep in slumber. La Bretonne slipped stealthily out of the hut. She walked hurriedly toward Auberive, and did not slacken speed until she reached the first houses. Arrived there she went slowly up the one street, scanning the signs over the shop doors. At length one of these appeared to fix her attention. She rapped on the shutters, and some one came and opened the door.

It was a small draper's, where there were also for sale a few children's toys; poor toys with the freshness off: some pasteboard dolls, a Noah's Ark, a sheepfold. La Bretonne bought them all, to the amazement of the shop-woman, paid for them, and went out.

She was retracing her steps towards La Fleuriotte's dwelling when a hand was laid upon her shoulder. She turned, and shivered as she found herself face to face with a police officer. The hapless woman had forgotten that liberated prisoners were forbidden to remain in the neighborhood of the Central.

"You ought to be at Langres, not hanging about here," said the policeman sternly. "Come, be off!"

She tried to explain. It was lost labor. In the twinkling of an eye he had requisitioned a cart. She saw herself bundled into it, in charge of a policeman. He took the reins. Crack! went the whip.

The cart jolted over the frozen road. With a broken-hearted countenance the poor woman sat, grasping between her benumbed fingers her parcel of toys. As they turned a corner she recognized the part of the road that ran through the wood, and her heart leapt. She implored the policeman to stop; she had been doing an errand for La Fleuriotte, the woman who lived just beyond there. She entreated so earnestly that the man, a good fellow at heart, allowed himself to be persuaded. They tied the horse to a tree, and went up the by-path.

Before the hovel La Fleuriotte was chopping sticks for her fire. She stopped short when she saw her late visitor in the company of a policeman, and stood open-mouthed, her arms hanging slackly.

"Hush!" said La Bretonne. "Is your little girl still asleep?"

"Yes, but—"

"Take these toys in and put them softly on her bed, and tell her St. Catherine sent them. I went back to Auberive to get them, but it seems I had no right to go, and they are taking me away to Langres."

"Holy Mother of God!" cried La Fleuriotte.

"Hush!"

They entered the hut, and approached the bed. La Bretonne closely followed her escort, scattered about the bedclothes the dolls, the Noah's Ark, and the sheepfold; stooped and kissed the sleeping child's bare arm, and turned to the policeman, who was rubbing his eyes:

"We can go now," she said.

Auto Notes

While it is quite common for original purchasers to compare prices of cars, it does not occur to the inexperienced buyer to obtain a comparison of the cost of extra parts of the automobile which he may select. Charles T. Jeffrey of Thomas B. Jeffery & Company, says that he has recently made a comparison of the prices of parts of various cars and finds the cost of parts of the New Rambler are one-half to two-thirds lower than the parts of other cars. It is part of the Rambler policy not to endeavor to make a buyer believe that a car that lasts for five or six years and perhaps may meet with an accident will never require an extra part. Every part of the New Rambler is made in the Rambler factory and duplicate parts of every car ever manufactured are ready for shipment on twenty-four hours' notice. Instead of having to wait for parts, as do the owners of cars assembled from many different factories, the New Rambler owner may procure any necessary part immediately and at a very reasonable cost.

Some striking tendencies, new to the automobile industry, and even contrary to announcements made within the year, by numerous makers, have developed during the past few weeks, which will not only limit the production of automobiles during the next few years and influence the price of many cars, but will guarantee to users cars of better quality. Three months ago it was the habit of new makers to announce in stupendous figures, estimates of large outputs for the coming year. These estimates ran as high as fifty thousand cars. Recently there has developed a contrary policy, and makers generally are now claiming smaller outputs, asserting that more time will be spent in the production of the car, and more attention given to the matter of quality. The production of one or two of the very high priced cars has always been limited because of the limited demand, but the Rambler maker, Thomas B. Jeffery, was the first among the builders of medium priced cars to announce the limitation of the Rambler output to 2500 cars for 1910. The Rambler idea is that it is impossible to build a good car to sell at an extremely low price, and build it carefully. Therefore, although the Rambler factory is about the largest of its kind in the world, only 2500 cars will be built, and each one more carefully than before.

The fame of Nobby Treads, which have taken San Francisco so by storm (no pun) has evidently spread. Weinstock Nichols & Co. has just shipped a large cargo of the anti-skids to Honolulu.

"Nobby Treads" is getting to be one of the common topics of conversation among auto enthusiasts. C. S. Cole declares that from all reports "they must be the thing." Consequently he has had his Packard equipped with them.

C. R. Zacharias, Modesto agent for the Pioneer Automobile Company, was among the out of town auto men who visited the city during the past week. Zacharias is enthusiastic over automobile prospects for the coming spring. He took a 30 horsepower Chalmers back to Modesto with him.

Arthur Hertz, at present with the Oakland branch of the Kohler & Chase Co., has just purchased a Hudson runabout for business purposes. Hertz was formerly a salesman with the Pioneer Automobile Company.

Miss Henrietta Schultz, who drives a handsomely equipped touring car, is one of the city's fairest auto enthusiasts. She, as have many other car owners, realizes the advisability of owning a small car as well as a limousine. Consequently she has just purchased a fully equipped Hupmobile delivery of which was made by S. G. Chapman.

J. R. Wallace of San Jose came to town last week intent on automobiles. After looking over the situation he purchased a Hupmobile delivery of which has been made by S. G. Chapman.

J. A. Litzenberg who came to town recently and purchased an Oakland Forty Roadster drove his machine back to his home at Betteravia. He has just written to S. G. Chapman from whom he bought the machine a letter telling something of his trip. In part it reads: "To begin with the run was most successful, due somewhat, no doubt, to the roads which were in very good condition. But I must say that in all my experience I never saw a machine perform, especially on hills, as that Oakland did. It simply eats them up on the direct gear. In fact I am so delighted with the car that I want you to consider placing the agency for this territory in my hands. I am sure of being able to dispose of a number here in the Santa Maria Valley so soon as they get a demonstration."

Harry H. Scott, treasurer of the Pacific Manifold Co. of San Francisco, Cal., is one of the most ardent Hudson enthusiasts in the field. This firm has been equipping its country salesmen with Hudson runabouts, to cover both the regular valley and mountain territory. These machines are proving most successful and economical in their work. One of the first trips taken was through the Southern Mines District, and any man who has been over that territory back of Stockton and around Tuolumne and Sonora, knows that there is no more severe country to travel the whole State over. Mr. Snelling, who took this car out, had never driven an automobile up to two days before he made the trip, and he accomplished it with an absolutely perfect score, covering 1,350 miles with the greatest ease and without even a puncture. The only time he had to lift the hood of the engine was to oil the car. This speaks volumes for the durability of the car, as well as the precision with which the designers have figured out the tire equipment, and Mr. Snelling now says he would not take twice the price paid for his car, if he had to cover his territory without it.

With the opening of the spring trade the White continues one of the most popular cars in the East. H. E. Doty, assistant coast manager of the White Company, has just received word from J. H. Toole, manager of the Missouri Valley Automobile Company, stating that at the recent Kansas City show his firm sold 31 "0-0" White Steam cars.

Dr. Bertam Stone, the well known physician and automobile owner, has just purchased a 1910 30 horsepower touring Autocar. The sale was made through Walter C. Morris, the coast representative of the Autocar Company.

In a competitive test just held for a prospective purchaser a White Gasoline 3 ton truck made the run from Chicago to Evanston via Lake Shore route in 55 minutes as against 1 hour and 10 minutes made by the next fastest competitor. The whole distance was run through snow. The White was the machine purchased.

"The Full Glory of Diantha"

There appears to be an idea that Mrs. Mighels' heroine of "The Full Glory of Diantha" belongs to that reprehensible class known as "husband-hunters," but nothing is further from the truth. Diantha differs from the ordinary girl of fiction, though not of fact, only in being willing to speak out where others hint. She wants to marry because she believes marriage and motherhood are the fulfilling of the law, but she is not going to accept anything that offers in the male line. She has decided ideas, and means to secure as her mate a man who is mentally and morally her equal, physically fit, and one, moreover, who is not reformed, but who has kept himself what a man should be out of principle, not the accidental lack of sufficient temptation. Diantha was from Canada originally, but had reached New York via New England. She was a Chartered Public Accountant, successful in her chosen calling, with a comfortable bank account and a good position as bookkeeper in the business office of a lumber firm whose base was in the west. The junior partner of the concern proposed marriage to the bookkeeper but she refused him somewhat scornfully, actuated partly by pique at the form of his declaration and partly by a portion of a conversation which she overheard in which he seemed to have expressed a preference for a sophisticated widow rather than an untried girl. In the course of her refusal, Diantha waxed didactic, and outlined the kind of a man she would be willing to accept, incidentally stating that since she had found none to her liking in either north or east, she was ready to try west and south. Advanced as she was in her ideas, she did not believe it the woman's place to propose, but saw only practical common sense in placing herself in the way of a proposal when the right man was found. Simultaneously with this conversation there came an urgent demand for a competent bookkeeper at the mill in California and Diantha applied for the appointment. Mr. Junior Partner bantered her on the probability of discovering her man and promised her a thousand dollars if she succeeded, five thousand if the chosen one should please his own taste and likewise survive the ordeal of transplantation to the east. Diantha went west, found her primitive man in the person of the mill engineer and thought she would be willing to inhabit a cave in the wilderness with him alone. Circumstances sent Mr. Junior Partner west likewise, where he acquitted himself so well beside the men of the open that a comparison between him and Caspar Rhodes asserted itself. Rhodes was now transported to New York, Diantha having relinquished her western position, but singular to say, though Mr. Junior Partner and the other men with whom he was thrown into contact were eminently satisfied, it was Diantha who began to discover blemishes. For all that she had wanted a primitive man, Rhodes was altogether too primitive. He bought a straw hat two days after the closed season, used his napkin in conformity with the etiquette of the days of his grandfather, thought promiscuous public bathing and roof garden shows vulgar and did not at all approve of the charming deceptions practiced by femininity. Then, his views were so radical. He would not agree to permit his wife to retain her own name nor could he see how or why she was to remain eternally a Canadian in spite of American law, and most tyrannical of all, he would neither espouse the doctrines of Henry George nor agree to let his wife proselytize for them. In a brief word, Diantha discovered that like most women, she did not know what she wanted until she had it and then, whatever it happened to be, she was certain she didn't want that. So Rhodes was quietly passed over to some one else while she became Mrs. Junior Partner, and our last view of her is after she has attained her full glory of motherhood, and her small son is clasping his arms about her neck in perfect confidence and understanding. It is well that Mrs. Mighels has seen fit to stop right there, for most of us of an age to read the book have encountered these theorists who know precisely why other women's children are faulty and how to remedy or prevent the ill, but who, when their own time comes, bow down abjectly before their young tyrants and wonder how any one can be so cruel as to doubt their absolute perfection. Diantha has ideas on the subject of prenatality, and asserts that ninety-eight per cent of the criminals are born of respectable parents, but the mothers, being deprived of freedom—probably consenting to accept their husbands' names, nationalities and political doctrines—the children are born anarchists. Another authoress has asserted that children inherit the suppressed inclinations of their mothers and if the two statements go hand in hand it is a poor argument for the enfranchisement of women, since their criminal tendencies appear to be the ones held in check. As to Diantha's views that a woman is justified in going where she thinks it most likely she will find her true mate, what else is the whole scheme of society but a glorified marriage mart? Our duchesses and dowagers are shocked when they read of the peasant fairs of Europe where eligible damsels place themselves on view before possible suitors and where the maids who fail to "make a market" are upbraided when they return to the parental roof, but the more refined system of parading girls at balls and receptions is the same in principle and not greatly different in practice, and when the maids must silently sit and wait for some man to choose them as partners, or retire in tears when their slighting is made too obvious—when, too, girls who have made the successive rounds of summer and winter resorts and country house parties and are still unmarried, even the ordinarily complacent American parent has been known to lose temper and express opinions more emphatic than polite. In the Latin countries where the preliminaries are arranged between the parents and the question of family consent is considered before instead of after opportunity for courtship is given, girls are shielded from much of the humiliation which they must bear when, with greater freedom, they settle their own fate without guidance or counsel. If Diantha had had a managing mamma she would have had no occasion to formulate theories of her own, or at any rate, to give expression to them, for all that would have been neatly carried through without the necessity for her knowing anything about it. As it is, she did nothing more than any other girl in any walk of life who does not immure herself behind convent walls lest some horrid man carry her off, and if she had not said anything about her desire for mating but had just proceeded to do it, breaking off not one engagement but several, until she either found her ideal or contented herself with the nearest substitute available, "The Full Glory of Diantha" would have been achieved without so much critical commentary.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY MORTGAGE SHOULD NOT BE RENEWED

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5272, Dept. 10.

In the Matter of the Estate of JOHN LYNCH, Deceased.

It appearing to this Court from the verified petition of MICHAEL COSTELLO, Administrator of the Estate of John Lynch, deceased, praying for an order for leave to re-mortgage certain real property belonging to the said estate that it is for the best interest of the said estate that the said real estate should be re-mortgaged.

It is therefore ordered that all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court on Wednesday, the 6th day of April, 1910, in the Courtroom of said Court in the Grant Building, at the corner of Seventh and Market Streets, in the said City and County, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, then and there to show cause, if any there be, why an order should not be made for the re-mortgage of the said real estate.

And it is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four consecutive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco.

Done in open Court on the 2nd day of March, 1910.

THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Endorsed: Filed March 2, 1910. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By E. B. Gilson, Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY AN ORDER SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED TO THE EXECUTOR FOR THE SALE OF REAL ESTATE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 5260, Dept. No. 10.

In the matter of the Estate of TERESA MURPHY, Deceased.

Valentine J. Smyth, as the Executor of the Last Will and Testament of TERESA MURPHY, deceased, having this day presented to this Court a verified petition praying for an Order authorizing and directing him to sell, as a whole or in parcels, and at either public or private sale, the real property and the whole thereof belonging to the Estate of said decedent, which is in said petition particularly described, and it appearing to this Court, from such petition, that it is necessary to sell the real estate and the whole thereof belonging to said estate for the purpose of paying the debts against said estate and the expenses and charges of administration, and it also appearing from said petition that it would be for the advantage, benefit and best interests of the said estate, and those interested therein, to sell the said real estate and the whole thereof, for the purposes and reasons set forth in said petition; and this Court having thereupon and now and here directed that said petition be filed herein, and the same now having been filed accordingly, and being now on file herein:

It is ordered that all persons interested in the estate of said decedent appear before this Court at the Courtroom of Department Number 10 thereof, in the Grant Building, at the Southeast Corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Tuesday, the 15th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said executor for the sale of the real estate, and for the sale of the whole thereof, and for the sale of the same at either public or private sale, as said Executor shall judge to be most beneficial for the said Estate.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published once a week for four (4) successive weeks prior to the said 15th day of March, 1910, in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated at San Francisco, Cal., this 7th day of February, 1910.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 26,821.

HARDA ZOIE, Plaintiff, vs.
NICHOLAS ZOIE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Nicholas Zoie, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and abandonment of the plaintiff without any sufficient cause or reason and on the further ground of defendant's wilful failure and neglect to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life while having the ability so to do; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1909.

(Seal) ....., Clerk.
By.....Deputy Clerk.

In the Matter of the Application of JOSEPH KASIMER JANKOWSKY to Change Name.

It appearing from the written application filed in the above entitled Court on the 17th day of February, 1910, by the above named Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky praying for an order that he be permitted to change his present name, to-wit: Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky to that of Joseph Kasimer John, and that he is a resident of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California: and,

Good cause appearing to me therefore, it is ordered that all persons interested in the above entitled matter are hereby directed to be and appear before the above entitled Court in Department No. 4 thereof at its Courtroom in the Grant Building at the Southeast Corner of Seventh and Market Streets, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of April, 1910, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. and then and there show cause if any they have why the application of Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky for change of his name to Joseph Kasimer John should not be granted.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order to show cause be published for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which the above Court finds to be the one most likely to give notice to the parties interested in the hearing of said petition and the granting thereof.

Ancient Perfumes

It is difficult to realize how universal was the knowledge and use of scent in ancient times. Greek tradition avers that perfume came direct from Venus' toilet, and receipts for essences were inscribed on marble tablets all about the temples of the goddess. Egypt was a great mart for all kinds of perfumes. Women made themselves beautiful through the use of essences, and guests were received in chambers strewn with flowers. Even the dead were not forgotten, for the embalmed mummy was saturated with perfumes and spices, and sweet scents were burned before their statues. Those who could not afford this, painted scent bottles on their tombs.

The ancients thought certain perfumes had medicinal value. Pliny mentions 85 remedies derived from rue, 32 from the rose, 41 from mint, 21 from the lily and 17 from the violet. Thyme has a tonic quality and lavender is soothing. Patchouli is stimulating jasmine is cheering, while heliotrope is an irritant, unless used in small quantities. There are those in our day who think sandal a tonic, and its virtues were known to the Greeks, who anointed themselves with it for the Olympian games.

The Jew's love of perfume was so great that morning and night they burned sweet incense of myrrh, and beds were perfumed with aloes and cinnamon. So indispensable were scents considered for the bridal toilet, that one-twelfth of the bridal dowry was set apart for their purchase. The famous Balm of Gilead was distilled from a bush which formerly covered the mountains of Gilead, but has of late become so scarce that only the Sultan can be supplied. The trade in perfumes was enormous in Greece. Like the Egyptians, they understood the fascination of flowers, and an Athenian not only perfumed his house, but scented his drinking vessels with myrrh, the gum of a tree which grows in Arabia. To such an extent was the love of perfumes carried that each part of the body had its peculiar ungent; the hair required sweet marjoram, the neck and knees wild thyme; the arms, balsam; the cheeks and breast, palm oil; and the feet and legs, sweet ointment. Indeed, the perfumers' shops in Athens were the rendezvous of the beaux to discuss politics and intrigue. The love of perfumery among the Greeks spread into Rome, and soon the Roman perfumers became so famous that a bunch of sage indicated their shops. A Roman lady frequently kept one slave to sprinkle her hair. Nero was so lavish in perfume that he had a rare device of ivory leaves to shed sweet scents over his guests.

Perfumes were never richer than in Queen Elizabeth's time. This qeen was very fastidious as to her choice of scents, and her ladies in waiting could concoct sweet essences from their favorite flowers. Civet, a perfume taken from the civet cat, and musk, are frequently mentioned in Elizabethan literature. In these times perfumed gloves were so popular that the queen had her picture taken in them. Even her shoes were made of leather steeped in scented oils, which permeated the skin, just as now the smell of Russia leather is due to the oil in the birch with which it is cured. Boxes of bergamot and scented beans perfumed the dressers, and the scent called fragipani, after a noble Roman of that name, was so popular and enduring it was called "the eternal perfume." Elizabeth and her ladies also delighted themselves with pomanders, balls of ambergris, benzoin and spices formed into beads of which chaplets and rosaries were strung.

Catherine de Medicis knew as much of perfumes as she did of poisons, and the court at Versailles had a special perfume for each day with a Louis XIV to superintend the making.

Best Part of the Game

George William Sellers, a well-known American cricketer, described in Chicago his attempt to teach cricket to the men on his Indiana estate.

"Cricket is, of course, a more leisurely game than football," said Mr. Sellers. "We played it on my place in the proper leisurely manner, and all my men seemed pleased. Our first match was with Concord.

"One of my men—his name is John—seemed particularly pleased. John did full justice before the match to the lunch served in the marquee on the lawn. He enjoyed, too, the meat tea that pleasantly interrupted the afternoon's play. At each time he was on hand when the drinks and cigars and sandwiches were passed round.

"During the open-air dinner that wound up the first day's play I turned to John and said:

"'Well, old man, what do you think of cricket?'

"'Mr. Sellers,' said he, 'it would be a grand game if it wasn't for all this here fieldin' and runnin' about between meals.'"

Taking No Chances

An epileptic dropped in a fit on the streets of Boston not long ago, and was taken to a hospital. Upon removing his coat there was found pinned to his waistcoat a slip of paper on which was written:

"This is to inform the surgeon that this is just a case of plain fit, not appendicitis. My appendix has already been taken out twice."

"My son, there is always more pleasure in giving than in receiving."

"I know, mother, especially in spanking."

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys, FREE

Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, etc. Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.

A Case of Inconsistency

In Congress the other day the Hon. Richard Wayne Parker of the Seventh New Jersey district exposed himself to the charge of inconsistency, and instantly it was leveled at him, but it failed to crimson his cheeks with blushes. Having voted against a provision of the army appropriation bill to retire five Brigadier-Generals with the rank and pay of Major-General, following a sentimental precedent by which others had profited, he was reminded that he had voted for a similar measure a few years ago and asked why he was hostile to the proposition under discussion. "Because," he said, "I repented the moment I voted for that other bill." It is refreshing to find a man in public life who is not afraid to be inconsistent. We know of no fallacy more absurd and pernicious than that consistency is one of the most admirable of virtues. Somebody once upon a time pronounced consistency a jewel, thus giving birth to an aphorism that has done a good deal of harm in the world. The objection to all aphorisms is that they are very seldom exactly true. What they enunciate unqualifiedly cannot safely be taken for guidance with the mind's eye closed. Consistency is often a jewel, but on the other hand as another epigrammatist has said, inconsistency is the bugbear of little minds. As we are far from infallible and as circumstances are always changing, to be consistent is either to be too obtuse to perceive our errors or too obstinate to own them. The average man that makes consistency a rule of conduct has no receptiveness to new ideas. He is like a stagnant pool that does not even reflect the light that falls upon it. In politics consistency is often the root of a blind and intolerant partisanship. Men have a bias given to their thoughts before they have established what may be called a belief founded on reason. They become attached to a party or a cause before they have had time to study principles or purposes. In time they learn that they are identified with something that ordinarily would repel their sympathies, but the dread of having inconsistency interpreted as dishonesty or regarded as evidence of instability restrains them from following the truth as they see it. They prefer to reconcile differences, to drug their conscience and even to compromise with cant and hypocrisy. They are men of little minds to whom inconsistency is a hobgoblin.

The Call for Peary's Data

Now it's up to Lieutenant Peary to produce proof of his discovery of the pole. By Congress the sentiment has been embodied in a resolution that the famous Arctic explorer before receiving honor or emolument from the Government should make it clear to experts that he is laboring under no hallucination with respect to his achievements. Thus the prospect unfolds of a reopening of the pole controversy. Upon this subject there is a great deal of misapprehension. By many people it is supposed that Dr. Cook has been utterly repudiated in scientific circles and that credence is everywhere given to Peary. This is far from the truth. Dr. Cook still has the confidence of many explorers and scientists who have no difficulty in accounting for the things that seemed to justify the scepticism of his enemies, and whose faith in him has not been shaken by his eccentricities of conduct. Even the people of Denmark, according to Minister Egan, still believe that Dr. Cook discovered the pole, and many of them are expecting him to return with complete records showing that he accomplished the feat which brought him before the eyes of the world. There are Arctic explorers who believe that Dr. Cook has been the victim of enormous injustice. They sympathize with him because they are sensible of the terrible strain that was put upon his weakened constitution immediately upon his return from the North, where he endured hardships that are beyond the conception of anybody who has not experienced them. To spend months in that desolate region, to experience the tension that is put upon the nerves and upon the mind of the wanderer amid fields of ice where all is barren waste and bleak monotony relieved only by terrifying incidents of daily occurrence, and then to undergo a quick, bewildering transition into the hurly-burly of a great city, to be feted for a brief moment, by the world acclaimed a hero, and then plunged into the storm of a violent controversy involving the most vital consequences—all this is certainly enough to play havoc with mental faculties of the strongest fiber, and all this is but a feeble description of what happened to Dr. Cook. Now there are scientists who have scrutinized his data, analyzed his statements, minutely examined every circumstance relating to his journey and to his conduct, and they have affirmed that there is more reason to believe in him than to believe in Peary. So far Peary has not submitted any data save the reports of his soundings which take him within five miles of the pole. These he made to the Geodetic Survey. His reason for not producing other data is that he wants to use the materials in lectures, magazine articles and books. His critics add that he wants also to get his evidence in shape for the examination to which eventually it will be subjected. What he has said so far has been corroborative of what Dr. Cook said before the controversy was opened, and in this connection it is worth while reflecting on the curious circumstance, known only to those who have kept in touch with the controversy, that every officer and man aboard Lieutenant Peary's ship was in ignorance of his alleged achievement until after he reached the settlement where he was told of Dr. Cook's success. Up to that time, so far as Peary's men knew, they would be asked to accompany him on another voyage. So, perhaps, it is well that Congress has decided upon having Peary's claim substantiated before yielding to the pull of his powerful friends.

A Speedy Writer

From a press notice rich in terms of eulogy we learn that Hall Caine is among other things "one of the readiest writers in contemporary literature"; also that he "dashes off his sentences with marvelous speed." Not often are press notices dealing with popular novelists so frank as this one. Usually the information that publishers vouchsafe about the traits and characteristics of the men and women whose products they market is of a kind that puts a tax on credulity. But to be told that Hall Caine's typewriter has speed is about the same as to be told that Marie Corelli has no sense of humor, or that the sun gives light. It is like receiving assurance of the obviousness of the obvious. That Hall Caine is a ready and speedy writer is evident not only from the abundance of his output but also from the style of his workmanship. It would be unjust to Hall Caine to suupose that his sentences are produced with great labor, that he wastes time in fruitless effort to give distinction to his writings. It is hardly to be supposed that he expects his novels to be bound in rich-scented Russian and set in nooks of honor in the library book-case. Writing for the masses, he does not bother about polish or any of the elements of style. Far be it from him to sweat over his work after the manner of Balzac who once made the humiliating confession that he wrote with such difficulty that he must need turn and twist a sentence a hundred ways before he was quit of it. Balzac had the old fashioned idea, common among the slaves of literature, that next to the matter of a book the gravest consideration is the manner of treatment. His methods of working upon proof-sheets corrected fifteen or sixteen times, with a little army of exasperated compositors at his beck and call, became stock Parisian anecdotage. But Balzac lived before the automobile era. He had not been seized with the speed lust.

What Conservation Means

It gives us great pleasure to answer the following communication and enlighten its author:

Editor Town Talk: Speaking of Mr. Pinchot you say that the people have approved his conservation policy without knowing what conservation means. Do you suppose they do not know what is meant by the thwarting of the Guggenheims in their efforts to get control of the Alaskan coal fields?

—Louis V. Bacon.

This is precisely what we suppose. Nay, it is something more than a supposition that we harbor with reference to the people's misapprehension of conditions generally in Alaska. We are convinced that the people are as ignorant about Alaskan affairs as they are about most everything that concerns them deeply. From the signs of the times, which are not hard to read, it is evident the people have come to the conclusion that capital is one of the non-essentials of industrial development. Influenced in their modes of thought by the new philosophy of a wonderful press the people have come to regard all manifestations of energy and enterprise on the part of capital as symptoms of a cancerous growth in the body politic. Otherwise Mr. Gifford Pinchot could not have become a popular hero by his achievements in furtherance of a policy of hostility toward all persons and syndicates that are bent upon developing the resources of the country. The people suppose that had it not been for Pinchot the Guggenheims would have obtained a monopoly of all the coal in Alaska, and they have yet to learn that the fortunes of thousands of comparatively poor men are dependent upon the capital which the Guggenheims stand ready to spend. The muckrakers have intimated that the Guggenheims were on the point of getting a monopoly of the coal fields when Pinchot appeared on the scene, and the muckrakers have the ear and confidence of the people. Now the fact is that the Guggenheims have but a half interest in the Cunningham claims which comprise only 5,280 acres. The muckrakers have not taken the pains to indicate what proportion these claims bear to the total Alaskan coal deposits. Not by them has it been made known that in the same district with the Cunningham claims are five hundred and seventeen other claims, or that in the Matanuska district are three hundred and fifty claims, all awaiting development by their owners, who are individual claimants of over 140,000 acres. The Pinchot partisans have not explained that not one of these individuals claims can be developed until machinery and transportation are at hand, nor that the only capitalists who have been found willing to advance the money and brains to open up the territory and render a now useless commodity available for commercial purposes are the millionaires whose unholy passion for the accumulation of money has rendered them objects of hatred to a people self-styled the most enlightened on the surface of this sublunary planet. Does our correspondent know what the thwarting of the Guggenheims means? Does he know that there are ten thousand people directly interested in the Alaskan coal fields and that by preventing the acquirement of 5000 acres of coal lands in a territory containing 500,000,000 tons of coal of a gross value of $900,000,000 by the only interests that will make development possible at this time, the entire coal district of Alaska has been temporarily rendered worthless. We are of the opinion that of these things our correspondent, who is perhaps an average citizen, is utterly ignorant. We assume that in his opinion whatever measure restrains the rich from growing richer automatically serves to keep the poor from growing poorer. We doubt that it has ever occurred to him that conservation for the benefit of posterity is robbery of the present generation. While we are saving for posterity coal that can be produced for less than $2 a ton we are paying from $12 to $14 a ton for coal for the use of our Pacific fleet, which consumes 400,000 tons of coal annually. This coal we import from Cardiff in foreign bottoms, and therefore in our zeal for the interests of posterity we are enriching foreign mine owners and foreign ship owners while depriving hundreds of thousands of potential American wage earners of employment. Nevertheless conservation is the paramount policy of the hour.

King Cotton on His Throne

How few of us appreciate the glory and greatness of cotton! Seen through the eyes of the Hon. Thomas Heflin, member of Congress from Alabama, cotton like music is a heavenly gift. When we consider, with the guidance of Mr. Heflin, the manifold uses to which cotton is put it awakens in us a certain reverence. From the Congressional Record, a sprightly journal, in which there is always something to beguile one, we have learned much that is worth knowing about cotton. The information is supplied by the Hon. Thomas Heflin thus:

It was behind cotton bales at New Orleans that Jackson won the victory over the British. Wherever the American soldier goes the white fibre of the cotton field goes with him, and wherever he strikes camp the field is dotted with white tents made of cotton.

The flying sails of the ships at sea come from the snowy cotton fields of the South. The cord that rings the bell on the train and puts on the emergency brake in time of danger is made of cotton. In the spring time when the agricultural army is in motion cotton enters into the paraphernalia of the mule, a cotton backband gauges the depth that the plough shall go, whether shallow or deep, and cotton ploughlines constitute the strong cords that guide and control the stubborn mule.

In traveling through the cotton belt on a warm day there is nothing more refreshing than a deep draught of water from the "old oaken bucket that hangs in the well," and here the cotton rope is the kindly agent that brings it from the cool, dark depths below.

If while strolling through the cotton belt you should find a swarm of mosquitoes conspiring to disturb your rest at night, there is the mosquito bar made of cotton spreading its white wings above your head, hovering about you while you sleep." (Applause on the Democratic side.)

So we see that cotton has in it the essence of poetic inspiration, that when a man in whose soul there is music and color thinks of cotton a wild delight runs through him, akin to that which thrills the cotton speculator who finds the market shaping itself to vindicate the wisdom of his ventures.

"Atmosphere" of San Diego

Being an Attempt to Convey to the Cold Imagination of the Conservative North a Few Faint Gleams of the Glamor That Pervades the Perennial Summer of the Sun-Kissed South

By Democritus

After long wandering in strange and familiar places I have come to rest at last in San Diego. There are probably better places out of Eden than San Diego; but none, I am sure, where the "atmosphere" is more congenial. It is the atmosphere of San Diego that casts its detaining spell upon me—the atmosphere climatic, artistic, spiritual and physical. I feel in this environment as if I were on the ground floor of a glorious future; and I wonder why this corner of California, literally "cursed with natural advantages," has not until within the past five years lured captains of industry as it has lured poets and artists and impractical persons of vivid and restless imaginations. The only captain of industry who has thus far discovered San Diego is John D. Spreckels. Other captains of industry, like Lyman J. Gage and A. G. Spalding and E. W. Scripps, have taken up their abode in San Diego as I have, for the salubrity of its atmosphere and the serenity of its climate. But Mr. Spreckels is not yet in the retired class of millionaires and San Diego is for him an oyster which he opens with his bank account. He has financed the climate and he has capitalized the atmosphere.

Just now San Diego is in the throes of a vaulting ambition. She is planning a Panama-California exposition for 1915. I know it is heresy to even mention this San Diego aspiration in San Francisco, but it is a heresy that San Francisco must endure and she might as well submit to the affliction now as later. There was a time when San Francisco would have treated a matter of this kind as San Francisco might think it deserved—with a sneer of derision commensurate with the absurdity of it all. There was a time, not so long ago, when San Francisco could sit "serene, indifferent to fate" beside her Golden Gate like patience on a monument smiling at grief. That, however, was before Los Angeles planted a Hesperidean garden in the desert and opened the gates to a hundred thousand tourists who annually contribute $5,000,000 to the permanent inhabitants; it was before Seattle climbed the north porch and stole the golden trade of the Klondike which afterwards became the golden trade of Alaska and the Northwest. San Francisco's term of occupancy in the seat of the scorner has passed and she now regrets that she was not more forehanded with her opportunity to hold her monopoly of trade with the Orient and the Latin republics of the south and the isles of the Pacific. Now she is trying to retrieve her past errors of arrogance and business judgment. She will probably succeed in part; but she will never again enjoy the old time monopoly. She is "serene" no longer, and her "indifference" has fallen from her like a mantle that never fitted. San Francisco profited by her lesson, and it is good for her.

I have heard that the finance committee of the San Francisco Panama-Pacific Exposition threatened to "resign in a body" if John D. Spreckels would not contribute at least $25,000 to the fund of the San Francisco show; and I have also heard that Spreckels "called the bluff" by informing the committee that his most vital interests were in San Diego, that he was one of the vice-presidents of the San Diego exposition, and that any money he might have to spare would, therefore, be used to assist the success of the San Diego enterprise. Mr. Spreckels has invested $100,000 in the San Diego exposition and the finance committee of the San Francisco exposition have not deserted their colors. Another tale that is told in the lemon groves of Chula Vista and La Mesa is to the effect that San Francisco has exerted every effort and resorted to the most subtle diplomacy to seduce Los Angeles from her natural allegiance to San Diego in this exposition matter. The San Diego boosters do not like to think that the big city of the sun-washed South ever wavered in her loyalty to the land of which she is the capital, and there is no direct evidence that she did; but the further gossip of the olive groves and the orange orchards is to the effect that in after dark conferences with the emissaries of the San Francisco exposition the Angelic host proposed as a compromise that both San Francisco and San Diego abandon their hearts' desire and unite upon Los Angeles as the place where the big show shall be held. Now what do you think of that? But isn't it a characteristic sample of Los Angeles assurance? However, I suppose cities are like fatted parvenus—the more prosperous they grow the more arrogant and domineering they become.

I am free to admit (and this is much from one who is steadily saturating himself with the atmosphere of San Diego) that San Diego is guilty of a few venial sins—sins of omission and of commission. Among these may be mentioned her hotel and her harbor projects. She has built a hotel to rival the St. Francis or the Fairmont, and for lack of a paltry $100,000 to furnish it, the millionaires of San Diego are apparently content to let the "no admittance" signs decorate the entrances of the incipiently sumptuous caravanserai. This may be described as a knock in the house of our friends. Then there is the proposition to improve the superb harbor of San Diego so that it may be fit for the traffic of the Panama Canal—that little matter has been placed in cold storage by the Chamber of Commerce until it can be decided whether the improvement shall be made by the municipality or by a private corporation under conditions that will transfer it to the city on payment of the cost. Still, breathing this wonderfully energizing and buoyant atmosphere, I cannot help believing that the hotel will be furnished at any cost and that the harbor will be improved at every hazard. A city that has increased its population from 20,000 to 55,000 in five years and is still growing "by leaps and bounds" will not permit the mossback, the silurian and the descendants of the pilgrims who came in with Cabrillo to hobble the hoofs of the spirited steeds that are trying to drag San Diego's chariot of progress into the dusty arena there to compete with San Francisco for the prizes that will be hung up for the victors when the Panama Canal shall realize the dreams of Balboa gazing upon the vast wonder of the Pacific from that peak in Darien.

I have spoken of San Diego's "atmosphere." It is, indeed, the real thing. There is inspiration in it, and the peace that passeth understanding. It has lured the hearts of all who have breathed it, and the annals of the Green Dragon of La Jolla are an epitome of the enthusiam of such idealists as Modjeska and Irving and Terry and minor poets without number; and today, at Grossmont the glad songs of Schumann-Heink and Carreno are praising it to the accompaniment of an obligato furnished by the building contractor and the landscape gardener; it was here that Beatrice Harridan saw her ships that pass in the night and wrote a famous best seller concerning them; and only the other night Rose Hardwicke Thorpe recited once more her far flung ballad insisting that "Curfew Shall Not Ring Tonight." It is an atmosphere, you will observe, capable of the most diverse effect upon those who inhale it. Here the mocking bird wakes you from slumber with his medley of acquired melodies, greeting the rising sun with more than Memnonic fervor, perched like some sweet-voiced muezzin on the topmost bough of cedar or palm; here the gurgling lullaby of the golden-throated meadow lark woos you to sleep when the moon hangs like a crescent diadem over the Silver Gate and the stars of our sea are clearer and brighter than those that glitter "when the blue wave rolls nightly o'er deep Gallilee." I am no prophet, but my afflatus is all right and I know an "atmosphere" when I breathe it.

The Snare

By Paul Bourget (From the French)

When the great social magnet of Nice had drawn me there, last winter, I found everyone talking of the insolent good luck of a Russian prince who was winning a fortune at baccarat. He had "lifted," as they say, more than half a million francs from the members of the club. So there were gloomy faces about the green cloth, in spite of the clear weather and the carnival.

One man among the unlucky players interested me from the first evening by an ill-concealed joy. He was, and still is, one of the brilliant citizens of that wandering Cosmopolis who follow the "season," with its society, dinners and gambling, from Aix-les-Bains to London, Rome, Monaco, Cairo. He was called Robert Darcy, to the great joy of those who believe in predestination by names. Robert Darcy! Hasn't that a piquant taste of scandal and elegance? He had the features of his class, seemed any age between a dissipated thirty-five and a well-preserved fifty-five and was thin and arrogant as a grand seigneur—or a speculator, polite as a diplomat—or a grafter. His horrible profession was hidden beneath social splendor.

It was strange that such an old habitue of casinos should persist in playing against such luck. They said that he lent money at exorbitant rates, and that he was snob enough to boast before new-comers. I heard him say, "I was playing at the club with Boris today. Lord, how I lost! What, don't know Boris? Cousin of the Grand Duchess Vera." And the titles fairly buzzed. In spite of my quarter of a century on the Bourse and the Boulevard, I had foolishly supposed that his reason was that of most of the idle existences in the Engadine or the Riviera—the vanity of relations with princes. But I learned the real state of affairs almost immediately. Among the people I knew about the baccarat table was Rene X., a fine young chap, the son of one of my old business associates. Unlike others, he was playing banknotes instead of louis. At each succeeding trump card of the banker his face showed an increasing evil humor which became almost violent rage when there remained before him only one more of those precious blue papers. He pushed his chair away from the table and could not restrain an exclamation when the inevitable rake of the dealer seized that last stake. I dreaded the results of his excitement and managed to get in his way as he left the table.

"Sixteen stakes in succession yesterday, and nineteen today! I'm in for thirty thousand francs in two evenings!" he groaned to me, without showing the least astonishment at our meeting or asking for any news about myself or his father.

"You've lost thirty thousand in playing against that luck?"

"Twenty thousand," he said, "but I had to play. Why, there have never been nineteen stakes lost in succession, never! Ten thousand francs yesterday and ten thousand just now. I said thirty thousand, because to get the ten thousand francs which was to assure my revenge I had to sign IOU's for double the amount. Oh, money's dear in Nice!"

"Rather high rate, it strikes me," I answered.

"It was Darcy who lent it," he said, "for it's to that mucker that I had to go." He pointed out to me the elegant gambler with the end of his cigar, but carefully, with a gesture in which there was the strangest mingling of bitterness and respect, of indignation and deference. Even the most wrathful loser sees in the hardest usurer a possible recourse for the new trial. He continued in a low voice, drawing me farther away: "The shark stays here to gut his other victims. He looks like a gambler, but he's merely keeping an eye on his prey. Do you know that he commenced that infamous speculating of his only ten years ago, with a capital of ten thousand francs, and now he is four times a millionaire? His plan is simple. He lends on signature, only to people like myself, who are certain to pay. He exacts a pledge from the others. For example, he lends money to women only on some jewel. He advanced money on a magnificent house on the rue de la Paix. Everyone here knows what to think about him, and everyone pretends to ignore the fact that he is a vile usurer—myself the first of all. Oh, if I ever succeed in curing myself of cards, I promise you that he'll never see any courtesies from me again. Meanwhile, I've got to hurry to Paris and get the wherewithal to have my signature honored. Darcy demands two hundred per cent instead of one hundred, if I don't make a payment on my note."

Three days after this conversation I happened to be in the same hall at the same hour. Darcy was there and still playing. This time the keen look in his brown eyes had its real signification for me. Boyard, the banker, was losing continually, no matter what hand he played. Tomorrow, or in an hour perhaps, he, too, would have recourse to the implacable lender. At the same rate as that child Rene he would borrow, not ten thousand francs or a hundred thousand, but two hundred thousand. I read in Darcy's eyes the certainty that he was near to a big strike, though he continued to play calmly.

My interest in that little drama of customs was so lively that I could not help taking into my confidence my companion of that evening, who happened to be Leon Bordin, the painter. You know that he possesses a gift of caricature which is, if possible, even greater than his talent as a painter of portraits. In calling his attention to the usurer I had some vague idea of avenging Rene and the other victims by inciting Bordin to one of those sketches of his which stigmatize the soul's deformities through those of the features.

"They told me about this Darcy," he exclaimed, "but I couldn't believe it. So it's true? And just see that head, those jaws, those eyes, now when he isn't looking!"

After a moment of silence, in which he remained motionless, as if he were photographing the fellow mentally, he added:

"You say that he likes to lend money on jewels? That makes me want to try on him a trick of which I've read in the curious memoirs of a certain Monsieur d'Estromel, which has always made me regret that I am fairly honest. Here's certainly a chance for it. No, I won't tell you the plan. I want it to be a surprise. Will you promise not to ask me any questions, in the first place, and to help me, in the second? I promise you that in a few days I'll be able to return to Rene X. the interest that this beast has had the infamy to wring out of him. He can pay what he really owes Darcy. But I warn you that the farce will be rather severe."

"Severe? With a brigand like that? Go ahead, and count on me. I'll do as you wish."

"And you won't preach any moral to me after it's over?"

"I promise," said I, laughing.

You may have seen Bordin play an old man, in amateur theatricals. He excels in the part. He has Polish blood in his veins, and his grandmother was no less a person than the Countess Gorka. To that ancestry he owes his talent for imitating and the pleasure it gives him.

At lunch next day I saw him again.

"I've been working hard," he smiled. "This morning I got myself presented to Darcy, on the Promenade des Anglais. Oh, no, I'm not particularly proud of that.

The Adulation of Carnegie

It was a fascinating sight and easily worth the price of admission to see Andrew Carnegie radiating sweetness and light at the Chamber of Commerce banquet last Saturday night. Such a spectacle of self-proclaimed beatitude is not often presented to the eyes of the admiring throng and it was only proper that our foremost citizens should be on hand to gape, stare and be impressed, if not edified. Whenever a man of many millions comes to town the pregnant hinges of servility are bent fawningly before him, the fervor of this adulation being in proportion to the number of his millions and having absolutely nothing to do with the method by which he accumulated them. As Andrew Carnegie has still more millions to his credit—at the bankers, for they are in no otherwise creditable—than he has ever succeeded in giving away, it was fitting that all the ceremonies of the sacred rite of Mammon should be performed in his behalf. And believe me, they were. A roomful of men consumed food and drink in his presence, dodging this way and that between courses to obtain an unobstructed view of his tremendous countenance. Some favored individuals were allowed to speak before him in order that the adulation of the throng might have verbal expression. There was a great deal in those speeches to soothe the soul of Andrew Carnegie and if one might judge feeling by looks, his soul was soothed. The incensed vapor of compliment is very sweet in the Carnegie nostrils; it was easy to see that. And the speakers were prodigal of their fragrant offerings. Of course in all their wordy expeditions they kept clear of the armor with blow-holes sold to our navy; there was no skeleton visible at that feast.

The Gospel According to St. Andrew

Impressive as were the speeches leveled at Carnegie the speech with which he countered overtopped them all and remains as the chief achievement of the evening. 'Twas indeed a choice bit of oratory and none enjoyed it more than Carnegie himself. As he rolled the periods into the protruded ears of his eager listeners his face glowed, his whiskers were electric with happiness, and when each sentence was dutifully punctuated with applause the smile of gratification broadened and deepened until his countenance was all delight. And why not? When have we heard such a speech from such a man before? He came to us in the likeness of an apostle preaching the Christlike gospel of peace on earth and good will to all men. With a wave of the hand and a quaver of the voice he bade the war drum throb no longer and the battle flags be furled, and in a nicely balanced sentence he conjured our dear old friend, the Parliament of man, the Federation of the world. He made it quite plain that the universe, no doubt including Homestead, should have no more strife, no more spilling of blood. Instead of killing, 'tis to be man's joy to uplift, to save, to diffuse happiness even as Carnegie is diffusing it and as for the pursuit of money, why, dear me, 'tis to be henceforth a discredited passion, an ignoble survival from those savage years when Carnegie was piling millions on millions and spilling some little blood of his fellows in the process.

A Very Funny Sight

To see the members of the Chamber of Commerce loudly applauding Carnegie when he declared that wealth was no longer the prime consideration with the millionaires of today was a spectacle to make a holy hermit chortle and kick his heels in the air. To see the solemn demeanor which they preserved when he enumerated some of the high-minded railroad presidents and bankers and life insurance men who care naught for filthy lucre but seek it merely for the uplift of their fellows, was to study an artistic triumph of facial control. I put it that way because I hesitate to say that these ridiculous pretensions voiced by Carnegie were received with hypocritical dissimulation. I do not like to call anybody a hypocrite. I prefer to think that in all that gathering of intelligent men there were few who did not mentally puncture the oratorical bubbles which Carnegie blew from the depth of his self-deception. But the stolid calm of countenance which was maintained while the hero of Homestead was pouring his soothing syrup of words over an irritated conscience had a comic aspect which I shall never forget. I sometimes think that the reason why men like Carnegie and Rockefeller fail to realize the moral enormities of which they have been guilty is that there is ever ready a crowd of toadies to applaud their self-justification and to flatter their vanity by the glorification of their good deeds. But that is neither here nor there. The point is that men who thirst for gold can, under the genial influence of wine and good food and a glib talker, imagine themselves disinterested benefactors of humanity; that merchants who would welcome war as a fillip to business can glow with enthusiasm over the Parliament of man; that financiers who grind the widow and the orphan can grow tender over the fate of the poor; and that Andrew Carnegie can smile like a saint in heaven when he declares that if he went into business again he would want all his dear workingmen to be his partners. It is the dominant weakness of present day life, self-deception. We are all trained to forget the Homestead incidents in our lives and to talk instead of repenting.

As to the Banquet Itself

I did not think much of the banquet given to Carnegie. It was a representative gathering but the affair lacked distinction. Nobody said anything that amounted to anything. Governor Gillett was forceful as usual, but Judge Morrow was very, very prosy. Larry Harris was too much the village cutup, getting laughs with local allusions which the guest could not appreciate. Carnegie's speech read like a Christmas editorial in the Scientific American. The music was poor and whoever was cruel enough to limit Sir Henry Heyman to six or eight pieces took an unfair advantage of that capable musician. Is the Chamber of Commerce waxing economical? By the way, it was interesting to see that wittiest of local Scots, Gavin McNab, sitting with Percy Long, the city attorney, far from the speakers' table. I'll wager that when next Mayor McCarthy takes a fall out of Long, the city attorney will be primed with Gavinisms that will make good reading.

A Conservative Reply

Mr. Horace G. Platt, who is known to be a bachelor beyond regeneration, was called up on the phone the other day and addressed in a sweet, feminine voice.

"Are you the father of Mr. Leopold Platt?" he was asked.

"Not that I am aware of, madam," said Mr. Platt. And the lady didn't stop to say good-bye.

In Memoriam, Captain Barnes

It is always difficult to speak of the beloved dead without seeming to overstep that intangible boundary line at which public utterance must stop short if it would obey the dictate of taste. When a man has been warmly loved by his fellows the very intimacy of the feeling makes expression difficult; it is so easy to profane sacred memories and so hard to tell what may be told without seeming to make a parade of friendship and a spectacle of grief. The late William S. Barnes, among many noble qualities, was distinguished for a simple modesty, an unaffected avoidance of all reference to himself which should be respected by those whose love for him impels them to pay tribute to his memory. This fragrant trait, exceedingly rare in men of the world, raised a barrier between the world and his inner life which very few were privileged to pass. Even those who enjoyed his confidence seldom heard from him any details of his life and as for his achievements, he never spoke of them willingly and manifested great distaste whenever the subject was broached in his presence. It is needless to say that it was not for his achievements that Captain Barnes was loved; it was for the goodness, the kindness, the charity that flowed unceasingly from his big heart. He had known the world familiarly in many of its most unusual aspects, yet he never became cynical. In his profession he was brought closely in contact with the vices, the weaknesses and the meannesses of humanity, yet he preserved to the last a firm faith in his fellowman. Endowed with a natural wit which he had sharpened by experience and directed by wide reading, he was never known to say a word that would hurt the deserving and his impulse was always to help rather than reprove where reproof was justified.

His Gentle Influence

His influence upon those who enjoyed his friendship cannot be overestimated, for he moved and had his being in an atmosphere of peace and gentleness that was diffused around him. Contention, bickering or ill-will died in his presence; he taught by his example the great lesson of tolerance. The passing of years ripened and mellowed him but left no tincture of bitterness; they revealed to him the meaning of life, as it was best for him to understand it. He was a philosopher who could spur youthful ambition, for he had known and satisfied high ambition himself; but experience had taught him that the highest ambition was dross if it led away from truth and friendship and loving kindness. The joy of living was strong in the breast of Captain Barnes; like all true men he loved good and beautiful women, found an artist's delight in fine music, fine pictures and literature and was far from despising a rare wine or a good dinner. These were part of life to him and he had no reason for putting them aside, because he knew how not to abuse them. Yet when death came to him he expressed no regret. Still a young man he turned his back on this world with smiling courage, happy in the memory of many friends and in the knowledge that he would be cherished in their frequent thoughts.

Some Stories About Barnes

If there was one subject which Captain Barnes disliked to hear mentioned, it was the Durrant case. Yet the memory of that famous trial and of the ability which he displayed in prosecuting Durrant were constantly brought up in his presence. One day Barnes was walking along Merchant street with a friend when a stranger accosted him. "I beg your pardon," said the stranger; "are you Captain Barnes who prosecuted Theodore Durrant?" "Yes," answered Barnes with a note of impatience in his voice. "Then I would like to shake hands with you and tell you—." Barnes shook the proferred hand and hurried on before the speech was completed. "Who was that, Billy?" queried Barnes' friend as they made their escape. "I don't know his name," answered Barnes in deep disgust, "but he's the brother of the fellow who slaps me on the back and says, 'Hello, Jack Falstaff!'" It was my privilege once to see Captain Barnes' ruddy countenance suffused by a blush that would have done credit to a bashful schoolboy. It was the night that the Press Club, temporarily domiciled in the old Withrow home in Pine street, was entertaining Lillian Russell. That was one of the gayest entertainments given by the Press Club after the earthquake and fire and much of its success was due to Captain Barnes who was an inimitable sire. Miss Russell was very fond of Captain Barnes and when she was leaving the club about three o'clock in the morning she bade him a cordial good night. The captain, with a courtly bow, carried her hand to his lips and kissed it. Miss Russell looked at the hand and then at the captain and with a quizzical smile asked: "Captain, is that the best you can do?" And Captain Barnes blushed.

A Strange Murder Case

Of all his clubs Captain Barnes loved the Press Club best. He liked to sit in a comfortable chair there of an afternoon and discuss passing events with the newsgatherers. Once I heard him refer to himself humorously as a "hanger-on of newspaperdom" and the phrase is eloquent of his modest personality. Many a cub reporter struggling to make ends meet on "space and detail" received a valuable tip for a good story from the captain, for his acquaintance was large and he was in touch with numerous currents of important news. In the Press Club Captain Barnes occasionally waxed reminiscent and these very rare occasions were thoroughly enjoyed by his hearers. One of his stories made a deep impression on those who heard it. It concerned a miner who came to this city and met in a Mission lodging house a young man to whom he confided his success in the gold fields. The avarice of the youth was aroused to a high pitch when the miner told him that a large diamond he wore in his scarf was worth a fortune in itself. He lured the miner to the beach, killed him and buried the body in the sand. Having forged an order on the landlady for the miner's effects he secured all his belongings and disappeared. The miner was a stranger and was not missed, but some boys playing on the beach, saw a human foot protruding from the sand and uncovered the body. The only clew in the possession of the police was a poor description of the young man who had taken away the miner's property. All the pawnshops were visited and finally one pawnbroker shed a little light on the crime. He told how a young man had come to him with a large diamond which he wished to sell. "Did you buy it?" asked the detectives. "No," answered the pawnbroker; "but I offered to sell him one just as good for fifty cents." A foolish lie about a paste gawd had cost the miner his life and for the crime the young man died on the gallows, Captain Barnes as district attorney prosecuting him.

Barnes as a Versifier

Captain Barnes was not merely an inimitable raconteur; he was also a graceful writer in prose and verse. A warm fancy joined to a gift of language not only made him the ideal sire for a high or low jinks, but also lent distinction to his occasional experiments in metre. Of all his verses "The Ballad of Steam Beer" is best liked by his old friends of the Press Club, probably because it breathes the sentiment of that elusive bohemianism which is known to newspapermen and to few besides. It is well worth reprinting here:

THE BALLAD OF STEAM BEER

You may talk of your Moet and Chandon,
And all the cuvees of Champagne,
Of Burgundy, ruby and royal
From Romanee's storied demesne,
Of Lafitte and of Lachrimae Christi
Or the warm blushing vintage that grows
Where Yquem and the premier cru Grand Vins
Gush forth from the hills of Bordeaux,
Of crusty old Port and Madeira
And all of the sherries of Spain,
All the liqueurs of castle and convent
That ever came over the main;
But I chant out a hymn to Gambrinus,
The God of Small Change and Good Cheer
For I sing you the Song of the Nickel
That buys the big glass of Steam Beer.

A fig for straw-covered chianti
Or brandy a century old,
For foaming and splashing spumante
That sparkles and glitters like gold;
Benedictine and opaline absinthe
That gourmets and viveurs adore
And the life-blood of amorous grape-vines
That cluster along the Cote d'Or.
Not for me burn the molten sun-kisses
Upon the warm vineyards of France,
Not for me weave the chaplets of Bacchus,
Nor call satyrs and nymphs to the dance;
I care not for these classical pleasures,
They are, for my income, too dear;
But still I can compass the nickel
That buys me my Schooner of Beer.

No flagons or wassail cups fill me,
Of vintages priceless and rare,
Away with a stoup or a beaker
And I scorn an effete petit verre;
My chalice is glittering crystal
Full bosomed, deep chested, divine,
With the glorious crown of the hoplands
That mocks at the glory of wine.
Come! drink of the soft flowing amber,
Come! lave in its somnolent streams!
Come! taste of the foam-flecked Nepenthe
That flows from the Kingdom of Dreams!
And sing, as afloat on its tideway
We gently and drowsily steer:
"Here's a health to the Nickel of Commerce
That buys me my Schooner of Beer!"

One of His Impromptus

Captain Barnes was happy in impromptu verses and frequently amused his friends by his graceful conceits dashed off at a minute's notice. One of them I remember. Some years ago when Maude Amber was one of the reigning favorites at Fischer's Theatre she decided that she would free herself from the marital bonds that joined her to Puerl (pronounced Pearl) Wilkerson. The operation involved the naming of one Myrtle Rosedale, a chorus girl at Fischer's, as co-respondent. The case was heard by Judge Murasky and received considerable notice in the press. Captain Barnes was in the courtroom one day while the divorce trial was in progress and after listening to the spicy testimony for a few minutes, scribbled these lines and handed them to a friend who was sitting next to him;

Puerl and Myrtle, Myrtle and Puerl,
The manager brave, the gay chorus girl;
Now the Myrtle is faded,
The Puerl has a flaw,
The Amber is cracked;
So they've all got to law.

Our Parochial Spirit

From my friend Democritus I learn that San Diego is laughing in her sleeve at San Francisco. Our little Southern neighbor is getting a world of glee and advertising out of the shrewd maneuvering by which she has contrived to appear before the world as a rival of the metropolis of the State. But something more than the success of her soaring pretensions has filled San Diego with glee. While she is conscious of the fact that physically she is little more than a village she regards it as quite evident that in spirit San Francisco is still distinctly parochial. This is what appeals to her sense of humor. Speaking frankly the other day, but not to be quoted for publication, one of her citizens observed, "Of course there isn't the slightest likelihood of our getting the Fair, but it does neither us nor you any harm for us to ask for it. If you fail to get it, which is more than likely, it will not be on account of butting in but because of the enemies you are making for yourselves all over the country. We believe the Fair will go to New Orleans not merely on the strength of the united pull of the Gulf States but by reason of the failure of San Francisco to have herself taken seriously anywhere beyond the city limits." Asked to explain, the man from San Diego rattled on: "San Francisco is always making a spectacle of herself. The impression the whole State has of San Francisco is that of a house divided against itself. It seems to be impossible for the factions in the metropolis to assuage their animosities for the advancement of the interests of the whole community. The washing of your soiled linen in public is a continuous performance. Here you are again bringing odium on your municipal government because your officials seem disinclined to kow-tow to a few municipal ownership cranks. Your merchants, who certainly have the interest of the city at heart, your leading financiers and all your men of affairs are petitioning and praying for the removal of the horse cars from Market street, but your demagogic press, hitting below the belt of reason as usual, have been demanding that they be kept there until the railroad company forfeits a right that cannot be taken away from it. The company is acting the same as any private individual would act. No man will open the way to competition so long as he can prevent it. Why should a corporation do so? If I am not mistaken your late unlamented reformers were driven out of office because of their attitude on this horse car squabble, yet the officials now in office are denounced for not following their example. The men and papers that are denouncing them are the same that exhausted the patience of H. E. Huntington and drove him to Los Angeles where he is idolized by the people."

A Few More Breezy Comments

The man from San Diego was full of his subject. He went on to say that the voice of labor appears to be regarded by the San Francisco press as the voice of God. "Not the slightest attention," he said, "is paid to the voice of your mercantile interests. The situation is really laughable. In the Call of last Monday I found running across the top of the whole second page this headline—'Labor Calls to Labor In The Fight For Labor's Rights'—and I found that it meant that the labor council and the building trades council had decided to champion the Hetch-Hetchy water system. Now wouldn't that rasp you? Do you call that metropolitan journalism? Isn't it distinctly parochial—this puerile truckling to labor? It has been said that a people gets the kind of government it deserves. It is equally true that a people gets the kind of newspapers it deserves. Here in San Francisco your newspapers are always swelling the arrogance of labor unions, flattering the mob and ignoring the substantial interests of the community. Your substantial interests—your bankers and merchants—deserve this kind of treatment. It seems to be grateful to them. At any rate they do not resent it. Now coming back to the subject of the Fair. I read an editorial in the Bulletin one night complaining that M. H. De Young was scheming to have the Fair held on land contiguous to his private property. This is another illustration of San Francisco's parochial spirit. Everybody is watching his neighbor, filled with apprehension the while lest somebody should improve his fortune; and ready to set up a howl against anything and everything either on general principles or because of a private grudge. I don't see why you people want a World's Fair; you have a Kilkenny fair here all the year round."

The Men That Do Things

There is another side to the story. Our parochial spirit in its divers manifestations is certainly ludicrous enough to excite the ribald laughter of smaller, and perhaps saner, communities, but there is another spirit in this city, one that asserts itself whenever a sufficiently important occasion arises. This is the spirit of the men who took hold of things after our historic calamity, and who are now handling the Fair project. This is the spirit that will prevail despite the claims of New Orleans and the precocious pretensions of San Diego. These men are now raising the money which is to serve as a guaranty of the earnestness of our intentions. As a result of their energies $3,000,000 has been already subscribed, and the rest is in sight. Forty men have subscribed for $25,000 each and two hundred have subscribed for $10,000 each. The five thousand and one thousand dollar subscriptions have not yet been called for. The only newspaper publisher among the forty big subscribers is Mr. M. H. De Young of the Chronicle. Among the forty also is Mr. Rudolph Spreckels, the last to put his name to the list. Mr. Phelan heard the committee coming and folded his tent and silently stole away to be gone about a year. Nowhere on any list of subscribers or prospective subscribers is to be found the name of any of the representative citizens who have been howling horrendously for municipal ownership or protesting against running the Sutter street electric cars to the ferry on the rails that are maintained under a franchise. Curiously enough the man upon whose shoulders rests the burden of financing the Fair project is the president of one of our execrated public service corporations. His name is William B. Bourn. That he should occupy so prominent a position in this civic affair is said to be galling to Mr. Max Popper, who is in favor of substituting E. P. E. Troy.

"Has she a past?"

"No, but her passion for joyriding is such that she is bound to have one."

Curry's Spirited Campaign

The politicians have begun to sit up and take notice of Charley Curry's whirlwind campaign for Governor. At first the politicians, especially those in touch with the plans and designs, the predispositions and aversions of the men that discover and groom talent for office, believed that Curry's vaulting ambition was essaying a hurdle far beyond his capacity. They conceded his popularity; they owned that as Secretary of State he had conducted himself most shrewdly and successfully with a view to the acquisition of a powerful personal following; they affirmed that as a candidate for the office he now holds he could not be beaten, but—well there is a vast difference between Secretary of State and Governor of the State, and without either the support of the machine or the support of anti-machine Republicans Curry was bound to go down to defeat. That's the way the wise politicians were talking two months ago. Now they have another viewpoint. They are amazed at the enthusiasm Curry has aroused. They know that he has not yet succeeded in making any machine or other combination, yet it is evident to them that he is amassing blocks of votes in all parts of the State. They have begun to realize that Curry has a peculiar individuality which captivates that fragment of the sovereign people by which questions of State are settled at the crossroads and under the awnings of country stores.

A Candidate's Individuality

Curry has an air about him that impresses favorably the bucolic voter. Yet the city dweller, who is quick at interpreting types, might take the tall, gaunt Secretary of State for a bad man from Kansas. His slouch hat is eloquent of a rakish disposition, his address is that of a connoisseur of the arts of the quick-firing backwoodsman. The average amateur of physiognomy would size him up as a man ready for any kind of game from pitch-and-toss to manslaughter. But Curry improves on acquaintance. As a matter of fact he is as mild a mannered man as ever laughed at one of his own stories, and his forte is that of the raconteur. The farmers love him not only for his amiability and his unremitting attention to them in public office, but also for the yarns that he spins. They know that the emotions which are to be read in his clothes are not those beneath the surface, for the Secretary of State is reputed to be a good Christian. He is one of the pillars of a church in Sacramento. So, though the long-haired element in politics may not approve him he is certainly persona grata to the religious element. And at present there is no element that he is neglecting.

The Barrel

What amazes the politicians more than anything else with reference to the Curry campaign is the volume of money that is already being spent in his behalf. His emissaries are in every nook and corner of the State getting signatures to his petitions, and they do not stop after the requisite number is obtained. Apparently Curry's plan is to get the endorsement of as many people as possible and thus make a showing that will impress the machine politicians and make it seem expedient to them to get behind his bandwagon. Where the money is coming from with which this Curry campaign is being financed is a matter of animated speculation. It is evident from the copious flow of coin that a large barrel has been broached. Rumor has it that this barrel was formerly filled with cement and imported by the Spreckels brothers—John D. and Adolph—who were on friendly terms with Curry when he was engaged in politics in this city.

He—Money doesn't buy happiness, dear.
She—No, but it buys an Easter hat.

Exit the League of Justice

It is my unpleasant duty to announce that the League of Justice is in process of dissolution. This is an unpleasant duty because the League of Justice has been a source of perennial delight to my laughter-loving soul and I hate to see it perish. But, to be accurate, perish is not precisely the word; metamorphosis is an exacter term. The League of Justice is to be metamorphosed into—what do you think?—a lunch club. By the mustachios of Professor Boke, 'tis the truth. The mighty weapon which was wont to coerce public opinion is to degenerate into a bit of cutlery and aid in the mastication of chops and fried potatoes. No more startling revolution could be imagined than this. What more humiliating descent than from the pinnacles of self-confessed righteousness to the base uses of appetite could be predicated of the league by its bitterest enemy? Certainly none. Yet is the League of Justice to disappear at the magic incantation of Professor Boke and in its stead, presto! behold a lunch club. What the name of the lunch club will be I do not know, for I am not in the confidence of Professor Boke and have no desire to be. But this I have been told by those having authority to speak, that the new association of reformers will be modeled on the lines of the City Club of Los Angeles. Fortnightly or monthly the pale prophets of reform with Professor Boke at their head will sit them down to consomme and hamburger steak in some restaurant and will remedy the abuses of our beloved community with windy discussion. 'Twill be a fine sight to see the jaws of reform masticating luncheon and reforming the town at one and the same time. I almost wish that I might be invited to this Boke feeding club, but I realize that I am not worthy.

Prefessor Boke as a Financier

When Professor Gayley in elephantine English declared that Professor Boke, by interfering in local politics, had bowed before the Idol of Parade, he missed the point of the professor's activities. The guardian angel of the League of Justice is not so much a politician as a financier. Professor Boke, be it known, is an adept, a bird in the fine art of feathering his own nest. For him reform has been a paying dispensation, an ideal combination of regeneration and remuneration. Professor Boke has not read his Shakespeare in vain. Unless I am misinformed he has taken Iago's tip; he has put money in his purse. It is an interesting bit of information, this mercenary fact about the League of Justice. Justice, of course, could not be safeguarded in the house of her friends without money. When the League was founded certain enthusiasts in the cause subscribed the wherewithal and one of the first things which Professor Boke did was to sequestrate $500 for his salary. Now some of the knockers in his own camp are saying that the professor had an excellent appreciation of the value of his own services. They declare that his services were all out of proportion to those rendered by other workers of the League. The treasurer, one W. H. Payson of Berkeley, got only $50 a month; a stenographer received the usual pay for stenographers; and a newspaperman of indifferent attainments was paid indifferently for writing The Liberator, the organ of the League. It will be observed that money was economically disbursed by the professor and there was reason for that. In all the days of the League of Justice the professor handled a fund of $18,000 and it is said that he took care to look out for his own honorarium. Arithmeticians have figured out that Boke corralled just half of this fund for his salary in the eighteen months of prosperity.

Where the Money Came From

It would be interesting to know the names of those who contributed to this fund of $18,000. Part of it I have heard accounted for in a fashion which nearly took my breath away, yet I have the utmost confidence in the reliability of those who have told me about it. It seems that when the League was started Professor Boke was a member of the executive committee of Isidor Jacobs' Good Government League. Recognizing the superior possibilities—regenerative and remunerative—of the new league Boke promptly folded it under his protecting wing. That was in the spring of 1908 and the Goo Goos were engaged in gathering subscription to a campaign fund. Professor Boke was in a position to learn the names of the subscribers to the Good Government League fund and with the swift action of a born financier he sent out his collectors and induced them to subscribe for the League of Justice. That is why the League of Justice started so auspiciously; also why the Goo Goos were crippled in their intended activities by the lack of their customary campaign fund. If Professor Gayley had known of this affair I am quite positive that he would not have set Boke up as an idol of parade. The Boke brain works for more substantial results than mere ostentation. Professor Boke believes that a reformer is worthy of his hire. Now that the League has fallen into innocuous desuetude and The Liberator has dwindled to an insignificant dodger, it will be interesting to see how much Professor Boke will make out of the new lunch club he is about to launch.

Mrs. Mighels Discusses Her Story

Mrs. Philip Verrill Mighels has addressed to this office a very interesting letter in which she expresses her appreciation for the review of her novel, "The Full Glory of Diantha," published in this journal last week, and discusses the motive of the story and the source of some of its characters. "I knew those girls in New York city who kept house together," writes Mrs. Mighels, "and used to tremble for them when they expressed those wild theories of theirs. I told them that my Pioneer Mother used to maintain that the best children came from mothers who were allowed to be free by their husbands rather than from men of renown or of greatness; and that I had lived to see that she had had the right idea on this most important subject. The most successful of these girls asked me to write a book of a girl like herself and how she picked out the man she wanted and married him, not to be supported, not to be kept from starving to death, but just because she wanted to do as her mother had done before her—to have a brood of children about her knees, only she wanted them to be the finest and the best that could be had. I took her dare and it took six years to produce the book according to the ideas which my Pioneer Mother gave me."

Her Estimate of the Sexes

Mrs. Mighels says further that a brilliant man or woman, reading her book, realizes that she is laughing in her sleeve at men and women generally. The real theme of her book, she says, is: "All men are alike, only some are better actors. Woman is spirit but man is earth. And God has joined them together." She declares that "there is nothing in heaven above or in earth below so stupid as an innocent girl, no matter how much she may play at being sophisticated." Of such was Mrs. Mighels' daughter, she writes, and she was used in drawing the "Vivian" of the story. "Caspar," she says, "stands for the dominating man—that is the kind I myself prefer and adore. In our extreme youth we want to be dominated. But later on the excitement wears off and we long for peace." Mrs. Mighels concludes by saying that in all her work she is guided by the cry: "Let us save the innocent."

An English Translation of Ade

George Ade, I have discovered, is something more than a humorist; he is an educator. Through the medium of his farce, "The College Widow," he has been educating the benighted people of England, making known to them something of the growth of their language and of the color that has been imparted to it on this side of the Atlantic. In England there are many people that are pleased to regard their language as dead and, therefore, as a classic language, and whenever a new idiom crosses the ocean it is regarded as a species of irreverence. English as it is spoken in America is to them a foreign tongue. In proof whereof I submit the following, which, according to a friend who sent me a printed copy, was given to everybody that attended the performance of "The College Widow" at one of the London theatres:

GLOSSARY OF UNFAMILIAR TERMS AND PHRASES
in
"THE COLLEGE WIDOW."

ACT I.

"Put up a Holler" - - - Indignantly protested
"Pinkest Collection of Farm Hands" Dullest lot of creatures
"A Couple of Husky Ones" - Couple of enormous men
"Prexy" - - - Nickname for College President
"A Corker" - - - - - - A champion
"Burning a Student's Lamp" - - Smoking a cigarette
"The Campus" - - - The College Lawn
"Kappa Delt" - - - - College Secret Societies
"Sigma Theta"
"The Way She Strings Them" The way she leads them on
"The Rush Line" - - The forwards in football
"A Jerk-Water Railroad" - - A little branch line
"The Rockfeller Stunt" - - Endowing Colleges
"A Squab" - - - - - - A Booby
"Cutting up Didoes" - - Playing pranks
"Old Side Partner" - - Old croney or "pal"

ACT II.

"Angel Food" - - - - - A kind of cake
"Foundered" - - - - - - Overfed
"Bucking the Line" - Football slang, meaning breaking through the line

ACT III.

"Quitters" - Men who give up in a fight. Cowards
"Rattled" - - - - - Confused
"A Dead-head Telegram" One that is sent free. Franked
"To Rub Dope on" - - To rub liniment on

ACT IV.

"A Web-footed Rube An uncouth countryman
"A Jim-crow School" - An inferior school
"The Tall Grass" - - The country. The far West
"Pin-head" - - - A man of inferior capacity
"Easy Money" - Money found or obtained easily
"A Gasolene Runabout" - - A motor-car
"A Tintype" - - A photograph taken on tin
"Sicked the Widow on Him" Urged the Widow to flirt with and fascinate him

As funny as Mr. Ade is he is certainly not a bit more amusing than the unconscious humorist by whom he has been translated into the language of Chaucer, Shakespeare et al.

The Merry Widow at the Beach

The principals of the "Merry Widow" company paid a visit to the joyous resorts whose lights twinkle along the beach on last Saturday night and the wee sma' hours were wee and sma' indeed before they reluctantly climbed into their machines and sped townward. The players found the hospitality of Dibble's particularly attractive and lingered there for a couple of hours. Sweet voices were lifted in song while the corks popped their siren chorus and the merriment reached its climax when Miss Wilber, the Merry Widow herself, danced the waltz which has made the Lehar opera famous. That the players, men and women, enjoyed themselves thoroughly there can be no doubt. They proved themselves good fellows in the best sense of that much abused term and the late sojourners in the ocean taverns counted themselves fortunate in being the spectators of their revelry.

Bryan Helped Charles D. Lane

The announcement that Charles D. Lane, once the most active of mining promoters but now aged and blind, has once more rehabilitated his wrecked fortune, reminds me that William Jennings Bryan came to his assistance just before Lane went broke for the last time. Lane was an ardent silver man and put $100,000 into the first Bryan campaign. Whatever Bryan is he is not ungrateful to his friends and he promised Lane that he would await the opportunity to repay this big favor. The time came. Lane's Alaska mining claims were purchased from the aliens who were sent to Alaska with the government reindeer and who discovered some of the richest spots in the gold district. There was a cloud on Lane's title and legislation was threatened at Washington which would deprive him of his holdings. Bryan was in this city at the time Lane's fortune hung in the balance and he came to the promoter's assistance. Every influence which he could command in Congress and in Washington political circles was exerted to prevent the adverse legislation. But it was no use. Bryan was not strong enough and Lane's fortune slipped through his fingers.

If Wheeler Had Been There

I heard a shrewd appraiser of men and things declare the other day that if Benjamin Ide Wheeler had only been in California during Carnegie's visit to the University of California, that institution would today be richer by at least a quarter of a million dollars. The statement is a very plausible one. The prime function of a university president, as we all know, is to coax the shekels from the vaults of millionaires. A university president who could not separate a philanthropic Croesus from a few hundred thousands would not hold his job very long, no matter how great his scholarship. The interesting little prexy of the university across the bay has had considerable success in these financial operations upon the plethoric purses of the rich. His method of extraction is painless; warranted, in fact, to give the patient pleasure. So perhaps it was a misfortune that he was hobnobbing with kings and queens when Andrew Carnegie visited Berkeley. And yet I am not so sure. I remember that Prex Wheeler failed to extract a nickel from Harriman although he acted as his valet one memorable summer in Bohemian Grove.

Platt and Harrison

Thomas Collier Platt, Republican leader of New York for a score of years, whose death occurred last week, was probably the shrewdest practical politician this country has produced. His start in politics was made as the organizer of a glee club for the Fremont campaign. He used to sing with the club between speeches at rallies of his party. He began to be prominent in the politics of New York in the 60's. He soon became the friend and ally of Roscoe Conkling. When Hayes was elected President Conkling urged that Platt be made Postmaster-General. But Hayes listened to Blaine and Garfield who suggested that it was time to turn down Conkling and Platt in the Empire State, and Hayes carried out their wishes. It was by Conkling and Platt that Hayes was beaten for renomination. Since Platt's death there has come to light a letter in which he relates that President Harrison entered into an ante-election compact with him by which he was to be made Secretary of the Treasury. This is denied by Senator Elkins who is said to have acted as the "go-between." Though the story may not be true it is certain that Platt was a candidate for the Cabinet position and that Harrison sought to take a middle course by making Platt's boyhood friend, Benjamin F. Tracy, Secretary of the Navy. About that time an amusing story was in circulation to the effect that during a conference with President Harrison Platt asked the question, "Who do you think made you President?" With characteristic solemnity of manner Harrison replied, "God made me President, sir." Filled with disgust Platt walked out of the White House and on the steps he met Bob Ingersoll to whom he related what had just occurred.

"Well," said Ingersoll, "God has been held accountable for a good many things, but this is the toughest yet."

Mr. Hawkins' personal business has grown to such an extent that he has found it incumbent upon him to retire from the services of The White Company, with whom he has been continuously associated for the past twenty-one years. His resignation was placed before the home office some time ago but was only accepted after repeated requests that he continue in the service and that the resignation be withdrawn.

While not actively associated with the company, Mr. Hawkins continues an enthusiastic supporter of the White policies and a firm believer in the superiority of their output. He has purchased two White cars, one a Steam and the other the new Gasoline machine for his own use.

Mr. Hawkins is succeeded by H. E. Doty, who has been associated with him for some time in the middle west territory, and more recently as assistant manager on the coast. Mr. Doty, although he came but recently from Chicago has already made his presence felt in western automobile affairs. He is a type of that aggressive automobile business man, who has come as a result of the marvelous growth in motor affairs during the last few years.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There has been little or no change of record in the financial or Wall street situation in the recent week. The security market has been quite devoid of interest, in that the variation of prices has been highly irregular and without definite trend. The continuance of the Philadelphia strike, and a tendency at the close this week to spread to other industrial lines, has been a somewhat unfortunate factor in the matter of news and events affecting the financial district here. We believe firmly that capital and labor will meet amicably ere long, and that satisfactory conditions will eventually prevail, and that securities will receive a great bull impetus during the late spring months in anticipation of not only bountiful crops, but the adjournment of Congress and the Supreme Court of the United States, which have contributed much to the recent great uncertainty of events.

Wheat—Legitimate and speculative conditions in the wheat trade appear to be somewhat evenly adjusted. At the moment, to be sure, there is a slow call for cash wheat, and there has been a liberal run of marketings from the interior, but both these conditions appear to be on the eve of a change. Against this expected change lies the fact that the crop damage claims are getting a little threadbare, despite the talent, and persistency displayed in exploiting them. The trade is also facing the fact that the new crop level is adjusted on an entirely domestic basis, leaving this country entirely out of the export situation for another year. The official report Tuesday, of farm reserves on March 1 shows that either there has been about 20,000,000 bushels more wheat used by consumers than ordinarily, or that this extra quantity is in wheat or flour, held by mills or in transit. Either view is plausible and in line with common trade reports. To offset the 20,000,000 bushels less wheat on the farms March 1 than expected, the government official reports also show that at the same time this country had exported over 27,000,000 bushels less wheat and flour, as wheat, or the equivalent of 69,186,000 bushels, as compared with 96,483,000 bushels for the corresponding eight months of the preceding crop year. Primary market receipts meanwhile were 16,000,000 bushels larger than for the first eight months of 1908-09 crop year, thus pretty accurately checking off the 20,000,000 to 27,000,000 bushels unaccounted for. The crop actually harvested last year proved a little larger than the previous December's promise, or 446,366,000 bushels, and the finally revised acreage, as per the official report of December 15 last, was 28,330,000 acres.

Corn—Corn has been working into a better position in the last week. The source of initial supply, the producer, has quit marketing corn in any volume since the recent demoralization in cash prices began. This has enabled railroads, drying establishments, distributors and consumers to make some impression on the stocks which are now so ample and well distributed.

Cotton—The week just passed was one in which the influence of the moment largely dominated the markets, and ultimate consequences were left to take care of themselves. Finally, the rally to the 15 cent mark again, in the May option, followed the clever action of the old bulls in taking up cotton tendered on March, and shipping it abroad. The situation at the end of the season will be so tense, and the world will be so nervous, as to the next crop that we advise great caution in taking any determined stand. There is a growing confidence that the market is in for fire-works some time before May 31, and that prices in these near months will be very much higher. In passing, it may be stated that there are a few of the old guard who believe that the shortage in supply will yet bring 17 cents in the scramble which the spinners must enter into to get enough to keep them partly employed during the remainder of the season. Then again, many well informed people who were at one time very bullish, have now reached the conclusion that the time has passed when very much higher prices can be obtained, and that if a substantial advance comes, it must result from injury to the next crop, and we repeat, this new crop is the dominating influence, and each phase—the increased acreage, the growing use of the fertilizer, the absence or prevalence of the boll weevil, as well as the weather reports—must be watched and well considered. It is, therefore, advisable for the present, to avail one's self of the numerous opportunities to scalp the market on short turns.

Copper—The market for copper has been more active this week and the spot prices firmer. The surplus of the metal in this country is now only what the mines must have on hand under normal conditions and a gradual reduction of surplus abroad is looked for. It is now the opinion of big interests that the consumption abroad is increasing and that the world is consuming more copper than it is producing. This is not equivalent to saying that the world is consuming more than it can produce. The curtailment is just beginning to have its influence and will be reflected in the statement made by the producers' association figures during the next two or three months. The reduced output of the Butte mines or those of Nevada and Arizona has not been felt yet. This reduction, however, will be shown in the next two or three statements and if this policy of curtailment is continued it will not be long before the surplus abroad is brought to a normal figure. Since the time preceding the panic of 1907 the copper market has not been in a more firmly intrenched position than at present. The approach of spring is very favorable for the copper industry as the outdoor building operations always bring a larger demand. It is the general opinion among those who are posted that copper will advance. As we have heretofore contended, we believe that copper metal will go to 15 cents in April and will be maintained there by the curtailment policy. While it is too much to expect the copper stock market to go forward from now on without recessions, still we expect to see a steady hardening of prices; and in the good standard issues a gradual advance to higher levels, particularly of the Lake Copper Company and such stocks as the Butte Coalition, Local Securities—The local market for stocks and bonds continues rather quiet, although the general list shows a remarkable steadiness in values. The chief stock trading is confined to Spring Valley, Associated Oil, Hawaiian Sugars and Alaska Packers. The former issue seems to be temporarily pegged at around $50, but when buying of any size is in force, it is noticeably for inside accounts. Associated Oil experiences a little flurry every now and then but from week to week does not show any great change. On a sharp advance in the New York raw sugar market, Hawaiian stocks all made forward strides last week but have since softened to some extent. At that, there are still strong spots on the sugar list, which include Hawaiian Commercial, Honokaa and Union, the latter selling at $70, its high record price. After a rather long period of inactivity which was attended by more or less of a decline, Alaska Packers has lately become popular and is fastly recovering its losses.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Action No. 20,654.

GEO. W. YOST, Plaintiff, vs.
All Persons Claiming Any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or Any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of GEO. W. YOST, plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this Summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the easterly line of Bright Street, distant thereon one hundred and twenty-five (125) feet northerly from the northerly line of Garfield Street (formerly known as Sherman Street); thence running northerly along said line of Bright Street fifty (50) feet; thence at a right angle easterly, parallel with Garfield Street (formerly known as Sherman Street), one hundred (100) feet; thence at a right angle southerly, and parallel with Bright Street, fifty (50) feet, and thence at a right angle westerly, and parallel with Garfield Street (formerly known as Sherman Street) one hundred (100) feet to the point of beginning, said lot or parcel of land being known and designated as Lots numbers ten and eleven (10 and 11) in Block fifty-seven (57) upon a certain map entitled "Map of property of City Land Association," filed in the office of the County Recorder of the City and County of San Francisco.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that his title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consists of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover his costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 17th day of March, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this Summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 19th day of March, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff—None.

Polo Hero-Worship at Blingum

Polo at Burlingame has developed a new variety of the matinee hero species. Naturally there are no scented mash notes for the handsome members of the Meadowbrook team but they have been politely rushed, and adored by the debutantes. Peninsula hostesses compete for the honor of dining them. Polo undoubtedly gives rare possibilities for hero-worship. There is something in the danger of the game that stimulates feminine interest, much as foot-ball did in other days. Now, however, foot-ball worship is old-fashioned and the adoration of the matinee idol really died out in select circles with the passing of the youth of John Drew; so the polo hero reigns alone. One thing that may account for the popularity of the Meadowbrook men is the dearth of romantic material on the Burlingame team. Most of the members are married. Frank Carolan, Tom Driscoll, Walter Hobart, and Peter Martin, all are benedicks, which practically leaves John Lawson, the "Bachelor of Burlingame," to monopolize attention. The English players are a charming set of men who have been entertained to the limit, but as "heroes" the Meadowbrook men have clearly won out. At the Burlingame Club an interesting story of one of the Meadowbrook's English experiences last year, was recently told. In the game against Kingsbury, J. M. Waterbury of the American team was given a mount whose merits were carefully pointed out to him by Harry Rich of the English team. At the end of the game Waterbury purchased the pony for $2500. Subsequently it transpired that Mr. Rich was a horse-dealer and that the pony had been sent to him by an English army officer with the expressed hope that he might sell it to one of the Americans. Since that incident occurred it has been proved that polo in England is largely in the hands of so-called "gentlemen" horse-dealers who are more or less unscrupulous in their methods of mixing business and sport. Raneleigh, the club to which the English players now at Burlingame belong, is said to be the only club in England that is free from this form of grafting. There is small danger as yet of a polo scandal in America. The game is not popularized in this country where the only men with leisure to play belong to the millionaire class which would scorn to graft in polo.

Why Miss Sears Scores

Co-equal in importance with the polo game last Sunday was Eleanor Sears, the Boston heiress, who was watched by the big crowd as if she and not the splendid English sportsmen, were the main thing, and the lesser belles came almost to open mutiny, so mortified and wounded were they at the frank homage paid to the independent young woman who applauded with all the frenzied glee of a kid at a Sunday baseball game. Most of the town girls were there, and not a few of them were attired as if for some gala garden fete, but Miss Sears, who more than any of them knows the value and the worthlessness of vanity's glad rags, for she can have the pick of the finest the world has, came to the polo field dressed the simplest of all, wearing a dullish cheviot tailor frock, made with a short skirt, showing natty, low-heeled walking boots, and her hat was a small, boyish affair of soft felt that looked as if it could withstand wind and rain. But for all this severe simplicity, she looked smart. Absolutely unconscious of self, completely absorbed in the game, following every move of the riders with the trained scrutiny of the expert—she plays polo herself—Miss Sears by her attitude showed her disdain of the frivols and fuss that belittle the horizon of the average girl in her position. Clothes and doo-dads do not own this independent young woman from Boston, which is probably one reason why she has such a rollicking good time everywhere.

There were handsome coaches, limousines, phaetons, drags, and traps of every conceivable description. The Charles W. Clarks drove over in a coach and four, and with them were Mrs. Raoul Du Val, Mrs. Thomas Driscoll, Mrs. Joseph S. Tobin and Miss Sears. The Burlingame crowd, which still feels a bit sore over the unfriendliness shown when the San Mateo Club folks posted up a card "for members only," effectively debarring the other set from partaking of its muffins and tea after the practice games, showed their resentment by lining up on the opposite side of the field, directly across from the little club-house. The Blingumites kept disdainfully aloof from the San Mateo Club house, notwithstanding their own had just burned down a few hours before. The San Mateo Club is a small, unpretentious building, and looked smaller than ever with the big crowd surrounding it and almost dwarfing it, but small as it was, it was at no time crowded. Enid Gregg was there, with the ever-faithful Charley de Young in attendance. She looks prettier than ever, the result of her visit to New York being shown in the handsome new frocks she is wearing these afternoons. Her friends declare that an important announcement is to be made soon, but Miss Enid merely smiles roguishly and flits on blithely.

They Were Tailored in London

Whether it was in delicate flattery to the Britishers or merely a coincidence, one could not say, but certainly a majority of the new frocks bore the impress of the handiwork of the British tailor. Black and white checks, looking London all over them, were worn by nearly every other woman at the game. Mrs. Andrew Welch, Mrs. Thomas Driscoll, Mrs. Joseph O. Tobin, Mrs. Walter Martin and several others wore gowns just now the rage in London. Mrs. Baldwin Wood, blonde and pink like an English lassie, wore a natty norfolk in typical English plaid check which was one of the smartest little dresses seen at the field.

Ever since Miss Eliza McMullin received the present of a handsome traveling bag full of silver articles engraved with her monogram, her friends have been expecting the announcement of her engagement to Mr. John Gallois, the gallant youth who thus remembered her in his foreign wanderings.

Miss Sears and Captain Gill

When Captain Gill, the dashing British polo player, was in Burlingame last year he fell a victim to the charms of Miss Eleanor Sears who was then the guest of the Hobarts. It may be a mere coincidence that with Captain Gill's return for another whirl at the cup Miss Sears has once more put in an appearance, this time as the guest of the Carolans. Those who have watched the demeanor of the handsome captain are of the opinion that the presence of Miss Sears has filled his mind with thoughts of another game than polo. That his devotion is reciprocated there is no external evidence, for the athletic Miss Sears accords him no particular attention, being much more engrossed with her horses and her cross-country walks at daybreak. There has been a rumor that Miss Sears is going to marry Harold Vanderbilt, so Captain Gill is measuring his strength against a formidable suitor.

Miss Crocker's Mexican Party

When Miss Jennie Crocker took a party to old Mexico she was very anxious that Miss Sears should go along, as she is very fond of the clever Boston girl, but there was no attraction in the land of manana sufficient to tear Miss Sears away from polo. Out of that Mexican trip, by the way, may come a brace of romances. I say "may," with the accent decidedly on the conditional verb. Harry Simpkins made one of the party and there have been signs of a feeling warmer than mere friendship between him and Miss Crocker. Then again Miss Helene Irwin and Templeton Crocker have been linked together in the gossip of the bavardes and there is much speculation as to the result of propinquity in the sleepy sentimental atmosphere of pueblo land. All this gossip, however, is rather futile. Miss Crocker and Miss Irwin are two young ladies who have mastered the fine art of concealing their feelings from the inspection of the vulgar and in all probability nobody will know that they have turned their thoughts toward hymeneal bliss until they see fit to make formal announcements.

Tale of a Wife and a Widow

Trust a clever woman to take care of her affairs without resorting to the fuss of calling in outside help. I advise the following modus operandi for troubled young wives with recalcitrant husbands. As the story was told me in the most confidential secrecy, it is impossible to give the names, but they are well known not only here but all over the State. The lady in the case had been away visiting, and during her absence her one-time intimate friend, a wealthy young widow, took so much compassion on the lonesome husband of her absent friend that she had him dining with her nightly, following this with drives, theatre parties, little suppers, always tete-a-tete, and when the absent wife returned from her visits, the widow, a tall, somewhat florid woman of the picturesque type, kept up the attentions or the husband kept them up, just as you please. As the wife was herself a busy society woman, constantly entertaining or being entertained, her friends remarked on these little tete-a-tetes between the husband and the widow, for they were dining at the Palace, teaing at the St. Francis and otherwise finding each other's society so pleasant that they made no pretense of veiling this Platonic attraction. Finally, the wife again left town, for reflection and contemplation, so she told her friends.

A Warning Letter

The sojourn at a southern resort was just the thing, for with second thought came a relieving sense of humor. What was the use of crying her eyes out, making herself old and ugly, while the widow was being so lavishly entertained. Snatching up a pen, she wrote something like this to the widow: "If you are not through entertaining my husband or vice versa, please hasten to do so at once, as I am about to return home and shall need the attentions of my husband myself. I too, enjoy dining at the Palace with him, and the next time you fancy you need the solace of his companionship, you might at least ask my permission. I assure you I shall not be niggard about it, but I would prefer to know about these little tete-a-tetes, since everyone else in town seems to. I will be home on Monday, and trust you will not invite him to your home for that evening." The letter proved a perfect cure. The widow was furious, taking the letter to the man in the case and upbraiding him so thoroughly that, in her fury at his amusement, she threatened to take the letter to her lawyer. In the meantime the wife is enjoying a second honeymoon and what at first threatened ugly complications is smoothed out beautifully.

Miss Minnie Houghton was hostess at an elaborate "bachelor maid" dinner recently. Among her guests were Miss Laura McKinstry, Miss Ella Morgan, Miss Mary Josselyn, Miss Linda Cadwalader and Miss Emily Carolan.

The American Lady Cunard

Few American women have passed Lady Bache Cunard on the social ladder in England. Lady Cunard who just missed being Princess Poniatowski is well remembered as Miss Maud Burke in this city. Her last visit to California was during the Poniatowski courtship which was conducted on approved continental methods and ended in a difference over the dowry with Colonel Carpenter, who was Miss Burke's guardian. Shortly after the engagement was broken, the heiress returned to Europe and her marriage followed. Sir Bache Cunard's title is a new one and his rank is several degrees below that of the Polish prince, but his fortune is imposing. Lady Cunard recently entertained a house party of celebrities at her Leicestershire estate "Nevill-Holt." Among them were George Moore, the novelist, Arthur J. Balfour, the Duke and Duchess of Pontaud with their daughter Lady Violet Manners, and the Marquis of Granby, son of the Duke of Rutland who is at present the greatest catch in London society.

Riding, the Lenten Diversion

Riding is the popular diversion of Lent this year, due probably to the present polo craze. Nearly every morning a group of well-known girls may be seen cantering through the park. Two of the cleverest equestriennes in society are Miss Edith Cheeseborough and Miss Margaret Coffin who frequently go out together. They ride astride and both wear the trim mannish costumes with breeches and high boots which, so I am told, Mrs. Vesta Bruguiere introduced in California. There was a sensation on the piazza at Del Monte one morning when she made her first appearance attired like a jockey. The Newhall girls really set the fashion here two years ago and Miss Eleanor Sears later succeeded in convincing the most prejudiced at Burlingame of its advantages. In spite of these, however, a number of women still cling to the hampering skirts of the side saddle fashion. Miss Agnes Tillman rides in the old fashioned way. Miss Frances Newhall and Miss Florence Cluff also succeed in taking hurdles on side saddles.

Mrs. George T. Marye and her little daughter Miss Helen will spend the summer in California.

Mrs. Atherton to Return in April

Mrs. Atherton informs me by letter from New York that the story of her forthcoming European tour with a party including the Spencer Eddys is erroneous as she has no intention of going to Europe till the autumn and has not the pleasure of knowing the Eddys. She says that she intended to return to this city during this month but that she will delay in the metropolis long enough to enjoy the Whistler exhibition at the Metropolitan Museum, Parsifal and the opening of Mrs. Fiske, after which she will come back to San Francisco for work. New York Mrs. Atherton does not regard as an appropriate place for literary endeavor; during her stay she has only written three articles, devoting most of her time to the opera, the theatre, concerts and study of the suffrage movement. "People spoil New York," says Mrs. Atherton. Her preference for San Francisco as a place for work is very complimentary and her friends here will be glad to learn of her speedy return. Mrs. Atherton's latest book, "Tower of Ivory," is already in its second edition and is quite the rage of New York. It is natural that Mrs. Atherton should be much feted by those who rejoice in her latest success and a great many entertainments have been given in her honor. Miss Elizabeth Jordan gave a dinner in her honor at Delmonico's, among the guests being William Dean Howells, Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensselaer, David Graham Phillips, Hjalmar Hjorth Boyesen, Mr. and Mrs. Cass Gilbert and Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Alden.

A Coward at the Princess

Commend me to an earthquake for bringing out the real man that ordinarily lies hidden beneath a veneer of gentility. When the temblor comes nature asserts herself and if the natural instincts are mean and despicable, it is impossible to conceal them as on normal occasions. I was thrown into this strain of moralizing by a little incident which happened at the Princess Theatre on the night of the recent little temblor. There was a great deal of excitement in the audience when the building was shaken. Many women rushed for the exits, some were on the verge of hysterics. This of course happened in all the theatres and was not limited to the Princess. But there was one incident at the Princess which, I am glad to say, was not duplicated in any other theatre. In one of the boxes sat a young man of prepossessing countenance, well groomed, to all appearances a gentleman. When the earthquake started this young man jumped up, pushed aside the women who sat in the box, vaulted over the rail and raced pell-mell for the door. One of the women who obstructed his way to the rail of the box was "straight-armed" so vigorously by this courageous individual that she was thrown from her chair to the floor. I have been wondering how this gallant person will ever have the nerve to face the members of that box party again but I suppose that such a being is callous to self-reproach.

St. Patrick's Day Luncheon at the Cliff House

In accordance with a custom which has been observed faithfully for many years the surviving members of a party of sixty-five pioneers who crossed the plains to California in 1848 met on St. Patrick's Day. Of this historic party only P. Evarts and Steven Gage remain and these gentlemen, with their wives and a few close relatives, celebrated the annual reunion this year with a luncheon at the Cliff House. Of all the affairs by which the great feast day of Irishmen was signalized in this city none was more interesting or more significant than that luncheon at the Cliff House.

It is whispered over the tea cups that the reason why Miss Anna Peters looks so happy these days is the presence in town of Lieutenant Jackson of the South Dakota.

Luncheon at the Palace

The luncheon hour at the Palace presents a very gay and brilliant spectacle. With the main restaurant and the mens' grill both filled to overflowing the tables are set in the corridors of the Court itself and sometimes, as on last Saturday, even in the center of it. To lunch or dine thus in the Court, with its delightful out of door effect, with music and life and laughter, is to enjoy the very best that San Francisco has to offer. Among those who were seen lunching informally at the Palace were

Great Oratorio at St. Dominic's

On this Sunday evening (Palm Sunday), commencing at 7:30 o'clock, Duboc's inspiring and devotional oratorio, "The Seven Last Words of Christ," will be rendered at St. Dominic's Church, Pierce street between Bush and Pine, by an augmented choir, under the direction of Dr. H. J. Stewart. This is universally considered one of the most sublime compositions of sacred music ever written. In order that all may appreciate the full significance of the oratorio, a short instruction before each word will be given by Very Rev. A. L. McMahon, O. P. The following are the soloists: Soprano, Mrs. B. Apple; contralto, Miss Leola S. Stone; tenor, Mr. Frank Onslow; basso, Mr. Wilfrid Glenn; organist and director of the choir, Dr. H. J. Stewart. The offertory will be "O Thou Afflicted," Benedict. The oratorio will be followed by Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament: "O Salatoris Hostia," Gounod; "Tantum Ergo," Faure.

Aviation Meet at Del Monte

Frank Johnson, the millionaire clubman and social leader of San Rafael who has always been identified with out-of-door sports and who has the distinction of being the first Californian to purchase and fly in a flying machine, will exhibit his new Curtiss biplane at Del Monte today and tomorrow. The exhibition will take place on the Del Monte race track which has been the scene of so many out-of-door events. Johnson's machine is a Curtiss biplane, equipped with every device. He has made a number of spectacular flights and expects to do his prettiest before the social crowd which will unquestionably flock to the popular resort. The usual Saturday to Monday rate of $4.00 which is in effect over the Southern Pacific lines will enable a great many people to see this exhibition. A special rate of a fare and a third has been made from all the surroundings towns, Santa Cruz, Salinas, Kings City, San Jose and will unquestionably bring out a large crowd. Reservations may be telegraphed to Manager Warner at the hotel.

FOR EASTER

An early selection is advised while the varieties are complete. Bunny buntings, fluffy chicks, Easter eggs, egg-shaped boxes and imported novelties. Geo. Haas & Sons' four candy stores.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 3110, New Series, Dept. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of RICHARD ARMSTRONG, Deceased.

LENDRUM ARMSTRONG, Administrator of the Estate of RICHARD ARMSTRONG, deceased, having presented his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of the sale of the whole of the real estate of the said decedent, or so much or such parts thereof as said Court shall judge necessary or beneficial, and it appearing therefrom that such sale is necessary, for the reasons and purposes in said petition mentioned and set forth;

And said petition having been filed, it is now ordered by said Court that all persons interested in the Estate of said deceased be, and they are hereby directed to appear before said Court on Tuesday, the 19th day of April, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10 of said Superior Court in the Grant Building, Southeast corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator authorizing and directing him to sell the whole or so much of the real estate of said decedent as may be necessary.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Dated at San Francisco, this 15th day of March, 1910.

An Artist from Holland

By Theodore Bonnet

A song bird of a species unknown to the Far West fluttered into our midst last Sunday and conquested a little bunch of ardent lovers of the vocal art. This exotic vocalist was introduced to us as a Dutch contralto. Her name is Tillie Koenen. Neither the terms of introduction, nor the name appealed to us. There was a time when much art came out of Holland, but not in recent years have we looked to the Dutch for anything of beauty save windmills. And even though we had conceived it possible for the contemporary Dutch to contribute something worth while to the concert stage we should hardly have expected it to come labeled as "Tillie Koenen." What a name to conjure with! It might serve admirably for a vaudeville contortionist or for a lady of the chorus, but when attached to an exponent of the higher reaches of the vocal art it approximates a solecism. After all, there is a great deal in a name—when bill-boards are taken into consideration. Tillie Koenen, for example, has to sing down her name. And she does it. When she appeared at the Garrick Theatre last Sunday there were not three hundred people in the house. That was as many as could be found in San Francisco willing to take a chance. But well did the hazard profit them; for Tillie Koenen is an artist, a past-mistress of the technique of song interpretation, a singer with an almost perfect mastery of her heaven-born instrument. She comes to us modestly heralded as a contralto. Now that is enough for any singer to be, especially in this age of innumerable pseudo-contraltos who are in reality a cross between a contralto and a mezzo soprano. Miss Koenen is unique inasmuch as she can sing in either voice, having the two separate, distinct qualities. This statement, if it does not induce an arching of highbrow, may at least produce the impression that the lady from Holland is a freak; not, however, without doing her injustice. There is nothing suggestive of vocal acrobatics about Miss Koenen. She does not belong to the awful Ellen Beach Yaw school. She does nothing eccentric or inartistic, unless it be an occasional slight tendency to emit as the climax of her crescendos something akin to that famous church choir yowl with which dear old Lillian Nordica used to evoke the bravas! of the groundlings. Miss Koenen is above all things artistic. Though possessed unquestionably of two qualities of voice she is never guilty of a failure to blend her registers. When she employs the contralto quality her tones are as true as Schumann-Heink's. But in some songs the quality is distinctly the mezzo-soprano brand. Now this is not a question of range. It is entirely a question of quality, and it is certainly unique. The program rendered by Miss Koenen on her first appearance here was one of infinite variety, affording her opportunity in a single concert to vindicate not only the breadth of her artistry but also the depth of her temperament, the perfection of her technique and the high quality of her intelligence. Especially pleasing is her enunciation, one essential of the vocal art that is very much neglected nowadays. To her credit be it said the smallness of her audience had no perceptible effect on her enthusiasm. Doubtless she realized that as a stranger in a strange land the attention she commanded must have been that of people with a sense of art and that the hearty expression of their approval was no idle tribute of deference to reputation such as is often uncarned and undeserved.

Two Vaudeville Shows

By Edward F. O'Day

Although "Wine, Woman and Song," the week's attraction at the Savoy, is announced as a "satirical farcical musical review," it may do just as well to dispense with all these adjectives and regard it merely as a vaudeville show. Thus considering it, it will be found that the manager with not unusual vaudeville perversity has chosen the wrong performer for his "bill-topper." Bonita may be the most beautiful woman in Columbus circle, though I doubt it, but she would not be able to complete one tour of the circuits as a ragtime singer; she doesn't take her syncopated tunes seriously enough. As a beauty she shines by comparison, for the chorus girls by whom she is surrounded were surely not selected for their pulchritude and as for their figures, nothing need be said, for they have none. The merit of "Wine, Woman and Song" abides in the men and Miss Mamie Walker. Miss Walker is a toe dancer of considerable ability and grace; she enlivens her abstruse science with steps that are characteristically American. She is the Querita Vincent of toe dancers. As for the men, I liked James Mullen best. He has absorbed somewhere the traditions of the old-time burlesquers and whether as a comic Richard III or as a silly comedian, he is a continuous cause of laughter. David Jones is a versatile comedian who can play an Italian and a Hungarian Jew as well as give an excellent imitation of David Warfield. Lew Hearn is a very capable foil for James Mullen, being as small as Mullen is large, and shines as a village constable and as an Irishman. With these three comedians must be mentioned Alan Coogan, a very soft shoe dancer. The specialties provided by these performers would be just as enjoyable if they were presented in vaudeville fashion; perhaps more so. There is a lot of time wasted in "Wine, Woman and Song" in the various efforts to insinuate different plots for which nobody cares a rap. And then, if these performers were in vaudeville the collection of chunky and skinny legs which does duty for a chorus might be disbanded. Some of those girls would surely win prizes in one of Professor Puckett's marathon dances; others only exist to illustrate what "attenuated" means.

The Orpheum has a very capable actress who has not been seen here since the days of the Morosco stock company in Miss Lottie Williams. Miss Williams plays the character of a "hashslinger" in Pell street and plays it for all the slang and sentiment there is in it. Edmund Day has provided her a vehicle called "On Stony Ground" which is plotted with extreme obviousness, no doubt to accentuate the character part. Miss Williams is so good an actress that Mr. Day might have written less obviously without taxing her capacity. Miss Elsie Faye of the rolling eyes and the insinuating voice cannot come to the Orpheum too often for some of us who remember the time, not so far back, when vaudeville had more of her singing and dancing kind. While I would hate to be mistaken for a mere praiser of the days gone by, I must say that Miss Faye with her sidekickers, Joe Miller and Sam Weston, belong to the class of vaudeville elect who are less in evidence on the circuit than they used to be. I would much rather see Miss Faye dance and make play with her saucery eyes and hear her sing—everything she does is instinct with the intelligence that shines in her face—than listen to Miss Violet King play the piano with one hand and the violin with the other or to Miss Lily Charlene hammering at the xylophone. Not that I dislike the piano, violin or xylophone; it is merely a question of a vaudeville taste trained by many critical years in the old Orpheum gallery where you went early to get a good ten cent seat. Once the xylophone player was a novelty; it is a novelty no more. The same is true of the spectacular lighting effects which La Loie Fuller and Papinta used to combine with dancing. Miss Ida Fuller has eliminated the dancing and her spectacular effects are so beautiful that I suppose she had reason to protect them, as announced in the program, by United States patent number 643,493. When it comes to protection by patent, Miss Marie Glazier would probably be at a loss what to protect, for she has nothing except her association with Arthur Dunn who has a quiet cleverness sui generis and is in no danger of being imitated. Talking of patents, if the Ahearns should ever decide to patent the ridiculously funny contrivances on which they cycle, I will be willing to pay a visit to Washington just to look them over and laugh at them again; but of course they would not be nearly as comic away from the Ahearns, one of whom in particular is a rare low comedian. The feminine Ahearn is a peach. Mr. William Gould, it seems, is not only a popular raconteur with original compositions but also a favorite here and abroad. That being the case it would be superfluous to praise and besides nothing I could say would add to the evident high esteem in which Mr. Gould holds himself. I was very much taken by Mr. Gould's Nile green cuff links which matched his Nile green shirt studs which in turn matched the Nile green buttons of his waistcoat. There is a freshness about Nile green which is in strong contrast with the weather-beaten color of some of Mr. Gould's "original" jokes.

Stage

"The Round-Up" at the Columbia

After a number of weeks of musical offerings, the Columbia Theatre will, on Monday night, present a dramatic attraction calculated to command the undivided attention of the theatregoers of this city. The announcements already made that Klaw and Erlanger's massive production, "The Round-Up," will be seen commencing Monday night have awakened more than usual interest, for the news of this success reached here some time ago. The company is headed by Maclyn Arbuckle who made a big success in the original production of the Edmund Day play. This powerful spectacular melodrama of life in southwestern Arizona when General Crook was chasing Conchise, the famous Apache renegade and his band of red-skins back to their reservation, has made a remarkable appeal to theatregoers. Twenty genuine Apache Indians appear in the play with their war ponies. The cast includes besides Maclyn Arbuckle, Albert Phillips, Joseph M. Lothian, Sidney Cushing, Elmer Grandin, William Conklin, S. L. Richardson, James Asburn, Jacques Martin, Ogden Crane, Fred R. Stanton, "Texas" Cooper, Grace Benham, Marie Taylor and Paula Gloy. Matinees will be given on Saturdays only.

Tilly Koenen's Farewell Concert

For her farewell concert at the Garrick Theatre this Sunday afternoon, March 20, Tilly Koenen has prepared a program which will contain a number of works by well known composers that have never been sung in this city. Books of the words in English and German will be distributed gratis. Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's until Saturday evening and on Sunday the box office will open at the Garrick at 9:30 a. m.

"The Red Mill" at the Savoy

The last performances of "Wine, Woman and Song," with Bonita and her company of burlesquers, will take place at the Savoy Theatre this Saturday afternoon and evening, and commencing at the Sunday matinee "The Red Mill" will begin an engagement limited to one week. "The Red Mill" is one of the best musical offerings of the decade and boasts of a year's run at the Knickerbocker Theatre, New York, four months in Boston and two months in Philadelphia. It is by those necromancers of stage composition, Henry Blossom and Victor Herbert. In seeking a novel setting for the action Mr. Blossom happily hit upon the country of Holland. The characters in the piece, with one or two exceptions, are all Dutch, and their quaint and brightly colored costumes, exhibited in a frame work of whirling windmills and Delft decorations, form some novel and pretty stage pictures. In the company are some clever players and a chorus of fifty. The usual bargain matinee will be given on Thursday. "As the Sun Went Down," a comedy-drama of unusual interest and with that favorite actress, Estha Williams, in the leading role, will follow "The Red Mill" at the Savoy.

Maud Allan, the Dancer

Managers Will L. Greenbaum and Martin Beck announce that in order to prevent speculators from procuring the best seats for the appearances of Maud Allan, the classic dancer, they will open a mail order sale, a method that proved satisfactory in the Sembrich and Schumann-Heink engagements. The entertainments will be given on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday nights, April 5, 7 and 8, and Sunday afternoon, April 10. Seats will be $2.50 and $2.00 downstairs and $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00 upstairs. Mail orders will receive prompt attention in the order received, if accompanied by check or money order and addressed to Will L. Greenbaum, care of Sherman, Clay & Co., corner of Kearny and Sutter streets. The public sale of seats will open Wednesday, March 30, at Sherman, Clay & Co's.

MAUD POWELL

The greatest living woman violinist who will give concerts at the Garrick Theatre.

"Are You a Mason?" at the Alcazar

Ever since "Are You a Mason?" attained its celebrity as a mirthmaker the Alcazar management has utilized it as their offering during the last week of Lent, and this year there will be no deviation from that rule. The famous farce is announced to be started on its tenth annual run next Monday evening. William Desmond will have the role of the young benedick who gets himself and other folk into all sorts of ridiculous situations by informing his trusting wife that his nocturnal absences from home were necessitated by his attendance at lodge meetings, and Evelyn Vaughan will be seen as the deceived one. Burt Wesner is cast for the part of her father, who has also been deluding his helpmate into belief that he is a member of the society. William Garwood will be well suited as the accommodating youth who obliges his friend by masquerading as a modiste and thus leads him into many mishaps. So will Louis Bennison as the "rube" who is put to severe physical and mental tests to prove his eligibility to enter Masonic brotherhood. Howard Hickman will again be seen as the unscrupulous faker who takes advantage of every chance to profit at the expense of those who trust him; and Adele Belgarde as the jealous matron who regards Masonry as a protector of the domestic hearth. Bessie Barriscale, Will R. Walling, Grace Travers and all the other Alcazar favorites will be nicely disposed in one of the funniest plays that was ever written.

The Bill at the Orpheum

The Orpheum bill for next week will be headed by Madame Mauricia Morichini, prima donna of the Manhattan Grand Opera House, New York, Theatre Chatelet, Paris, and many other famous European opera houses. Two years ago she aroused great interest in local musical circles and her reappearance should be enthusiastically welcomed. She will be heard in a repertoire of songs in Italian, French, Spanish and English. Direct from Europe comes Berg's Six Merry Girls. Their offering which is in three sections is as follows (a) Going to the ball, (b) Acrobatic maidens, (c) Parisian musical clowns on parade. "The Devil, the Servant and the Man" is the title of a sketch to be presented in which "The Devil" and "The Servant in the House" are thrown together to form a dramatic incident that carries a moral. Dan Avery and Charles Hart, the Sunny Comedians, will appear in an entirely new act. During their engagement they will introduce two of their own compositions, "Down Among the Sugar Cane" and "Gee, You're Getting Too Sweet to Live." Next week will close the engagements of Elsie Faye, Joe Miller and Sam Weston; Billy Gould; Violet King; and Arthur Dunn and Marie Glazier in "The Messenger Boy."

The Maud Powell Concerts

Maud Powell, the great violinist, will make her first appearance in this city at the Garrick Theatre on Sunday afternoon, March 27, and will play the following exceptional program: "Concerto" (first movement), Tschaikowsky, "Duo" for violin and piano by Schubert, two Bach "Preludes" and a Fiorillo "Prelude" and numbers by Couperin, Beethoven, Chopin, Sarasate and Wieniawski. At the second concert, Thursday night, March 31, Caesar Franck's beautiful "Sonata" for violin and piano, the Vieuxtemp "Concerto" and works by Massenet, Mozart, Dvorak and the brilliant Tartini work, "Trill of the Devil," are among the good things promised. For the farewell concert on Sunday afternoon the Mendelssohn "Concerto" and Locatelli "Sonata" are on the list. Complete programs may be had at Sherman, Clay & Co's where the sale of seats opens next Wednesday.

"The Eternal City" for Liberty Patrons

Following a highly successful week with "The Girl of the Golden West," the Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will on next Monday evening present "The Eternal City," considered by many the best of the plays Hall Caine has made from his own novels. "The Christian," by that prolific author, is a fine conception, but "The Eternal City" is a more lofty and ennobling theme. It tells the story of Rossi, the leader of the Roman people, and of his love for Donna Roma, the sculptress and ward of the Prime Minister. Their undying love, which remains steadfast through trials that shake the foundation of church and state, their triumph at last, and his elevation to the position of Dictator of Rome, form a powerful drama that one never forgets. The scenes are laid in and near Rome and are supposed to occur at some future date, and afford exceptional opportunities for a display of the scene-painter's art, while the cast is not only a long one but one containing many excellent acting roles. In them will be seen all the well established favorites of the company, with Sydney Ayres and Elizabeth Stewart as Rossi and Donna Roma respectively. After one week of "The Eternal City," "Cameo Kirby" will be given as the attraction for Easter Week.

The Burton Holmes Travelogues

"Our Own Hawaii," "Old Japan Today," "New Japan Today," "Java" and "More About Paris" will be the subjects of the five Travelogues of the Burton Holmes Series to be given at the Garrick Theatre commencing Monday night, April 11. The three courses will be so arranged that subscribers need go but twice a week for two weeks and once the third week in order to hear all the interesting subjects. A special matinee course will be given also in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse.

Mr. Beck Promises Prize for Playlet

Martin Beck, general manager of the Orpheum Circuit, and promoter of the newly organized international circuit, announces a unique contest by which he says he expects to procure the best one-act play ever written, for the coming Actors' Fund Fair. Unlike the other contests this provides for two tests. First, the six most promising plays will be selected from those submitted. These will then be produced at the Fair by Mr. Beck, the entire proceeds going to charity. After all have been presented he will award a prize of $250 to the author of the play voted most successful. In entering the contest no author loses the right to royalties, says Mr. Beck. "I will put the prize winner on our circuit and, of course, pay the winner the usual weekly percentage. If any of the remaining five plays grip the audience sufficiently, I will take them under the same conditions. Never have the conditions for new authors been so auspicious. The plays will be acted at the Fair by the best actors and actresses in America, from both the vaudeville and regular theatres. The only requirements that the plays must fulfill are that they be clean and not last over thirty minutes. The act may be a comedy, farce, musical sketch or tragedy." The contest closes April 1, to allow time for the selection and preparation of the plays, the first of which will be presented on the opening day of the Fair, May 9. All manuscripts must be typewritten and sent to E. L. Sheldon, Actors' Fund Fair, 1432 Broadway. Mr. Beck has invited the following well-known critics to act as judges: Matthew J. White Jr., dramatic editor of Munsey's; Adolph Klauber, dramatic editor of the Times; Louis V. DeFoe, dramatic editor of the World; Sam McKee, vaudeville editor of The Morning Telegraph, and Acton Davies, dramatic editor of the Evening Sun.

ALBERT PHILLIPS and GRACE BENHAM

As Jack Payson and Echo Allen in "The Round Up" at the Columbia Theatre

Bobby North Belascoized

Bobby North whose Hebraic impersonations are well remembered by San Franciscans has passed under the spell of David Belasco. North was playing a near-Broadway engagement when Belasco engaged him for a character part in "Just a Wife," Eugene Walter's latest drama. He has made a distinct hit and is enamored of legitimate acting. But before all else he is hypnotised by the Belasco personality. To an interviewer North spoke recently in awed tones of "the decree of fate" which brought him "to know this really great man." This is how North estimates the value of a Belasco training: "It's like going to college. No day closes without learning something new. Mr. Belasco has the power to tell you in one or two words exactly what he wants, and has also the ability to portray each character himself. I would like to say through your paper that I consider Mr. Belasco the greatest of stage directors, and I consider it a privilege to be associated with him. This is my first step in the dramatic field." This is part of the formula which all the Belasco players use in discussing their chief. Mrs. Leslie Carter used to employ it; so did Blanche Bates. David Warfield still talks in this strain; and little Frances Starr harps enthusiastically on the same key. Nance O'Neil has only been a Belasco player for a short time, but she has acquired the patter too. There is no doubt that Belasco possesses a wonderful power of impressing his players with his greatness; probably that is one reason why he gets such results out of them.

Odd Things in the World

Some striking indications of the German workingmen's prosperity are contained in the Prussian savings bank statistics. The deposits in the kingdom, which comprises only two-third of the empire, totalled $2,393,250,000 at the end of 1908. Deposits during that year were $112,500,000 more than in 1907, and the excess of deposits over withdrawals amounted to $30,000,000. The greatest increase of deposits over withdrawals was registered in the heart of industrial Germany, the Rhine province and Westphalia contributing $19,750,000 and $15,000,000 respectively. There are rather more than thirty savings bank accounts to every 100 persons of the population of Prussia, while the total number of accounts have increased twice as fast as the rate of increase of the population. Experts predict that 1910 will bring the total Prussian savings bank deposits to $2,500,000,000. The amount due to depositors in the British post office savings bank in 1908 was $803,241,070. The increase in 1908 was only $15,740,685.

An ingenious method of smuggling saccharin has been detected at Bregenz, Austria, where seven men were arrested for importing large quantities of contraband. When the Geneva-Munich express arrived at Bregenz the station master had a coach containing seven travelers uncoupled from the express and detained for examination. He had been warned by telegraph from Zurich that seven smugglers of Geneva were in the train with a large quantity of saccharin. After an exhaustive search the officials failed to find any contraband and were about to apologize to the seven travelers for their detention when one customs inspector accidentally kicked a hot water pipe in a first class compartment and the secret was revealed. All the hot water pipes in the carriage were in duplicate, differing in no detail as to length, breadth and color, but one set was of metal and the other set made of papier mache containing saccharin, which is about nine times as expensive in Austria as in Switzerland.

One of the curiosities in natural history in the colony of Queensland is the provision by nature of a supply of water in the roots of certain trees. On these roots the aborigines formerly depended for their water supply for several months of the year. There are several kinds of trees in Queensland from which water can be obtained, including three species of eucalyptus, and the kurrajong. The eucalypti consist of a gum, which is the largest of the back country trees, a box, and mallee. The first named is the most preferred, as yielding the greatest quantity. This tree resembles the red gum in appearance, the leaves being a little narrower and of a silvery color. It grows chiefly on sandy or light loamy soil and throws out numerous lateral roots at a depth of about nine inches from the surface of the ground. The position of these roots was ascertained by the blacks by repeatedly jabbing the points of a spear or sharpened stick in the soft earth at a distance of about six or eight feet from the trunk of the tree. The soil was then removed with a wooden shovel for some twenty feet or more and the root cut off at either end. This was then cut up into lengths of about eighteen inches, the bark knocked off and the lengths stood on end in some receptacle to contain the water. In many cases the blacks used a bag made of the entire skin of the male wallaby. As soon as all these pieces were placed on end the operator, beginning with the first placed, put the end in his mouth, and by a vigorous puff expelled the remaining water. The size of the roots chosen was, with the bark on, about the thickness of a man's wrist. The larger ones, being more woody and less porous, contain little or no water. The water is beautifully clear, cool and free from any unpleasant taste or smell.

We're already the best friends imaginable. I confided to him my fear of games of chance, particularly of trente et quarante, which, I told him, has already scorched me. That's only too true! And I told him of my taste for whist. I had secured a little information. Darcy comes to the club every afternoon at five and plays whist till seven. And he'll play with us today, if you're willing."

"You aren't going to propose to pluck him to get Rene his ten thousand, I hope," I laughed.

"What about your promise not to ask questions?" he returned, with a very serious air. "Play just as you desire. Only, toward the middle of the game, I want you to say to me, 'I've never seen that ring before, Bordin.' And you must beg me to let you examine the ruby which I shall wear on my little finger."

He had drawn from his pocket an old ring, in which was set a stone of admirable size and purity.

"It came to me from my Polish grandmother," he told me, while I was examining it. "The good woman, a genuine Slav, had a passion for jewels in her day. I disposed of nearly all we inherited from her jewel-boxes, in my days of need, before I began to get orders for portraits. But I kept this ruby for a rainy day. I'm jolly well glad I didn't sell it. I've been offered forty thousand francs for it. And since we've begun to talk money, would you mind counting these notes, to see if there are ten of one thousand francs each?"

He gave me an envelope, whose contents I verified.

Bordin continued: "Here's the most delicate detail of your share in the plot. You must carry this ten thousand francs to Darcy this very afternoon. Tell him that you have been requested by Rene's father to discharge part of the debt immediately."

"I don't understand," I answered, after a mental debate of some seconds, in which curiosity conquered my repugnance to lying, even to Darcy. "But I promise. I'll do it."

Through his profession the usurer was accustomed to arrangements of this sort. The hasty and indirect manner of payment did not seem to astonish him. If any scruples had remained in my mind, I would have lost them, for I heard him say, while he gave me back the IOU's for ten thousand:

"Tell Monsieur X. that I have let the money to his son only to prevent his falling into the hands of certain sharks. I was quite willing to give him time, all the time he wished, and I'll let the little balance run as long as he likes."

His was the tone of an amiable and easy-going man whom the companionship at a feast makes indulgent to the follies of youth. That hypocrisy of his gave me such horror that I passionately desired the success of the "rather severe farce" proposed by Bordin. So it was without the least hesitation that I made the remark we had agreed upon, regarding the ring, as we sat at the whist table some hours later. Everything had gone as the painter had announced. We had found Darcy at the club and we had made up a whist party with him and another.

"That's a family jewel," Bordin answered, laughing. "It's a very cheap one. I carry the ring only when I'm playing, as a fetish. It's too conspicuous for ordinary occasions. But don't go into ecstasies over the stone. It's an imitation."

"Imitation?" cried Darcy, almost involuntarily. "With such a gleam as that? It surely isn't possible—"

I simply couldn't see through my friend's plan. Why did he, contrary to all evidence and the truth itself, cheapen the stone whose value he had told me himself? Anyway, if he had wished to arouse the curiosity of the usurer, as well as mine, he had succeeded.

"Yes, an imitation," Bordin repeated, with the phlegmatic air of the imperturbable comedian. "Absolutely false."

He had taken the ring from his finger and handed it to me. In turn I handed it to Darcy, whose eyes had gained the peculiar expression they had the day before, when he looked on at the financial downfall of Boyard.

"This ruby is mounted in a remarkable way, for an imitation stone," said Darcy.

"That's why my father always thought it must have been repaired by some scoundrelly jeweler who substituted a false stone for the genuine. As you see, the mounting is not of French workmanship. My father was greatly astonished when he found a false ruby of such a size among the trinkets, after my grandmother's death. The will left us no doubt, however, as to its being an imitation."

"Indeed," responded Darcy, after he had inspected the ring closely and from all sides. "The work was done by a clever artist. Mighty clever," he repeated, as he handed back the ring and the whist continued.

But the carelessness of the usurer showed how preoccupied he was. Over what? His continual glances toward the ruby said enough. Bordin seemed not to notice him. But I, who had some idea of his plans, observed that he handled his ring as a lark hunter does his mirrors. His moving hands kept showing that ruby, now at one angle, now at another, and the stone flashed so that one might have thought it a talisman, conscious of its task of vengeance. When we had risen from the table the charm had worked, for Darcy approached the painter with an embarrassment which was explained to me ten minutes later.

"It's taking," my friend said to me with a merry laugh. "That d'Estourmel didn't lie. Darcy came to ask me if I'd lend him the ring for twenty-four hours. He wanted to examine the mounting."

"You lent it to him? Then it's' true, the ruby is an imitation?"

"No, it's genuine. I've already told you I was offered forty thousand for it."

"I'm on. He's going to carry it to a jeweler. They'll tell him its value. Tomorrow he'll return to you and tell you that it's lost, persuaded that you won't howl over a stone which you think an imitation. You'll threaten to have him arrested, and profit by his terror to get from him the notes which Rene has signed."

"Nobly done," grinned Bordin, with an irony which did not anger me, so interested was I by the enigma. "You must dispense with an answer from me," he continued. "That's our agreement. But I want you to be very exact in getting to the club at half after four. Darcy will be there. I shall arrive at five. He'll use the thirty minutes in asking questions about me. You will tell him from what family I come, and who the Gorkis are, if he happens not to know. He'll ask you if I'm rich. You'll tell him that I have been, but that I live expensively and that gambling costs me dear, very dear. In short, make him think that I'm in need."

You may be sure that I did not fail to be at the rendezvous. Darcy was already there. I wondered hom my comrade could have guessed with such correctness the questions which would be put to me by the usurer, evidently burning with a fiery desire to purchase that stone, which he knew to be genuine and which he believed the owner considered false. The greatness of the gain had put him in a fever of impatience.

"You are quite sure that your friend will be here today?" he ended, after he had looked at his watch several times.

"Quite sure," I answered; "we dine together."

He drew the ruby from his pocket, his temptation evident.

"A false stone of such beauty is certainly a curiosity," he said. "And such a mounting! I repeat what I said yesterday—it's a marvel. That Countess Gorka must have been rich to amuse herself with fantasies so costly and so useless. I have known Monsieur Bordin as a painter; I did not know him as a millionaire."

I repeated my lines about his terrible prodigality, pretending to be rather ashamed of gossiping about my friend. As Bordin came in he quite justified my tale, with his sombre appearance and his nervous glance.

"Ah, so you have brought back my ring, monsieur," he said, after a salutation with very little politeness to it. "I was wrong to lend it to you. I didn't have it, and it's the ring that always makes me win. It is grotesque," he added, addressing me. "After lunch I went to hear a little music at Monte Carlo. One has only to open his eyes when he's there to convince himself that he ought not to gamble. Who has paid for this tremendous wealth of buildings, terraces, flowers? Who? Those who lose on the green cloth! Well, you see one of them. I played, and I lost. Don't ask me how much. I'm so disgusted with myself—"

While he was lamenting he approached the fire, putting on his finger the ring which Darcy had given back to him. With his back to the flames and his hands in his back pockets, he commenced to warm the soles of his shoes, lifting his feet one after the other, without seeming to pay any attention to Darcy or myself.

The usurer had to his lips words which he did not dare to pronounce. He lighted a cigar, to give himself an appearance of ease, just as young Rene had done in a neighboring apartment a few evenings before; and, still like Rene, he drew me aside, to speak to me, in a low tone:

"Monsieur Bordin seems very much out of sorts," he said. "If he needs a little loan, I happen to be in funds. I happened to have a little luck lately at baccarat. I admire his painting tremendously—Indeed, I should be delighted—Coome to think of it, I am making a collection of old rings. I would buy that one of his very gladly."

"It's done," thought I to myself, "but the devil take me if I see where we get off!" Aloud, I said, "Why don't you ask him?" Bordin raised his head, as though he knew we were speaking of him, and I continued: "Monsieur Darcy was speaking of your ring. He would like it for his collection. He wants to know if he could possibly get it from you."

"What? Sell my ring?" asked the painter, raising his hand and looking at the ruby. On his expressive face he had the astonishment of a loser who suddenly perceives a new chance which he had not expected. There was a little knitting of his eyebrows, a trembling of his lips—the remorse of the prodigal son before some sacred relic. Ah, what a wonderful actor! Turning toward Darcy, he said: "But you know very well that the ring has no value at all, since the stone is an imitation. Oh, I know; there's the mounting. But what you would give me for it would be insignificant in comparison with the memories which the trinket carries."

"I am a collector, monsieur," the usurer said simply. This other and less harmless actor assumed the good-humored smile of the man with a hobby who is going to do some foolish thing of which he is perfectly aware. "Consequently," he continued, "that ring with its false stone has for me, merely in its style, as much value as it has for you—perhaps more. You have other family jewels, while this mounting is unique. What would you say if I should offer you," and he hesitated, "four thousand francs?"

"Four thousand francs?" repeated Bordin, as though overcome by the size of the amount. He looked at the ring again, and exclaimed, raising his head: "No. That's ten times as much as it's worth. But what could I do with four thousand? I couldn't begin to play with that. And then, this ring is not merely a token. As I've told you, it's my mascot."

"Five thousand, then?" insisted Darcy.

"Five thousand?" the painter repeated, and looked at the ring again. Again his brows were knit, his lips trembled, his fist was clenched—in all an astonishing imitation of the signs of a debate of the conscience. Chopping his words, he growled out: "Then you want the ring as much as all that? If you wish to pay a perfectly absurd price, I consent to sell it to you. It will be ten thousand francs or nothing. Give it to me, and this imitation ruby is yours. I, too, value this ring, greatly. But ten thousand may be worth the pain of parting with it."

While he was making this offer he had wildly drawn the ring from his hand, turning away his eyes. Without saying a word, but with intense emotion hinted in his face, Darcy drew from his pocket his portfolio and took out some bank-notes—no doubt the same I had given him to redeem my young friend's notes. He held out the package to Bordin, who gave him the ring. Then, as though he were ashamed of this shameful bartering, the grandson of the Countess Gorka seized my arm and dragged me away, with a step like that of the victim of the green cloth who is hastening to get his revenge.

We had scarcely left the building when he burst into merry laughter, then heralded solemnly: "Make way for the king's judge!" Then, to me: "Do you understand now?"

He drew from his pocket a ring exactly like the one I had just seen him give to Darcy for the ten thousand. "Here's the ring I let him take home—to be examined by the jeweler. The Countess Gorka had an exact imitation made to protect the real stone—and you heard me say 'Give me the ten thousand and this imitation ruby is yours." Now you may consider the ten thousand I advanced as Rene's, for this refunds me. With it he has paid Darcy his usurious interest."

"You changed the real stone for the imitation while your hands were in your pockets, as you stood before the fire?" I asked.

Bordin nodded, and again he laughed like a boy, chuckling: "And the best of it is that you and the fourth hand we had at whist yesterday heard me say that the stone was a false one. So Darcy thought I was one of those fool scions who wouldn't think of having a family jewel appraised—and tried to cheat me!"

Letters

"Tower of Ivory" by Mrs. Atherton

Mrs. Atherton's new novel, "Tower of Ivory," so far surpasses all her previous work that even her second-best must be rated as only pretty good in comparison. It was scarcely necessary for the publishers to issue a warning that it "is NOT a novel of divorce, politics, finance, muck-raking, capital and labor, woman suffrage, international marriages (save incidentally), New York society, the Tenderloin, New England, the South, Alaska, Bohemia, a new Balkan Estate, the negro, mysticism, symbolism, or any sort of sermon," for, whatever else the author may have been guilty of, she has never used her talents in the propagation of tracts. The reader who has become more or less inured to the pill in the jam may begin to wonder what "Tower of Ivory" is, and he may be assured that it is just plain story, not designed for misses in short skirts and masters in knickerbockers, not an exploitation of unsavory incidents set forth to "teach a moral," but for those who have sound literary digestion and philosophy enough to accept the facts of life as they are, not as they might be in an ideal world. a novel which will bear more than one reading and plenty of pondering over. The character which holds the center of the stage throughout is a woman, a great dramatic soprano, the most realistic interpreter of the Wagnerian roles. She is under the protection of the mad King Leopold of Bavaria but knows him only as her patron. Though she must appear when he commands, and give performances to him alone when and where he wills, she has never met him face to face. There is, of course, plenty of gossip but Margarethe Styr remains something of a mystery. She ignores society, makes few friends and no intimates and is apparently all artiste, with the woman eliminated. The truth is that Margarethe Styr, great singer and Bavarian countess, is a recrudescence of a very different character. Born a waif in a Pennsylvania coal mine, orphaned at birth of her mother, and never having had any knowledge of a father, she lived the first fifteen years of her life in squalor and did not so much as know there was an alphabet. Possessed of some good looks and no morals whatever, it is not difficult to surmise her first step outward if not upward. Thirteen years of a career too black to be checkered found her at the end of that time thoroughly sated with the life, and the sole survivor of a Pacific Coast wreck in which all the other members of the cheap theatrical company with which she was traveling were lost, she was able to lose her identity as Margaret Hill. Having discovered that she possessed a voice and a mind she set to work, determined to cultivate both and here we find her in Bavaria, the favorite of the mad king Leopold, and the premiere of the opera house. Margarethe simply ignored her past. She pretended to herself no remorse for anything she had done, but accepted it as experience which enabled her to be what she was. John Ordham, the young Englishman on whose career Margarethe Styr was destined to have so great an influence, is an unusual type, at least in fiction. He was the second son of a peer now deceased, the title having fallen with the estate, to his elder half-brother. Ordham was destined by his natural ability, his family influence and his lack of other means of subsistence, for a diplomatic career, but he was inordinately idle and self-indulgent and likely to let the time slip by in social enjoyment until he had passed the limit at which he was eligible to examination. He was born to be managed but not controlled by women. Handsome, graceful, and with a look of eternal youth, he was petted and indulged by all and several until in many regards he was only a big infant. It was his good fortune to meet Margarethe Styr and to be made the rare exception and admitted to an intimate friendship with her. She had a thorough American contempt for a helpless idler and managed to let Ordham see himself as he was, as far as practical ability went, no better off than the loathsome degenerates of aristocracy who prowled about the cafes at night. Under her guidance he set himself seriously to work and in a short time mastered the required subjects and was ready to pass his examinations. It had been determined by both friends and family that Ordham must marry wealth. He was not the type of fortune hunter so often met in both fact and fiction, vicious, impoverished and degenerate, but on the contrary, whether considered mentally or physically, a desirable youth, and it was not long before the eligible match presented itself in the person of Mabel Cutting, an American heiress, young and beautiful enough to please the most fastidious, and, moreover, very much in love with him. Ordham imagined that he had chosen the girl for himself, directly in opposition to his mother and prevailing against her own initial indifference. In reality he was managed into it by a clever trio, his mother who, knowing his disposition, had planned the plot, Mrs. Cutting, who was not only willing but anxious, and Mabel herself who had been carefully coached for the part she was to play. So successfully was the scheme conceived that it needed only a fortnight of opportunity and all was ready for a speedy marriage. The one serious mistake was made by the poor girl who did not realize that she was cast for a continuous performance, but dropped her role as soon as the trap was sprung. Almost immediately Ordham discovered that his bride had no interest whatever in his career. She was determined not to live on the continent where the cooking would ruin her complexion and she would have to take a place inferior to the "old frumps" in the service, but had decided on a career for herself as an English beauty presiding over house parties and entertaining royalties. Very soon he found himself acting as host to a succession of brilliant gatherings but without a suspicion that he was being managed again and that the same clever trio who had impounded him before was now intent on placing obstacles in his way until, disgusted by his lack of enthusiasm, his name would be dropped from the Foreign Office rolls and his chance of a career ended. It was Margarethe Styr who became again his guardian angel. She had no intention of "coming between" husband and wife in vulgar fashion, but was determined that his ambition should not fail, so consummate actress that she was, she reopened a correspondence with him and subtly suggested the truth. Despite his soft and yielding exterior Ordham had a skeleton of iron and once his suspicions were aroused he determined to free himself from bondage. One's sympathies are divided between the girl wife, so unfitted in every respect to be the wife of a diplomat, so affectionate as to be silly, and so young and inexperienced, and the man who must either set himself in opposition to her and fight for his life if he is to be a man or degenerate into the tame cat, the husband of a rich wife whose exactions would increase by indulgence of her whims. Mrs. Cutting, the mother, is an interesting study. An excellent woman after her kind, she was yet a poor specimen of a wife, living chiefly abroad for the benefit of her only child's education, and forgetting or ignoring her husband in every respect save as a source of supply. It was her attitude when, Margarethe Styr having come to London for a brief operatic season, she flatly refused to accede to Ordham's desire to repay some part of the courtesy shown him in Munich, which brought family affairs to a crisis. Mrs. Cutting stood firmly for "the purity of the home," and Ordham, with his characteristic obstinacy when any attempt was made to drive him, saw far more of his good friend than he otherwise would have, and entered upon a new stage of intimacy with her. Hitherto their companionship had been altogether mental but now they were brought to realize that there might be more, and when Mabel brought to bear her petty jealousy and her gift of crying beautifully it is scarcely to be wondered that Ordham was driven by exasperation to the verge of brutality. It was anything for an excuse to escape, a few breaths of fresh air. Though put in cold print his conversation with his mother-in-law when he left, ostensibly for the bedside of his brother, may strike the reader as crudely selfish, nevertheless it is plainly true and probably represents accurately enough the average masculine sentiment. It has been often questioned whether an author has the right to invoke death as an aid when a situation becomes too complicated. Inconvenient people in the real world have a bad habit of lingering on the scene no matter how strong the temptation to banish them. At any rate, Mrs. Atherton has had no hesitation, and not only does the expected heir, but the tearful wife, bewailing her youth and beauty and untried opportunities and the superfluous elder brother die within a few days of each other leaving Ordham, at twenty-six, free, with means enough to gratify his every wish and a title and social position as a peer into the bargain. In a way he owes this emancipation to Margarethe as well as his earlier success, and, not unnaturally, it comes to him that after a decent season of mourning their lives shall be united. Here arises a new and unforseen coil, for Ordham is perfectly well aware that if he marries Margarethe the story of her past will rise up and make a diplomatic career an impossibility. If he settles down on his estates in England future generations may point with pride to her as an ancestress but what of the children of such a union? How can they hold their heads up? Again, has he any right to ask her to abandon her career, and if not, can he have his wife maintaining a position as a public entertainer, artiste though she is? On Margarethe's part there are likewise unanswerable questions. Suppose she accepts his sacrifice and lets him abandon his career, will neither of them regret it thereafter? Suppose she gives up her own and discovers that after all she is more artiste than woman? The manner in which she solves the enigma is unique and leaves no opportunity for reconsideration. It is not inconsistent with her character and by means of it she still holds her influence over Ordham's career, making of him what perhaps he would never have made of himself alone. There are some remarkably fine bits of description in "Tower of Ivory," notably that of the last performance of the Gotterdamerung in the darkened, empty Hof, the only audience being the mad king and the solitary Ordham; the notable performance of Tristan and Isolde, the village of Obermmeergau, the streets and gardens of Munich. And there is philosophy enough, and humor a-plenty. "Tower of Ivory" will take its place amongst the musical novels, though it will prove a disappointment to those who have been anticipating biographical revelations on the supposition that its heroine must be some of the well known singers of Wagnerian roles. It is a big book and decidedly the best thing Mrs. Atherton has yet done. It is only a little while ago that she avowed her repudiation of much of her earlier work. Given time enough, she may draw another line and wish to eliminate from our memories all that antedates this. From the Macmillan Company.

Bell at Paso Robles; one to Owners' Garage at Bakersfield; two to Ward Bros. at Fort Bragg; six to Newman & Company at Newman; two cars to Mr. A. B. Mires at Modesto; two to Sweet Company at Visalia.

The new Light Six Stevens-Duryea car that went to Mr. A. W. Jackson has been very much admired. It is painted English Purple Lake, which is a color a little out of the ordinary.

Sale to J. P. Morgan and Company makes E-M-F Company larger and stronger financially. There will be no change in its policy. Same management as heretofore will continue and dealers' interests will be protected.

An interesting trip over the northern part of the State has just been completed by Ivan L. deJongh, manager of the Standard Motor Car Company. In speaking of his trip the well known local automobile man said: "The conditions in the northern part of the State for automobile trade are better than I have ever seen them. Practically everybody is anxious to own an automobile and during my short trip I received more inquiries about the Ford and Velie cars than I could take care of and as a result I arranged with Mr. G. A. Scott of Fort Bragg to represent the Standard Motor Car Company, with the Ford and Velie cars in the territory. The road conditions in the vicinity of Fort Bragg are about as bad as any part of the State, the thoroughfares being cut up and very rough owing to the recent storms, but not withstanding the conditions of the roads I had no diffculty in driving in my Ford car and in fact the sales I made on my trip were partly due to the good showing made by the machine over such roads. I expect to send a great many cars to the vicinity of Fort Bragg within the next two months, the first of these being shipped from the factory immediately."

Mr. R. S. Breck of Seattle thinks there is nothing like the Diamond Mountain Tread Tire. He writes that during continuous use on his Packard car covering trips from Los Angeles to Seattle through mountainous country, he has covered 7,000 miles with absolutely no tire trouble.

Mr. C. E. Nickerson of Seattle has just written The Diamond Rubber Co. of this city a very warm letter of recommendation in which he states that at the time of writing four Diamond Tires on his Reo car had given 12,000 miles service and look as though they would deliver several hundred miles more.

Greene & Griffin, real estate people in Phoenix, Ariz., are strong boosters of the Diamond line. On a car which they use in their business, Diamond Tires have given 11,000 miles service on the front wheels and an average of 6,000 miles service on the rear wheels.

Among the many recent purchasers of the Diamond Grip Tires this week are The Woodlawn Auto Co., Letchers Garage, Jas. Toler of San Leandro and H. L. Requa of Berkeley.

Mr. C. E. Mathewson, Pacific Coast manager of The Diamond Rubber Co., is in receipt of advices from their Los Angeles branch that the combined licensed and unlicensed auto shows held at that point, gave a total of 271 cars, 101 of which were equipped with Diamond Tires or 38 per cent of the total. This is a remarkable showing and indicates the strong hold Diamond Tires have in Southern California.

J. Henry Zitt, president of the San Diego Consolidated Brewing Co., is a very strong advocate of Diamond Tires. He writes that on his Dorris touring car he has covered over until after he had passed the 9,000 mile mark on all four tires.

William Kolb is starring in a new one. This, however, is not theatrical. Kolb's latest appearance is in a brand new Chalmers "30" pony tonneau. While the larger part of our good townsman is devoted to comic opera, a good share of what is left is automobile enthusiasm. Kolb always plays the lead and this, perhaps is why he has long since deposed his chauffeur and drives his car himself. The equipment and general appearance of his new Chalmers proves that Kolb's connoiseurship is not alone limited to song's and skips and prospective chorus girls, but extends as well to the automobile world.

Severe Tests Prove Its Superiority

Although a comparatively new product, Zerolene has been more severely tested under all conditions than many other lubricants, and, distinctly better than any of these, has triumphed in every test.

ZEROLENE

Auto Lubricating Oil

lubricated the winning Thomas car in the famous New York to Paris race, also the Protos and Zust cars which ran second and third. Zerolene proved its perfect lubricating and non-carbonizing qualities, and its zero-working ability in the most severe tests to which a lubricating oil has ever been put.

Zerolene is the only "all round" oil that serves all types of cylinders and bearings. There is only one kind of Zerolene, produced in only one place in the world. Put up in sealed cans with patent spout that cannot be refilled. Also in barrels for garage trade.

Transportation Evolution

From Red Man's Express to the "Electric" Victoria or Coupe.

The earliest mode of transportation in this country was that which the Pilgrim Fathers found the Indians using when the ponies of the latter dragged two long poles upon which were tied the red man's tepees and provisions.

From this down through the periods of the ox-cart, the two-wheeled chaise, of which the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes sings so eloquently, to the Brewster buggy and the automobile, seems but a hurried step in the great process of transportation evolution.

In this procession of marvelous development some one car must necessarily blaze the way, and it is not speaking disparagingly of the others to refer to them as "trailers."

As the records of electric car performances plainly point, the "Babcock" is the car which has led the van from every standpoint of efficiency, safety, luxury and economy. It combines the grace, elegance and luxury of this type of vehicle with the comfort and wear-resisting qualities which warrant the purchaser in pinning his faith to this particular make of "electric."

The purchaser should not be asked to buy "claims," but be offered only results accomplished by a car of standard equipment and stock battery.

In some instances, there have been foisted upon the public results gained by the use of specially prepared batteries and freak cars, and manufacturers were not honest enough to tell this fact. It is in this, perhaps, that the "Babcock" has won its meed of confidence at the hands of the public, for almost every record-making test has been accomplished by just the same kind of a car you would purchase if you choose from the Pioneer Automobile Company.

Send for the Artistic 1910 Babcock Catalogue, written by Elbert Hubbard, of special Roycroft Design, and printed at the Roycroft Printerie.

More "Babcocks" sold in San Francisco than any other make of Electric Vehicle.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 26,821.

HARDA ZOIE, Plaintiff, vs.
NICHOLAS ZOIE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Nicholas Zoie, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and abandonment of the plaintiff without any sufficient cause or reason and on the further ground of defendant's wilful failure and neglect to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life while having the ability so to do; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1909.

(Seal) ..... Clerk.
By .....Deputy Clerk.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 28,115, Department No. 4.

In the Matter of the Application of JOSEPH KASIMER JANKOWSKY to Change Name.

It appearing from the written application filed in the above entitled Court on the 17th day of February, 1910, by the above named Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky praying for an order that he be permitted to change his present name, to-wit: Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky to that of Joseph Kasimer John, and that he is a resident of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California: and,

Good cause appearing to me therefore, it is ordered that all persons interested in the above entitled matter are hereby directed to be and appear before the above entitled Court in Department No. 4 thereof at its Courtroom in the Grant Building at the Southeast Corner of Seventh and Market Streets, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 1st day of April, 1910, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. and then and there show cause if any they have why the application of Joseph Kasimer Jankowsky for change of his name to Joseph Kasimer John should not be granted.

It is further ordered that a copy of this order to show cause be published for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which the above Court finds to be the one most likely to give notice to the parties interested in the hearing of said petition and the granting thereof. The Best Age for Writing

The old discussion concerning the age at which the best literary work is done recalls the story of the ambitious writer who proved to his own satisfaction that the full fruition of human brain-power was reached in that year which used to be called the grand climacteric. Accordingly he wrote his great book at the proper time only to have it received with contempt. What to him was a mystery was solved when he discovered that his birth certificate had by mistake been two years post-dated, so that in reality he had allowed his best year to pass. From the debate which has long gone on upon the subject, emerges the conclusion that while no law can be discovered as to writing in general, authors of fiction have generally done their work in maturity. De Foe was fifty-eight when he wrote Robinson Crusoe, Richardson fifty-one when Pamela appeared, Fielding wrote Tom Jones in his forty-second and forty-third years. George Eliot was forty-three when Romola appeared, and Thackeray thirty-six when Vanity Fair was published. Trollope began his work late in life, the first of his successful novels appearing in his forty-first year, Scott was forty-three when in 1814 he wrote Waverley—though he was famous as a poet at the age of thirty-four. Swift was fifty-nine when he wrote Gulliver's Travels. Apparent exceptions are found in Victor Hugo who wrote Hans of Iceland and Bug-Jargol when very young; he was capable of Les Miserables only at the age of sixty. Balzac produced only inferior work until he had passed thirty. The reason of course is obvious: activity of imagination, rhetorical power and general information, all of which may be possessed in comparative youth, will equip any writer but a novelist; he must have in addition to these that which ordinarily comes only with actual length of years—wide experience and observation of human life. The real exception is of course Charles Dickens, who, at the age of twenty-four, published a book, Pickwick Papers, which revealed fully developed every characteristic of his genius. Not merely was Pickwick Papers an unparalleled youthful success but its characteristics remained those of its author's later work. The fact is that through the abnormal experiences of his childhood, Dickens was at twenty-four what men usually become at twice the age. In his childhood Dickens was a man in many things. It is equally true that in his manhood he remained a child in many things.

Ancient Appetite

We may theorize on food nowadays with much astuteness; but what theory will give us back the appetites enjoyed in the good old days of yore? Our modern cooking is more refined; all manners of high flavors excite our appetite; and yet we cannot eat as they were wont to eat. It is a melancholy fact, to think of which makes us sad at heart. Here are, for instance, a few extracts from a certain household book, or diary, written by the Earl of Surrey in 1523. On the 6th of August in that year the earl, as was his habit, dined in "his lady's chamber." This was but an ordinary dinner, consisting of two messes, at one of which all the servants partook. The guests were few in number. This was the simple but substantial fare: "First course—Capons boiled, and a breast of mutton and a piece of beef, chevels, a swan and a pig, a breast of veal, roast capons, and a custard. Second course—Chickens, quails, pigeons, a pasty of venison and several tarts." But perhaps the most conclusive evidence that we can give of the good appetites prevalent in those days is the active part enacted by the ladies at table. On October 24th, we find it related in the same diary that two ladies were served for their breakfast as follows: "To my lady and my Lady Wyndham, a peyse of beyf, a gooyse, a breste of veyle rost, a capon." This is decidedly good fare, we would consider, for breakfast only.

Where the Laugh Comes in

The following table details some of the times at which a vaudeville audience regularly laughs:

When a comedian walks with a mincing step and speaks in a falsetto voice.

When a German comedian opens his coat and discloses a green waistcoat.

When a comedy acrobat falls down repeatedly.

When a performer asks the orchestra leader if he is a married man.

When a black-face comedian says something about chickens.

When a performer starts to rise from a chair and the drummer pulls a resined piece of cord so that the performer thinks his clothes have ripped.

When the drummer suddenly beats the drum during a comedian's song, and the latter stops and looks in his direction.

When a tramp comedian turns around and discloses a purple patch, or several pearl buttons, or a target sewed on the seat of his trousers.

When the funny member of a troupe of instrumentalists interrupts the progress of a melody by sounding a discordant note on his trombone.

When the clown of a team of acrobats poises himself to do a presumably difficult feat, and suddenly changes his mind and walks away without doing it

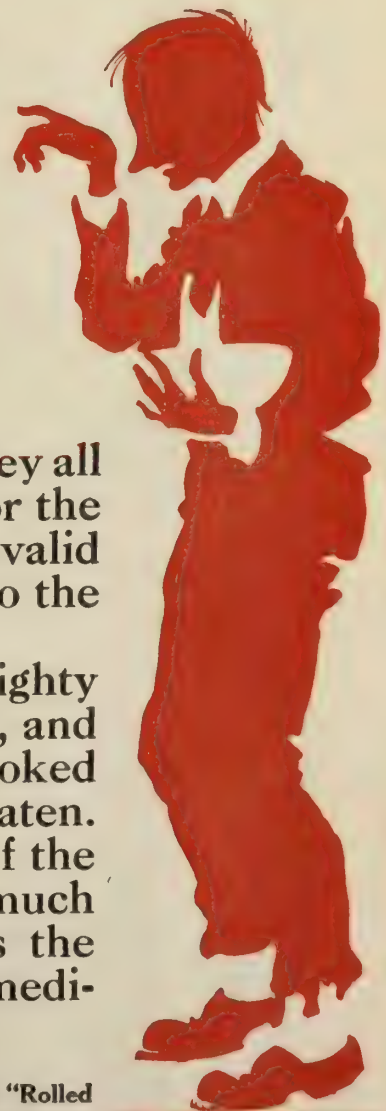
SAN FRANCISCO TOWN TALK

"I WANT SOME MORE!"



H-O oatmeal has created many Oliver Twists; they all "want more." It supplies a wholesome food for the growing boy and girl; it imparts strength to the invalid and the convalescent; and it gives nourishment to the old and feeble.

H-O is not ordinary Rolled Oats. There is a mighty difference between H-O steam-cooked oatmeal, and common raw Rolled Oats—which have to be cooked for at least sixteen hours before they are fit to be eaten. By our steam-cooking process, the edible part of the oat is directly acted on by dry steam, heated to a much higher degree than boiling water; this renders the starch soluble and provides a food ready for immediate digestion. An ideal food for everyone.

Do not confuse H-O oatmeal with the ordinary raw oats sold under the name of "Rolled Oats" or "Crushed Oats." H-O oatmeal is never sold in bulk; it is free from dirt, germs and all impurities.

H-O oatmeal is manufactured from the highest grade of selected stock. After removing all foreign matter, the meat of the oat is subjected to a very high temperature, and by our own patented process is cooked for several hours under heavy steam pressure. This steam-cooking dextrinizes the starch and renders the oats easily digestible.

H-O oatmeal is ready for the breakfast table after from ten to fifteen minutes' boiling and provides an inviting dish of sweet, clean, separate, tender kernels in place of the sticky, soggy, indigestible mass obtained in cooking the usual "Rolled Oats."

Possibly the "other" kind may be cheaper; but as soon as you have tested and appreciated the quality of H-O oatmeal, you will gladly pay the few cents difference.

The Insurgent Victory

That was a curious drama that was enacted in Washington last week. A crisis threatened, the sky lowered, the earth trembled, and then when suspense was at its highest point, when everybody was filled with expectation, the whole thing fizzled out. For lo! these many months the insurgents have been going up and down the land raging against "Uncle Joe" Cannon, the grand old man of the Republican party; they have been besmearing him with vituperation and affirming that nothing could soothe their patriotic souls save his removal from the Speakership and his banishment to private life; we were told that his influence was evil, that he incarnated the Satanic "interests" and opposed everything that honest and progressive legislators stood for; yet when it came to a crucial point at which his enemies could have easily vindicated their sincerity their passion subsided and they contented themselves with a measly compromise. Now as a consequence of the pyrotechnic display at Washington the people have glimpsed the truth; they have learned that the bitter execration to which Speaker Cannon has been subjected by venomous, self-seeking politicians is without justification; they have perceived that this old man was made the victim of wholesale abuse by soreheads who well understood that his performance of his duties was in accord with honored partisan policy and principle. It is clear not only that Speaker Cannon was upheld and approved by the majority of the representatives of his party but that to deprive him of the slightest vestige of his prerogative the insurgents did not scruple to desert their colors and enlist under the banner of Democracy. They have gained a victory that is not to be celebrated or psalmodied. They have triumphed not over Cannon but over a system which has been approved in our Federal legislature for nearly half a century, and which has been acknowledged to be essential to efficient workmanship on the part of the majority. Representing the dominant party in the Congress, the party that was made supreme by the voice of the people, the insurgents for no other purpose than that of obstruction entered upon a coalition which cannot be regarded as anything else but a species of treachery. The fact is that the Democrats joined the insurgents for no other purpose than to effect the disruption of the Republican party. There has been no dissembling on the part of the Democrats. As soon as the fight was over Champ Clark gave utterance to a note of exultation, exclaiming, "The Republicans are on the toboggan slide, and if Democrats outside of Congress will get together as the Democrats in the House have got together, our victories in this year and in 1912 will be as sweeping as those of 1890 and 1892." Champ Clark is no rainbow chaser. He is a veteran politician, an astute leader, and he is always working in the interest of his party. Doubtless, though he scorns the insurgents as renegades, he will always be ready to make use of them. But it may be questioned whether by the blow to Cannonism they have proved more serviceable to his party than to the regular Republicans. Developments may prove that it was a tactical blunder to bring the burning issue to a head. Great were the potentialities of Cannonism for crusading purposes. It was an excellent peg to hang glittering generalities upon. As a postulate for noisy indignation, a pretext for heartfelt emotion it was hard to beat. But now as an issue it is no more. It has vanished in the smoke and thunder of parliamentary debate.

Taft and the Insurgents

From the sentiments expressed by President Taft in his St. Patrick's Day speech in Chicago it may be inferred that he is not in a mood to conciliate the insurgents or to recede from the position which he has assumed toward the politicians who have made it clear that they have resolved to rule or ruin the Republican organization. And obviously the course which he has resolved to take is the only one that he can follow with sincerity and with dignity. To attempt to compromise with the insurgents would be pusillanimous. President Taft cannot seek to satisfy them without being untrue to himself, without forswearing the principles of a lifetime, without throwing down the gauntlet that was taken up in the cause of verity and embracing what may be deemed expedient in preference to what his judgment tells him is right. Temperamentally President Taft can have no sympathy with politicians whose chief purpose is to flatter the prejudices of the multitude. Nor would it avail him anything to attempt to conciliate the insurgents. These Marplots and regenerators are not to be pacified. They do not conceive it to be to their interest to acquiesce in anything. Their aim is to keep themselves before the people as the champions of the people, and to do this they must always be dissatisfied. Nothing must be permitted to please their fastidious tastes. To keep their ill-humor and troublesome officiousness in constant exercise they must unremittingly abuse the government.

When Teddy Returns

The insurgents are looking forward with intense anxiety to the return of Theodore Roosevelt. It is in his power, as they are well aware, to justify their insurgency or convert their high hope into blank despair. They have constituted him the Apostle of the Gentiles. It is for him to determine whether orthodoxy demands circumcision or uncircumcision. Recognizing him as the darling oracle of their cult, for the true dogma they consult his epistles to the Congress, and from their interpretation of those mountains of words they have concluded that President Taft and all his disciples have wandered from the true faith. But it remains for Mr. Roosevelt to clarify the atmosphere that is now thick with confusion and doubt. It is far from being a foregone conclusion that the insurgents and the soreheads of the Tennis Cabinet and the muckrakers have construed Mr. Roosevelt literally and according to the spirit. Their gospel is yet to be pronounced canonical. Mr. Roosevelt may not be at all in sympathy with the sansculotism of the mob coddlers. When he returns to his native land and finds his party disrupted as a result of a pretended adherence to his policies; when he finds that Cleons of the La Follette type have been waging war against the man to whom he bequeathed his mantle; when after a comprehensive view of the turbulent situation he apprehends the spirit of revolt and perceives the inevitable consequences; when, we say, Mr. Roosevelt becomes cognizant of all that has happened in his absence and all that is likely to happen and to be imputed to his teachings and example, perhaps he will take occasion to utter himself in a manner far from favorable to the plans and policies of the enemies of the Administration. The fate of the insurgent cause is virtually in Mr. Roosevelt's hands.

The Coming Campaign

Meanwhile great preparations are being made for the Congressional fall election. The campaign is to be waged by the Republican organization along lines of strict regularity, and the plans that have been formed have received the approval of President Taft. All the literature to be prepared for circulation in the coming campaign and all the speeches delivered under the auspices of the organization will advocate straight Republican doctrine as distinguished from Democratic policies and principles advocated by the Republican insurgents in the Senate and in the House. In view of this arrangement the insurgents who opposed the tariff bill and who have denounced Cannonism can expect little help from the Republican Congressional Committee in their campaign for re-election. It is understood that the campaign will be the most vigorous ever waged by the Republicans. The battle ground will be in the Middle West, and an army of spellbinders will be sent into that section as soon as Congress adjourns and kept in action until the polls close in November. The Chautauqua circuit will not be neglected. From platforms where La Follette, Cummins and Dolliver have exhorted their followers to be true to Roosevelt and abominate swollen fortunes wherever they are to be found, regular Republicans will discuss the policies of the Administration in terms encomiastic and pray for loyalty to the man whose qualities of mind and heart were guaranteed by no less a prophet than Theodore Roosevelt. And all the while a stream of literature breathing old time Republican doctrine will pour its tide along from one end of the country to the other. There is a hot time in the offing.

Religion and Finance in France

The French character is distinguished particularly for economy and religious feeling. This statement may seem improbable to those for whom Paris with its show of riotous extravagance and its atheistic indifference to or active persecution of Christianity is the typical French city. Even setting aside the fact that the Paris which the tourist sees is not the real Paris of Frenchmen, it may still be proved that in many respects Paris is not the typical French city and that in the capitals of the French provinces the two distinguishing traits of which we have made mention flourish apace. Religious feeling, it is true, has been weakened by the tremendous assaults made upon it in the last generation of the Republic, but the French talent for economy has never ceased to be strongly in evidence. So much so is this the case that it has sometimes been said of certain classes in France that they are economical to the verge of avarice. Being economical in their private affairs Frenchmen demand economy of the men who are running their government and when they find that it has not been practiced, they are swift to punish. It was the extravagance of Marie Antoinette which precipitated the Revolution and at a later date it was the disclosure of the criminal extravagance of the directors of the Panama Canal operations which precipitated a crisis on account of which some men still living are incapacitated from returning to public life. France is today in the throes of another scandal similar to the De Lesseps affair and the national sense of economy is in revolt against the public officers who are responsible. The discovery that enormous peculations were committed by the liquidators of ecclesiastical property has burst upon the heads of the ministerial party like a bomb and there is not the least doubt that the French people will hold them severely to account for all the millions that have been stolen. It is a curious situation. The measures which made these great stealings possible were directed against the Catholic church, the church of the great majority of Frenchmen, and in carrying them out the national religious sense was outraged. In spite of that the irreligious party has managed to maintain its supremacy up to the present time and now it seems surely toppling to a fall. The outrage to religion was stomached, but the outrage to the ingrained sense of economy of the French people will not be borne in patience. Acute observers see in the situation now unfolding the possibility, not only of a return to strict honesty of expenditure in French government, but also to that dogmatic morality of Catholicism which the French have passively seen deprived of its official sanction. It is a curiously knit pattern, the French character, and it would be surprising but not inexplicable if the exposure of peculation should lead the nation as a nation back to religion. In what other country would one look for a causal relation between finance and dogma?

The Superwoman in Court

How familiar are the sentiments that are expressed nowadays by women to whom wedlock has proved distasteful! How easy to trace the source of their inspiration. Take for example these sentiments taken from the records of one of our Superior Courts: "Marriage should be like street cars—a system of transfers"; "The only justification for marriage in these modern days is the ease with which it is possible for a woman to get rid of a man if she wants to." Neat paraphrases, these, of the Barnum of contemporary English literature, Mr. George Bernard Shaw. It has been said that a little learning is a dangerous thing; and of this aphorism illustrations are of common occurrence in our divorce courts which are kept busy by women who are addicted to the current fashion of absorbing mental polish from the works of the half-baked disciples of Friedrich Nietzsche. women these days the appetite for culturine is insatiable, and the brand of mental pabulum most grateful to them is that which comes directly or indirectly from the morbid apostle of Zarathustra or the crazy author of "Marriage of Heaven and Hell." Now this is a most deplorable tendency on the part of the "terrestrial planets that rule the destinies of mankind." It is not to disparage them to say that their minds are not so constituted as to enable them to apprehend the intricacies of metaphysical discussion. Women have imagination, enthusiasm and intuition, qualities that do not aid in the unfolding of a didactic process, but they have not the faculty of combining a multitude of facts, ideas and arguments into complex unity. They should be fed, therefore, with what St. Paul terms the sincere milk of the word rather than with doubtful disputations. Yet today we find the most nimble minded of them feasting on the shallow emanations of the Nietzsche school, accepting passionate affirmations as solemn truths, plausible aphorisms as the final words on the science of life. This school is doing incalculable harm in the world by the dissemination of such glittering epigrams as these:

The secret of joyful life is to live dangerously

Everything that suffereth wanteth to live in order to become ripe and gay and longing.

In order that a sanctuary may be created a sanctuary must be broken down.

Only where there are graves there are resurrections.

As long as genius dwells within us we are bold; nay, reckless of life, health and honor.

If anything in me is virtue it is that I had no fear in the presence of any prohibition.

Myself I sacrifice unto my love—and my neighbor as myself.

The foregoing are samples of the philosophy of a man whose disciples proudly pronounce him the greatest immoralist the world has seen, a man who attacked the foundations of Christian morality chiefly by means of epigrams. Friedrich Nietzsche set his whole mind on the task of destroying morality root and branch. He was not only immoral—he aimed at being unmoral. The Superman was his ideal, and today the world is full of culturines who believe that to vindicate their superwomanhood they must stifle their maternal instincts, cultivate an hallucinatory delirium and marry on the transfer plan.

We Never Know

Love may be joy unspeakable, and love
May be a woe too deep for moans and tears;
Love may be chrism of blessing poured above
The quiet days of uneventful years,
And love may sometimes be, just patience, spent
In trying how to find and keep content.

—Margaret Sangster.

Perspective Impressions

Mayor McCarthy's new broom is a durable instrument.

Fragrant blossoms proclaim the birth of spring. Now let us hear from the poets.

The insurgents apparently are in doubt as to whether they are to go down in history as vanquishers or vanquished.

President Wheeler confesses that he learned nothing abroad that can be applied to the advantage of the State University. It appears that in lieu of ideas he brought back an autographed photograph of the Kaiser. So his cup of bliss is full to the brim.

Some people will never be able to learn that there are tyrannies of nature that even moral societies with auxiliary female attachment cannot overthrow.

The Mad Mullah is again off the reservation and dancing. But there is compensation in the unprecedented tranquillity of Mr. Roosevelt.

Even the records of the divorce courts indicate that this is a day of specialists, for we learn therefrom that oftentimes when a married man is preoccupied with making a living some unmarried man is absorbed in the task of keeping a wife amused.

The Last Days of Oscar Wilde

After More Than Nine Years During Which all Sorts of Fables Have Been Invented, the Poet's Truest Friend and Literary Executor Makes Public an Authoritative Account of the End in Paris.

By Robert Ross

On Tuesday, October 9, 1900, I wrote to Oscar from whom I had not heard for a considerable length of time, that I would come to Paris on October 18 for a few days, and that I hoped to see him there. On Thursday, October 11, I received the following telegram from him: "I was operated on yesterday—come as soon as possible." I telegraphed to him, inquiring after his health. In reply came a telegram from him saying: "Terrible weak—please come." I left for Paris on Tuesday evening, October 16. On Wednesday morning at about half-past ten I went up to see him. He was in a good mood, though he assured us that he was suffering dreadfully; he laughed at the same time quite heartily, and related some stories at the expense of his physicians as well as at his own expense. I remained with him until half-past twelve, and then I came back at half-past four, and Oscar started to talk again of his troubles with Frank Harris. I visited Oscar every day until my departure from Paris. Reggie and I had dinner or supper sometimes in his bedroom. Oscar was always talkative, even when he appeared to be very sick. On October 25 my brother Alex came to him, and Oscar felt particularly well on that day. His sister-in-law, the wife of his brother Willie, and her husband, Teixeira, were at the time in Paris on their honeymoon, and visited him. On October 29 Oscar got up to dinner, and after supper he insisted upon going out. He assured me that his physician allowed him to go out, and he would not be dissuaded. We went to a small cafe in the Quartier Latin, where he insisted on drinking absinthe. He walked there and back, with some difficulty, though he appeared to be well. But it seemed to me as though his face had suddenly grown older, and on the following day I pointed out to Reggie how his appearance had changed when he got up and dressed. In bed he looked comparatively well. I noticed for the first time that his hair was beginning to tinge with gray. I had observed that the color of his hair had never changed; while he was in Reading his hair retained its soft, brown gloss. You must remember the joke he used to tell about this; he used to amuse his wardens by telling them that his hair was entirely white. On the next day I was not surprised when I heard that he had caught cold and was suffering from a painful earache. Dr. Tucker said, nevertheless, that he could go out again, and on the following afternoon—it was a very mild day—we went to Bois. Oscar felt much better, but he complained of dizziness. At half-past four we returned. On Sunday morning I met Dr. Tucker. He is a simple, kind, splendid man. His opinion was that Oscar should write more, that he was feeling much better, that his condition would become serious in the event of his going about and loafing too much. I begged him to hide nothing from me. He promised to ask Oscar whether he could speak to me frankly about his health. We agreed to meet on the following Tuesday. When I came up to Oscar later in the day, I found him in a very agitated state of mind. He said that he did not care to know what the doctor had told me, that it was immaterial to him whether he had but a short time to live, and then he began to speak of his debts, which, I believe, amounted to a little more than four hundred pounds. He asked me to take care that a portion of them be paid after his death if I should be in a position to do it; some of his creditors caused him pangs of conscience. Shortly after this Reggie came in. Oscar told us that he had a terrible dream the night before—he had feasted with the dead. Reggie gave him an adequate answer: "My dear Oscar, you must have brought life into that company." He was delighted with this; he was once more in a happy mood and became almost hysterical. On November 2—All Souls' Day—I went to Pere Lachaise; Oscar took a great interest in this, and asked me whether I had found a burial place for him; he talked to me lightly about epitaphs, and I never dreamed at that time that he was so very near death. On Monday, November 12, I went with Reggie to Hotel d'Alsace for the purpose of bidding him farewell, as I wanted to go to the Riviera on the following day. It was late in the evening, after supper. Oscar started to speak about his financial straits. He had just received a letter from Harris about Smithers' claims, and he was very much agitated. It seemed to me that he spoke with some difficulty, but he had taken morphine during the previous night, and he drank too much champagne in the course of the day. He knew that I had come to bid him farewell, but he seemed to pay little attention when I entered the room, which made upon me a strange impression at the time. He directed all his remarks to Reggie. While we were chatting the post brought a neat letter from Alfred Douglas, containing a check. Oscar cried a little, but mastered himself shortly. Then we all conversed in a friendly manner; Oscar walked up and down the room, declaiming excitedly. At about half-past ten I rose, and was about to leave. Suddenly Oscar asked the attendant and Reggie to leave the room for a while, as he wished to bid me good-by. He wandered off at first and spoke of his debts in Paris, then he implored me not to go away, for he felt that a great change would come within a few days. I assumed a rather strict attitude, as I really thought that Oscar was simply hysterical, although I suspected that he took my departure to heart. Suddenly he burst out sobbing, and said that he would never see me again, for he felt that it was all over. This painful incident lasted three-quarters of an hour. He spoke of different things which I can hardly repeat.

Although it was heartrending, I did not yield to the excitement of poor Oscar, as I should have done, especially after he said, while I was about to leave the room: "Look up a small place in the mountain near Nice, where I could come when things improve with me, and where you could visit me frequently." These were the last intelligible words he addressed to me. Next evening (November 13) I left for Nice.

During my absence Reggie visited Oscar every day and sent me brief reports every other day. Oscar went out with him several times, and it seemed that he was feeling better. In a letter, dated November 26, 1900, Reginald Turner wrote to me, saying, among other things: "The physicians at the consultation yesterday held out very little hope for Oscar; he does not know of anything that you can do; he does not know that you are not in Paris. As for Oscar, he does not know anything that is said about him. He takes no notice of anything; he is dreaming and sleeping. This is partly the result of the morphine that was injected into him. But he must have no more of it, so the physicians make believe that they are giving him injections of morphine. He greeted me heartily today, and was glad at my coming. We had a talk during one of his clear moments; then he sank back into a state of dimness, and as he spoke he seemed to be in a delirium."

This is part of a letter written to me on November 27: "Today he asked for paraffin—finally we learned that he

A Russian Woman's Living Martyrdom

At the Age of Sixty-seven Madame Catherine Breshkovskaya, a Woman of High Birth, Has Been Sentenced to Fourteen Years' Exile in Siberia Where She Has Already Spent Eighteen Years, Part of the Time at Hard Labor in the Silver Mines

By Robert McTavish

Somebody has said that "the Russians know how to die but do not know how to live" and the phrase has been caught up, as catch-phrases usually are, and repeated so frequently that many people have come to believe it. For these unthinking people the heroic career of Madame Catherine Breshkovskaya should be an inspiring study, for it shows the manner in which many Russians of the present day are living in the cause of emancipation from Russian autocratic rule. The career of Madame Catherine Breshkovskaya will, in all human probability, come to an early close, for she has just been sentenced in St. Petersburg to fourteen years of exile in Siberia and at the age of sixty-seven a woman, no matter how inured to hardship, no matter how brave she may be, cannot be expected to last long in the terrible country to which she has just been consigned. Her career has certainly been one of unusual bravery and unusual hardships, else there would not be such inspiration for her countrymen in these words of hers: "We may die in exile, and our children may die in exile, and our children's children may die in exile, but something will come of it at last."

One of the founders of the Socialist Revolutionary party, the Russians have come to know her lovingly as "the babushka" or grandma and her work is so highly regarded by disinterested lovers of liberty outside of her native land that when she was at last brought to trial after languishing for more than two years in the Fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, prominent and influential men and women in England and the United States appealed to Premier Stolypin for fairness and justice in her judges. Whether their appeals were heeded who shall say? She was tried behind closed doors, a most unusual proceeding, and convicted of belonging to "an illegal party."

Madame Breshkovskaya was born in one of the provinces of Little Russia, the daughter of a noble who possessed a large estate and several hundred serfs. In her early years she knew the luxury and gayety of which the Russian nobility is so inordinately fond. She was educated in the women's colleges of her own country and at Zurich in Switzerland, became an accomplished musician and mastered French, German and English. From the tender age of eight she began to take an interest in the lives of the unfortunates who were bound to the soil of her father's estate and what she saw at that time determined the course of her future life.

"They worked everywhere and always," she has declared. "They were scolded, they were whipped, they were exiled to Siberia, at the whim of their master, for the least fault. Their wives and daughters were taken to serve the master or his sons as mistresses; their children were carried off without their consent, to be trained as servants or to serve in the house. The men would come to the master begging bread for which their families were famishing; the women would come weeping, demanding their children of whom they had been robbed. How many times, stupefied and shocked, I have been the witness of such humiliating, degrading, excruciating things. How many times I have thrown myself at the feet of my father to implore pardon for a so-called guilty person, whose sole fault perhaps consisted in having fallen asleep while herding the sheep!"

The girl's father was a judge of the Court of Arbitration, the special task of which is to settle disputes between the peasants and the nobility, so she had unusual opportunities for studying the misery of the serfs. Being of a kindly disposition and having received an education which taught her piety and self-denial, she made many sacrifices in those early years in order to alleviate distress. When she was eighteen the serfs were emancipated and she made a study of the new laws. Traveling about with her father she witnessed the uprisings which took place when the illiterate peasants sought to protest against the new hard conditions and she likewise saw these uprisings put down by the bayonets and knouts of the soldiers. Madame Breshkovskaya perceived that education was necessary for the improvement of the peasant conditions, so she devoted herself to the village schools. The education movement was watched by the government with jealous eyes and the schools for the poor were gradually closed. This was about 1870 when Madame Breshkovskaya had made the acquaintance of innumerable men and women who were attempting the same work as herself in other parts of the Empire. Two thousand of these patriots resolved to defie the government by persisting in their efforts. "We resolved," she has explained, "to go right to the people and tell them the whole truth. It was one of the finest movements in the history of the country. The most elevated among her children flung themselves into the arms of the people to share with them their own moral and intellectual riches." As a result they were all arrested on charges of treason. The news was received with an outburst of indignation throughout Europe and the majority were set free, but a few hundred, including Madame Breshkovskaya, were held for trial. More than a hundred died miserably in prison and the rest were exiled to Siberia. Madame Breshkovskaya was regarded as particularly dangerous, and after two years in a St. Petersburg cell 5x7x9 feet in size, she was condemned to hard labor in the Kara silver mines, being the first woman to undergo this punishment. After a few months at the mines she was restored to comparative liberty in an exile colony on Lake Baikal. With four other exiles she made an audacious attempt to escape, was captured and sentenced to four more years in the mines. In 1882 she was released from the mines, but she still had fourteen years of exile to endure. These long years were spent in the Transbaikal region of Eastern Siberia where George Kennan met her and thus described her: "With a strong, intelligent, but not handsome face, a frank, unreserved manner, and sympathies that seemed to be warm, impulsive and generous. Her face bore traces of much suffering, and her thick dark wavy hair, which had been cut short in prison in the mines, was streaked here and there with gray; but neither hardship, nor exile, nor penal servitude had been able to break her brave, finely tempered spirit, or to shake her convictions of honor or duty."

In 1896 her exile ended and she returned to her home. Her mother and father were dead, her old friends dead, scattered or estranged. She plunged again into her lifework and helped to organize the Socialist Revolutionary party which soon had its circles in every part of Russia. Underground printing offices were set up, radical literature was distributed broadcast and "the babushka" traveled everywhere, studying conditions and exhorting the peasants to hope for better days. That work of course is still going on. In 1899 one of the printing stations was discovered and the government took particular pains to shadow Madame Breshkovskaya. She merely adopted a peasant disguise and continued her work. When the government issued a proclamation ordering her arrest she escaped into Switzerland. In 1904 she came to this country and one who met her wrote: "To look upon the face of this silver-haired apostle is like receiving a benediction. Her outward and inward calm are superb. Her hands are beautiful in their delicacy, despite the years in Siberia. Her voice is low and sweet, her smile winning and childlike. Only her eyes betray the sufferings of the years. In repose her face is strong like iron. The shadows of her eyes speak of deepest pathos."

Afterwards she returned to Russia and continued her work until August, 1907, when she was betrayed by the spy Azeff. For more than two years the government did not dare to try her, but at last they invented the charge of "belonging to an illegal party" and as a result, "the Babushka" is now on her way to Siberia once more. Who will say that a Russian does not know how to live as well as how to die?

Ilya and the Nightingales

A Russian Folk-Story

It was Easter morn, and strong young Ilya of Murom, the son of the peasant Ivan, stood with many, praying in the great church. And amongst Ilya's solemn Easter vows were these: First that he would sing at the High Mass that same Easter day in Royal Kiev; second, that he would go to Royal Kiev by the straight road. And then Ilya vowed besides that on the way he would stain neither hand nor sword with wretched Tatar blood; nor would he shoot a single fiery dart before he got to Kiev. So he hastened from the great church and saddled his rough bay horse, the staunch, good Clouddrop, and decked him richly and gaily to ride to the worshipful feasts of Royal Kiev, where the Fair Red Sun Prince Vladimir so gladly kept his Easter. All Murom came forth to watch Ilya depart. But as soon as he mounted the good Clouddrop, he was gone beyond sight. His flight was like a wraith of thin fine snow driven along the steppe by the whirling winter wind. Staunch good Clouddrop swimmed over steppe and plain; the brave horse jumped from mountain to mountain; and sprang lustily from one hill to another. And when they paused, rider and horse—young Ilya hewed a forest to the ground, and he raised a sacred cross, and on it he left the words, written clear and bold: Ilya of Murom, the Kazak, rides to Royal Kiev on a hero's quest.

It was after this that Ilya met a vast swarm of Tatars, so vast that the hare might not course, nor the falcon fly round about them; and the steam from their horses' flanks rose up so dense, that it hid the brightness of sun and of moon. Ilya bethought him of his Easter vows. "Every man may take an oath," he said, "but how indeed shall he always keep it?" With that he bent quickly in his saddle, and pulled up a sturdy oak tree from the damp earth; and as he rode through the horde of forty thousand wretched Tatars, he waved the great tree and swung it with all his might. The Tatars fell like a field of sickled corn, and Clouddrop trampled them down, and not one was left to continue their breed. This happened on the way, outside the city of Chernigov. When the merchants and soldier-maidens and heroes of this city saw the deed of Ilya, they besought and prayed him to be their Tsar, their King, or at any rate their general.

"I have well earned my rights, I know," said Ilya of Murom, "yet I want them not. I leave you as you were. Show me only the straight road to Royal Kiev."

"The straight road," answered the merchants, "is but five hundred versts, and the way round a full thousand; it is wiser though to journey by the way round. In the straight road lie the barriers of the lofty mountains and the wide river Smorodina, with its black dogs, and there too Nightingale the robber, the Wizard Bird, has his nest built upon seven spreading oaks. When Nightingale whistles, the forest is bowed down, leaves and grass wither, and horses and riders shrink and die at the blast. Therefore, young Ilya of Murom, go not by this straight road."

Now this was the very way that Ilya chose. Clouddrop scaled the lofty mountains, and soared like a hawk over the tall, dreaming forests, and at the river Smorodina the staunch good beast cleared it with the swiftest bound. But when Nightingale the robber, the Wizard Bird, thrust his iron beak from the great seven-oaked nest and whistled and hissed, at last Clouddrop was daunted and fell trembling and quivering on his knees.

"Grass-bag, food for a wolf," jeered Ilya, "hast never yet heard the pipe of a nightingale, nor the hiss of a snake?" At this Clouddrop rose sharp and staggered to his four feet, and Ilya fondled the staunch good horse. Then he bethought him of his other vow, that he would shoot no fiery dart before he reached Royal Kiev. So he quickly plucked a twig from a near-by willow, and fitting it in his bow he shot it straight at Robber Nightingale's left eye. Down fell the Wizard Bird to the damp earth, like a heap of winnowed grain. Ilya joyously fastened him by the beak to his stirrup, and quietly rode on till he came to the robber's court, planted round about with green gardens and fair orchards, all gay with blossom and bloom.

"Ai! ai! Lady Mother. Look, look!" cried the children, "our father brings us a man and a horse to peck at and devour."

"Nay," said Elena, Nightingale's witch daughter, "it's strong young Ilya of Murom, and he it is who has our father fast."

Nightingale's children swelled and shook with rage at their sister's words. "Let us turn ourselves to ravens," they shrieked and crowed, "and tear this peasant with our iron beaks, and throw the pieces of his soft white body to rot in river and bog."

"Nightingale robber," shouted young Ilya, "shouldst thou offer me the whole wide world's full measure of riches I would not set thee free, bad old rascal and thief that thou art. But to Royal Kiev come thou, and there, mayhap, in the city of the Fair Red Sun Vladimir, shalt thou find pardon for thy sins this glad Eastertide. At least, if true penitence and sorrow be thine."

Staunch Clouddrop pranced gaily, and the Wizard Bird at Ilya's stirrup had to dance and hop along nimly whether he would or no; and thus they rode into Royal Kiev. Prince Vladimir, with his generals, was already in God's church at the high Easter Mass. So Clouddrop was left to guard Nightingale in the fair prince's courtyard while Ilya hastened to the church. When Mass was over, Prince Vladimer kindly bade the young stranger to his worshipful feast, and asked whence he came and who he might well be.

"I am only the son of peasants," replied Ilya. "This morn I stood in Murom church, and early Mass was just ended when I started hither by the straight road." At this the heroes round the royal board and the Fair Red Sun Vladimir himself all looked amiss.

"What is this bragging and lying on Easter day?" asked Vladimir. "By the straight road no man has ventured here for a whole long lifetime. For there are the

Devlin and His Nemesis

Somewhat remarkable is the situation that United States District Attorney "Bob" Devlin finds himself in as a result of the conscientious performance of his duties and the untiring vindictiveness of Dr. Perrin of land fraud notoriety. Devlin served as district attorney under the Roosevelt Administration, and he was reappointed by President Taft, but his confirmation has been hanging fire for months. He is eager to resign from the office in order to take up private practice, but naturally he is averse to resigning while the matter of his confirmation is pending. Dr. Perrin is responsible for the complications that have arisen. Dr. Perrin is a Southern gentleman, the scion of an old Southern family, and he has worked his Southern pull in Washington with the skill of a subtle strategist. Posing in Washington as the victim of a conspiracy that was inspired by President Roosevelt and executed by Detective Burns and Attorney Devlin, his plausibility is surpassed only by his impudence. That he is not in jail instead of in Washington is due entirely to the influence of his kind friends; for though he was found guilty of a land fraud perpetrated with the assistance of the notorious land grabber, Benson, he is at liberty as a result of executive clemency and not by virtue of judicial process. His innocence has never been established. Indeed there is no question of his participation in the crime for which Benson, his accomplice, is now paying the penalty. It was a pretty tough crime, too, and yet Dr. Perrin can say nothing in his own behalf except that he was ignorant of the law. This he says, though it is a severe tax on credulity to insist that any man should believe that another could have been half so ignorant as Dr. Perrin must have been were he innocent of intentional wrongdoing when he collaborated with Benson.

The Winning of Borah

As soon as Dr. Perrin escaped from the clutches of the law through the back door, instead of going into executive session with himself and salving his wounds in seclusion he took himself to Washington to lobby against the confirmation of the man who obtained his conviction at the hands of a jury of his peers. On his arrival there he met with a cordial reception from Senator Borah; for that gentleman had been maliciously prosecuted for land frauds, and when Perrin represented himself as a martyr to perverted official zeal he at once enlisted the sympathy of the outraged statesman. According to Perrin his prosecution was conducted for the glorification of the Roosevelt Administration. He said that Detective Burns procured his indictment by telling the grand jury that Mr. Roosevelt wanted him indicted. It is said that certain grand jurors have made affidavit to that effect. Furthermore it is said that Devlin failed to instruct the grand jurors that they should disregard the wishes of the President. Now the fact is that Devlin never heard anything about the remark attributed to Burns until after Perrin went to Washington. Devlin took no part in the prosecution of Perrin until the case came to trial. He had intended to let one of his assistants conduct the trial, but one day Mr. Ballinger, now Secretary of the Interior, came to him with a letter which he had received from Secretary Garfield with reference to the Perrin case. In this letter Garfield complained that Devlin was not giving his personal attention to the Perrin case. He said that as it was an important case it should be personally conducted by the District Attorney. So Devlin got busy. But he treated Perrin with the utmost fairness and even showed him considerable courtesy.

His Prosecution of Gardener

Senator Borah is not the only statesman whose sympathies have been enlisted by Dr. Perrin. Several representatives of the South, among them Senator Tillman, have opposed Devlin's confirmation. These gentlemen, it is said, have been prejudiced against Devlin by the report that he exhibited more zeal than was necessary in the prosecution of a young sailor named Gardener from Kentucky, who was charged with the murder of a negro. Now this is misrepresentation of the grossest kind. As Gardener comes from a distinguished Kentucky family Southern people took a deep interest in his case. They attended the trial, and without a dissenting voice it was agreed that Devlin did nothing more than his duty. The fact is, however, that he did much more than the average prosecuting officer would do, for he employed the machinery of the Federal government to compel the presence of a witness for the defense whom the defense had no power to reach. This, however, was but characteristic of Devlin. He conceives it to be the duty of a prosecuting officer to see that every man gets a fair trial and that no man shall be at a disadvantage. Gardener was acquitted chiefly for the reason that sentiment played a prominent part in the trial. The point was harped upon that the defendant was raised in the South and that he did nothing more than resent the insult of a negro. It has since been learned that the dead man was not a negro, that there was no negro blood in his veins, that as a matter of fact he was a Portuguese. Devlin's friends are of the opinion that Gardener's friends owe him a debt of gratitude, not because he lost the case, but because by his conscientious conduct he made it possible for special counsel from Kentucky to win. And they think it rather queer that the section of the country which boasts of its chivalry should suffer itself to be imposed upon by such a man as Perrin, and by him persuaded to be unjust to a man of the character of "Bob" Devlin.

Cudahy's Victim

Now that the public knows just what happened, or rather, just what didn't happen, to Mrs. "Jack" Cudahy's bosom friend, the scandal that at first blush appeared to have some of the elements of a cause celebre has been reduced to the level of the commonplace. The first sensational story that came over the wires wherein Cudahy was pictured in the act of converting his home into a shambles and thus exemplifying the call of the butcher's block, was altogether too sketchy and impressionistic to satisfy the popular taste for frank realism. So the Associated Press was called upon for more details. Readers of the dailies were clamoring for solid information and protesting against equivocation. Nothing vague or provocative of speculation would satisfy them. Their curiosity was not to be assuaged with hints and innuendoes. So the Associated Press called for more complete reports. And they came: "Lillis was convalescing; his wounds were healing; he would be around in a few days; nothing of a serious nature the matter with him, et cetera." But the readers of the dailies were not satisfied. They clamored for the naked truth, and finally after several attempts to enable them to see through a glass darkly, the burning question was plainly answered by a correspondent who was permitted to examine the wounded banker from head to toes. From his report it is clear enough that Lillis is far from being in a state of innocuous desuetude.

Some Impromptu Verses

Dashing off verses on the spur of the moment was one night last week the pastime of some golf enthusiasts between dances at the home of a prominent railroad official. One charming young matron made a hit with these lines:

A novice played, but his stroke was wild,
And he almost murdered a caddy child;
Though his play was slow and his look was mild,
And he tried to loft with his cleek, O.

From the pen of a club wit quickly issued the follow-in parody:

A novice played, but his stroke was wild,
And he smashed a maid where she wasn't tiled;
Though his play was slow, and his look was wild,
And she hasn't sat down for a week, O.

A Bit of Legal English

Having quite a wide acquaintance among all sorts of lawyers I have sometimes been constrained to speculate as to the amount of general education which it is necessary to possess in order to gain admission to the bar. There are any number of men practicing in this city who either did not have the benefit of a primary education or else passed through that ordeal unscathed by even the rudiments of knowledge. Wherefore these remarks at this time? For no other reason than that I have been examining casually a brief submitted to the Supreme Court of our State by Attorney J. Marion Brooks of Los Angeles. Mr. Brooks may be a good lawyer—as to that I have absolutely no information; but when it comes to defiling the well of English, I'll match this Angelic barrister against all comers north or south of the Tehachapi. Here is the sentence in the brief of Mr. Brooks which makes me so cocksure in the issuance of a challenge: "That the said improvements if made, was made at an instant of a tenant of this defendant or alleged tenant who as defendant alleges on information and belief of the fact to be that the said tenant when causing said improvements to be made, if said improvements were made and caused by her to be made, was laboring on a dillusion or insane and aberration, which the said plaintiff well knew that said work was unnecessary—." I think I have quoted enough.

Also a Little Editorial English

While Mr. Brooks of Los Angeles put himself outside the pale by his assault and battery upon venerable Gould Brown, the editorial writer of the Oakland Enquirer has been indulging in a literary flight which has carried him way beyond the rules of rhetoric. I do not know whether Mr. Dennison or Doctor Pardee is the person guilty of this latter offense; probably the medico, as the sentence smacks of his exuberant manner. "His ambition to become State senator," says the Enquirer writer, in an editorial telling why Frank Leavitt and not Edward J. Tyrrell should be sent to the State senate, "is one to be commended, but he should win his spurs in minor official capacities before he essays the turbulent waters of State politics with his inexperienced hand at the helm of his untried ship." This thing of embarking a man on turbulen.t waters with a pair of spurs is rather a mystifying proceeding, unless it is expected that he will use them in the cockpit or in subduing salt horse.

Henry Larsen's Violin

Henry Larsen, the violinist who died in Santa Monica last week, was at one time the best known musician in this city. He made his debut in old Platt's Hall at the age of fifteen and was acclaimed an infant prodigy. Senator Stanford sent him abroad for study, but his subsequent career in this city was checkered by misfortune and he joined that curious band of derelicts at the old City Hall known as professional jurymen. Larsen had a Stradivarius violin which once played a queer part in the jury room. The story is told by Porter Ashe. It was the case of Private Kelly who was on trial for murdering another soldier in the Presidio. Walter Hinkle, of district attorney Barnes' force, was the prosecutor, while Lieutenant Runcey and Porter Ashe defended Kelly. It was a case of circumstantial evidence and the contest before Judge Hunt was long and bitter. The jury had been out for several hours when, at one o'clock in the morning, the anxious attorneys heard weirdly beautiful sounds that seemed to come from the juryroom. Strange ghostly echoes floated down the bare dreary corridor of the City Hall, producing an effect upon the lawyers which they could not describe. Hastening toward the juryroom, the sounds became more distinct and they knew that somebody was playing a violin. It was Henry Larsen playing "I Dreamt I Dwelt in Marble Halls" on his Stradivarius. Just then the bailiff appeared to announce that the jury had reached an agreement. "They've convicted Kelly," guessed Ashe. "No, they've acquitted him," replied Runcey; "no man could be cold-blooded enough to play that music after voting to convict." And Runcey was right.

He—I shall.

The Calumination of Johnson

It is hard to believe the news from Santa Rosa where Dr. Willard P. Burke, a physician of evil repute, is fighting for his liberty. According to a press despatch of Tuesday, the Hon. Hiram Johnson who enjoys the distinction of being the doctor's attorney sought to have the indictments against his client dismissed on the ground that two members of the grand jury were not on the last assessment roll. This report I have not the slightest hesitation in pronouncing on behalf of the more than honorable Mr. Johnson a vicious, unmitigated campaign lie. There need be no inquiry into this matter. Mr. Johnson's record as a militant reformer at something inspiring per diem, as an exceptionally high toned representative of the bar, (the Dolbeer case to the contrary notwithstanding) in itself serves for the purpose of complete refutation of this ugly and flagitious slander. Mr. Johnson's exalted ethical principles are too well known to need exploitation here for the purpose of vindicating his hatred of such a practice as has been imputed to him. Everybody knows of the high ground that he occupied during the graft prosecution when certain conscienceless members of his profession had the effrontery to attack the validity of certain indictments against certain depraved higher-ups. Mr. Johnson, his mind basking in Virtue's beams far above the mists and storms of earth, viewed with scorn the efforts of professional rogues to defeat the ends of justice by means of petty, miserable technicalities. Now is it not a challenge to common sense to ask us to believe that this upright attorney, whose rectitude is an evergreen that defies Temptation's blasts would condescend to meet a moral issue in the manner set forth in the press despatches? He is represented as doing something even more reprehensible than the things that excited his honest indignation during the graft prosecution. He is represented as pleading for the dismissal of indictments not on the ground that a whole grand jury was an illegal body or that its deliberations were directed by a hired private prosecutor masked as a public official, but on the ground that two of its members were not on the assessment roll. Surely Mr. Johnson's political interests are not to be impaired by so transparent a calumny. Nevertheless the Lincoln-Roosevelt League should get busy and warn the voters of the State against the conspirators who would have us believe that the candidate of the only virtuous political body in California has some of the instincts of the pettifogger, some of the characteristics of the chameleon.

An Auto-Portrait

Like all great men, like all divinely commissioned prophets, Mr. Johnson is a man of sublime modesty. He hates to speak of himself, but when occasion demands that he take the public into his confidence he does so with charming naivete. Where inherent diffidence and the scruples of a sensitive soul restrain, the overpowering sense of duty to mankind interposes and triumphs. As for instance, at Los Angeles last week, when Mr. Johnson was seized with the impulse to impress an authentic picture of himself on the hearts of his hearers. This is the job that he turned out:

> One day, as I was sitting on the porch of my modest little San Francisco home, looking out over our magnificent bay and thinking of the overtures which had been made to me, like a flash the situation became clear, and I said to myself, By the God above, this is my State and my children's State and no Southern Pacific machine—no Herrin—is going to own or control that State, and, God willing, I am going to try and put a stop to this whole nefarious system.

What further proof does anybody require of the absolute sincerity of the man? Have not his words the true ring of the pee-pul's champion? Are they not the words of a man capable of the most sublime self-renunciation, of a man who stands at a telescopic distance above the dross and vanity of the world? Mr. Johnson compels our admiration. No man of commonplace temperament after posing as a vehement disinterested patriot and being exposed as a sordid reformer-for-revenue-only could pull off the stunt that Mr. Johnson pulled off at Los Angeles.

A Forbidding Prospect

Some disquieting rumors are afloat regarding the Lincoln-Roosevelt League's candidates and leaders in the southland of sunshine and moonshine. Some of them are said to have a past that will not bear inspection, and as a consequence the stainless hearted Johnson will have a load to bear beyond the capacity of even a man of his invincible rectitude. If all that I hear be true the League will find itself in a most embarrassing predicament before the campaign is far advanced. As the League has adopted the Decalogue for a platform

The Program in Umbrage

The leaders of the regular Republican organization are still sawing wood. Their choice for Governor has not yet been indicated. The only thing that appears to be quite certain is that they will not help to inflate the Curry boom. Whether they are eventually to bestow their affections on Mr. Alden Anderson is a question that politicians in some sections of the State have already apparently resolved on their own judgment. Some of these politicians have been reported to be devoted to Mr. Curry's interests, and for a time the report seemed to be well founded, but now they are expatiating on the merits of Alden Anderson. In several instances the men that have switched were formerly handling Curry's fight in their respective sections of the State. The supposition is they have concluded that they were laboring under a misapprehension regarding the program.

Aladdin in Los Angeles

One of the classic stories of the Northwest relates how an enthusiastic Seattle man who had been away from home for half a day met another who had been away for a whole day and told him: "Jim, the city is so improved that you won't recognize it when you get back." That is considered a good joke in the north, but it is no joke in the busy little town of Los Angeles. Los Angeles has been taking itself with monumental seriousness so long that nobody who lives there laughs at a paragraph like this which appeared in a Los Angeles weekly last week:

> Still slightly limping, but otherwise in perfect physical form, my stalwart friend, C. C. Desmond, is back from a six weeks' stay at Arrowhead Springs, whither he went with Mrs. Desmond to try the efficacy of the baths for an attack of rheumatism. Needless to say, he was amazed at the changes that have taken place, in his absence from the city. Buildings that he supposed were good for ten or fifteen years of life, when he left, have been razed to the ground or are in process of demolition, and in their stead are rising modern ten and twelve-story structures of down-to-date construction. "I throw up my hands," he confessed, in discussing the big improvements planned and under way in the few weeks of his retirement; "this is surely the city of manifest destiny."

Six weeks, of course, is a lengthy period for Los Angeles where men who came west in the nineties are called pioneers, but there must be architectural and engineering wizards down there who would make poor old Aladdin throw away his lamp and discharge the genie.

How to Spend Rockefeller's Money

When John D. Rockefeller announced that he would incorporate an institution to spend for the benefit of humanity the millions made in Standard Oil, the New York Tribune asked a number of prominent people in New York to contribute their ideas as to the best manner of disbursing the money. Every man and woman interviewed made answer, as might have been expected, according to his hobby and there were as many hobbies as there were persons interviewed. Among others three Californians were consulted, Gertrude Atherton, Edwin Markham and Herman Scheffauer. Mrs. Atherton supplied the most original scheme of all, nothing less than pensions for impecunious but gifted poets. "In England," she said, "they have a pension fund in connection with the Authors' Society, of which George Meredith was president, and to which all authors contribute, to help or provide for gifted literary folks who are having a hard time. The real poet is born and not made. When we find one of these rare souls in our midst struggling for existence, we should care for him and encourage his art in a way that would not appear to be charity." Edwin Markham, himself something of a poet, though by no means impecunious and not particularly gifted, immediately saw poetic visions of a reformed industrial system: "The wisest use of such gifts to the people would be to use them for the discovery of an industrial system that will make all such donations unnecessary in future years. Let there be a resolute investigation into the cause of poverty, so that charity may forever disappear from life. The people must finally reach a ground not dependent upon the benefactions of the great masters of finance. A society built on charity is built on the sand."

What Scheffauer Suggested

Herman Scheffauer is not only a poet but a very gifted one and he possesses that charming idealism without which a true poet could not bear this workaday world. So he deplored the fact that so many great gifts of money are used for purely utilitarian purposes.

He advocated the endowment of institutions that shall not merely further education, but also culture. "For instance," he said, "there is no magazine in the United States that maintains standards likely to foster a true native literature. What might not a proper periodical of high aims, made safe from the bondage of commercialism by endowment, do for the popular taste? Where is our Frederick Nobel? Where are the public or world honors that America bestows upon her great writers, thinkers and scientists? There are none, since art, culture and intellect have never yet been deemed of foremost importance in our nation. But the most splendid achievement of any nation must be summed up in its great men. Let a few millions be bestowed to foster the growth and development of these." That cry for an unbridled magazine will find a glad and sturdy echo when it goes moaning among the cliffs of wave-beaten Carmel-by-the-Sea. Down there are a group of seers and seeresses who have long had in mind just the project which Scheffauer has put into burning words. It irks those gentle souls to see their lucubrations published in magazines which also carry vulgar advertisements. Where is the Rockefeller who will make this dream come true?

Youthful Suicide in Russia

A friend who is traveling on the continent of Europe and who keeps me informed from time to time of interesting incidents significant in their bearing on manners and morals European, has just written to tell me of a most remarkable affair in St. Petersburg. The Countess Tipkevitch recently gave a children's ball and the youngsters of all the leading noble families were present. It was a very elaborate affair and was proceeding with great merriment when suddenly, above the music of a waltz, a scream was heard followed immediately by a revolver shot. It was found that in one of the corners of the ballroom a lad of fifteen belonging to the noble family of Barjatinsky had shot himself through the heart. The boy died immediately without throwing any more light on his shocking deed than was contained in the words: "I could not do otherwise." In the panic which followed a beautiful girl of fourteen, the Countess von Pahlen, swallowed a small pastille and in a few minutes she too was dead. The affair has created a tremendous sensation in St. Petersburg, but public curiosity as to the reason for the two suicides will not be satisfied. Whatever the families have discovered is being carefully withheld. My correspondent says that the suicide of young people of both sexes is every year becoming more frequent in Russia. These neurotic young moderns, brought up in the lap of luxury and in many instances free from any moral discipline seem to look upon life as an encumbrance and do not hesitate to rid themselves of it on the slightest provocation.

Our New Bank President

In financial circles it was felt that the expected happened when Mr. John S. Drum was elected to the presidency of the San Francisco Savings Union. Though a lawyer by profession and one of the leaders of the bar at the time he was prevailed upon to accept the position of vice-president of the bank he has proved himself peculiarly and exceptionally qualified for the executive work which he was called upon to perform. For many years, by reason of prudent management, the San Francisco Savings Union has been recognized as one of the most substantial of our financial institutions, but with the new blood that was infused into the concern with the acquisition of Mr. Drum its activity in monetary affairs became more pronounced. Its position among the financial institutions of the city is now of the foremost rank.

A Poem to Breshkovskaya

No doubt McTavish's article on Madame Catherine Breshkovskaya covers the ground very well, but McTavish is not a poet and there is an aspect of the "babushka's" personality which only a poet can do justice to. So I think that it may be well to quote here a recent poem written by Elsa Barker, one of the best singers of this country. Taken in connection with McTavish's article it makes very good reading:

Breshkovskaya

How narrow seems the round of ladies' lives
And ladies' duties in their smiling world,
The day this Titan woman, gray with years,
Goes out across the void to prove her soul!
Brief are the pains of motherhood, that end
In motherhood's long joy; but she has borne
The age-long travail of a cause that lies
Still-born at last on History's cold lap.
And yet she rests not; yet she will not drink
The cup of peace held to her parching lips
By smug Dishonor's hand. Nay, forth she fares,
Old and alone, on exile's rocky road—
That well-worn road with snows incarnadined
By blood drops from her feet long years agone
Mother of power, my soul goes out to you
As a strong swimmer goes to meet the sea
Upon whose vastness he is like a leaf.
What are the ends and purposes of song,
Save as a bugle at the lips of Life
To sound reveille to a drowsing world
When some great deed is rising like the sun?

Where are those others whom your deeds inspired
To deeds and words that were themselves a deed?
Those who believed in death have gone with death
To the gray crags of immortality;
Those who believed in life have gone with life
To the red halls of spiritual death.

And you? But what is death or life to you?
Only a weapon in the hand of faith
To cleave a way for beings yet unborn
To a far freedom you will never share!
Freedom of body is an empty shell
Wherein men crawl whose souls are held with gyves;
For Freedom is a spirit, and she dwells
As often in a jail as on the hills.
In all the world this day there is no soul
Freer than you Breshkovskaya, as you stand
Facing the future in your narrow cell.
For you are free of self and free of fear,
Those twin-born shades that lie in wait for man
When he steps out upon the wind-blown road
That leads to human greatness and to pain.

Take in your hand once more the pilgrim's staff—
Your delicate hand misshapen from the nights
In Kara's mines; bind on your unbent back,
That long has borne the burdens of the race,
The exile's bundle, and upon your feet
Strap the worn sandals of a tireless faith

You are too great for pity. After you
We send not sobs, but songs; and all our days
We shall walk bravelier knowing where you are.

Miss Dinks—Why don't you marry Jack?
Miss Jinks—Because it is so much nicer to have him in love with me.

A New Women's Club Movement

From Mrs. Frona Wait Colburn, a clever and charming woman, I have just received information about the Classic Productions Alliance, to the organization of which she has recently devoted her principal activity. I am very much interested in the Classic Productions Alliance as an abstract idea and will study its gradual unfolding with real curiosity. Mrs. Colburn is attempting very ambitiously and it remains to be seen whether she will receive that intelligent and enthusiastic cooperation without which such a project as hers is doomed to failure. Briefly summarized, it is the intent of Mrs. Colburn to wield the Classic Productions Alliance as a reformatory weapon and as an educational ferule, so to speak. In her hands it is to do away with an abuse which has not hitherto received systematic treatment; it is also to call popular attention to an art-form which thus far has been confined to a very few, and those not necessarily of the elect. Concretely, Mrs. Colburn, through the Classic Productions Alliance, proposes to reform dramatic reading and to introduce to the public the poetry of the Bohemian grove plays.

What is Wrong with Dramatic Reading

Mrs. Colburn declares that a radical reform is needed in the art of reading the lines of a great classical play. The false and artificial methods of the elocutionists excite her righteous scorn. "They use salesroom instead of drawing room English," she declares with epigrammatic terseness; and she tells how they tire, bore and disgust by burring the "poor overworked letter r, the galley slave of the elocutionist's alphabet." The faults of the elocutionist, Mrs. Colburn opines, have destroyed the taste for standard poetry; the value of cadence, clarity of tone, enunciation and pronunciation have been forgotten. So there must be pioneers to retrace the well-nigh forgotten path back to the dramatic reading methods of Booth and Barrett and Lewis Morrison, to mention three dead actors for whom Mrs. Colburn professes great admiration. For "interpretation" she has but scant respect; "some of our elocutionists would interpret the Lord's Prayer, if given a chance," she declares with withering sarcasm. Back to the clearly enunciated word! might be one of the shibboleths of the new alliance.

As to the Grove Plays

Mrs. Colburn likewise opines that a great educational force is going to waste in the grove plays of the Bohemian Club. By no means does she insinuate that their sweetness and light is diffused in vain over the souls of the members of the club who assist at their production, but if she went that far there might possibly be many to approve the dictum. She does think however that the grove plays should not remain esoteric, but should be made known to the outer reading and theatre-going public. She indorses the opinion of "Eastern and European critics" who agree that these grove plays are the best things being done today for dramatic art, a flattery which should soothe the soul of Professor Morse Stephens, the author of the last of the series. "Licked into acting and reading shape" and so published "by a man like Robertson," Mrs. Colburn thinks they would be widely read, although she does not say who would be employed to do this "licking," evidently overlooked by the authors. Produced outdoors during our rainless summer evenings they would, she says, aid in the movement to bring the people back to the soil. "They glorify the white knighthood of myth and legend and tell anew the stories of reward for service and sacrifice for the good of humanity. May not the gospel of the grove play widely spread lead to a higher and better concept of living?" The best answer to Mrs. Colburn's question, of course, lies in a knowledge of the moral effect which these plays have wrought on the white knights of commerce who predominate in the Bohemian Club.

The Plans of the Alliance

The Classic Productions Alliance will be composed primarily of the literary, social and study clubs of the city, but no unattached enthusiast in the cause of the classics will be excluded. It is planned to secure the services of Ada Dow Currier, "the producer of Julia Marlowe and Robert Tabor, the teacher of Maude Adams and Norval MacGregor and the only protege Joseph Jefferson ever had." Madame Currier, I learn, is now in this city resting from one of her world tours on which she carried the traditions of the old school to South Africa, India, Siam, Australia and New Zealand. Mrs. Colburn hopes to have the help of the Bohemian, Loring and San Francisco Musical clubs in her endeavors and looks forward to the same success which she enjoyed in calling to the attention of the artists of California, "the manifold possibilities of the eucalyptus tree, the result of which has been the steadily growing vogue of this new motif." As if the primary ends of the movement were not sufficient there is also to be included "interpretative dancing, especially that which expresses a great truth in nature or exemplifies the mysteries of life and death; and high class pantomime, to take the place of the moving picture show." Here is an ambitious program. It is now in process of being carried out, Mrs. Colburn informs me. The process will be a most interesting one and we will all watch it with curiosity.

The Chief of Police Was There

A crystal palace of liquid joy with the inevitable adjunct of a cafe below stairs was opened in the Tenderloin last week. It was a gala occasion. All the somebodies of the night life were there, quaffing champagne, tossing paper ribbons, waving flags and applauding the music which did not by any means cease at one o'clock. The presence of the chief of police lent dignity to the opening. He sat at a table with a husky wine agent, a porter agent who gained distinction lately when Tex Rickard floored him in the St. Francis Hotel, the scion of a wholesale grocery house and others equally important. While the chief of police enjoyed the festivities he drank only water. The place swarmed with wine agents, beer promoters, mineral water boosters and even the iceman was on hand. It was a curious sight to see one wine agent tipping his brother who is a waiter in the new establishment. Gayest of all the feminine participants in this function was Miss Dorothy Russell who has been altogether too busy in the pursuit of joy to go to work as a singer in a rival establishment. Miss Russell has a large capacity for pleasure and finds this city an ideal place to satisfy it. By the way, it is surprising what a number of these cafes have been opened in the Tenderloin within the last few weeks. All of them have hardwood floors and hail the return of the dancers as the source of increased dividends. There is no doubt about it, San Francisco is rapidly becoming the Brussels of America.

The Death of Oscar Wilde

The account of the death of Oscar Wilde written by Robert Ross and published in this issue of Town Talk, is a valuable and interesting contribution to literary biography. Hitherto an atmosphere of mystery has wrapped the events of those last days in Paris and it is well that the obscurity should be cleared away by one in whom admirers of Wilde place implicit confidence. Andre Gide and Ernest La Jeunesse wrote more or less legendary accounts of the closing months and Robert Sherard's narrative was scanty and unsatisfactory. Now all that need be known has been told. It is evident from this version that all that could be done for Wilde during his last illness was done for him by the few who remained true to him. Among these Reginald Turner, the novelist, now takes an honored place. It is seen now that the funeral was not the mean and hasty affair that has been so often described but a decent and reverend ceremonial. The manner in which it came to pass that Wilde died in the Catholic faith is described authoritatively and is very significant. Finally the account sets at rest forever the absurd legend that Wilde did not die at all and that the "Sebastian Melmoth" buried from the little hotel in the Beaux Arts was not the Oscar Wilde of literature.

How One Senator Voted

It was Charles James Fox, I believe, who said: "I have heard many speeches that caused me to change my mind but never a one that made me change my vote." Fox merely voiced the rule which has obtained among politicians in legislative bodies since legislation was a popular function. It is refreshing to note at least one exception to the rule and one has just been supplied by Colonel James Gordon of Mississippi, the gentle old confederate who sat in the United States Senate for a short time recently. "The very first time I voted," said Colonel Gordon, telling some of his senatorial experiences, "it was for a republican measure. When my colleagues on the democratic side told me that I had done so, I told them I was sorry to have made such a blunder, but I had listened to the speeches, and had found that the republican side sounded best to me, and so I followed them. I said if they wanted me to vote the other way in the future, they would have to find some better speakers." This has been taken as an evidence of Colonel Gordon's extreme simplicity, but it is the sort of simplicity which should not be discouraged in a sophisticated assembly like the United States Senate. An infusion of this spirit would make that body a much more refreshing gathering than it is at present. But it is safe to say that nobody will follow Colonel Gordon's example within the next decade.

Publicity Man for Anderson

Clovis A. Farnsworth, an experienced newspaperman of this city, has accepted the position of publicity agent for Alden Anderson during the gubernatorial campaign. He has organized an office force and is preparing to carry on the work of publicity all over the State. Farnsworth has an extensive acquaintance in all sections of California. During his journalistic career he has represented the Examiner at Stockton and Sacramento, has attended sessions of the legislature for the Call and Examiner and has written political news for the former paper. There is no doubt that he can do effective work for Anderson and that candidate is to be congratulated on having so valuable a man enlisted in his cause.

Everyday Magic

Aladdin's lamp transported its owner from place to place in the twinkling of an eye.

That was thousands of years ago — and the lamp was only a myth. But so wonderful that the story has endured to this day.

The Bell telephone is far more wonderful — and it is a reality.

It is the dream of the ages, come true. In the office, in the home, it stands; as commonplace in appearance as Aladdin's lamp.

By it the human voice—the truest expression of personality, ability, and character — is carried from place to place instantly and accurately. And human powers are thus extended as if by magic.

All other means of communication are cold and colorless in comparison. By the telephone alone is the human quality of the human voice carried beyond the limitations of unaided hearing.

The Bell System has provided this wonderful faculty for all the people.

The whole country is brought together by the Bell policy of universal service; and the miracle of telephone talk is repeated six billion times a year.

The Bell Long Distance telephone puts a man in intimate touch with new resources, new possibilities. One Policy, One System, Universal Service — these make every Bell Telephone the Center of the System.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The trend of values in leading securities for the week has been toward betterment and has reflected a very strong position of stocks, technically speaking. The buying in the leading specialties has been of the substantial kind where developments are in progress to warrant higher prices for these issues eventually, and the general market has been sympathetic in tone. The annual steel report for 1909-10 could not have been more satisfactory, indicating 10½ per cent earned on common stock, with sums laid aside for extraordinary betterment accounts. This year's business will far surpass these figures. Norfolk and Western is being constantly absorbed by Pennsylvania Railroad interests and it is said that the bulk of this stock will disappear from the market as a result of these operations. As the earnings are running over 10 per cent on this stock, it would not be surprising to see the dividend raised to a o per cent basis later on. The Chesapeake & Ohio deal with the Hocking Valley property has been consummated on very favorable terms for the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway whereby a large surplus earning power will revert to the Chesapeake & Ohio treasury. The merger of the Chesapeake & Ohio with other leading roads, we believe, is not yet completed and a great system will eventually be formed whereby Chesapeake & Ohio will be the particular beneficiary with dividend possibilities very much greater than at present. The raising of the Bank of England rate to 4 per cent has caused much discussion this week as to the future of the money market here and possible gold exports. Leading opinion is much mixed while trade figures are much against the United States. It is believed Europe will absorb heavily of new issues of securities this spring and thereby obviate the chances of heavy gold shipments at least.

Wheat—More damage to the growing wheat crop, more demand for the old, more general public interest upon the buying side of the market or more muscle on the part of the present owners of wheat, appear to be the need of the market. The wheat producer has not as yet become greatly excited over the losses and the miller apparently does not fear any shortage of the new crop and is more concerned with the difficulties and the problems of the old. Special and powerful support saved the September delivery last week, while near deliveries showed an unmistakable tendency to drift backward. With the earliest seeding in the northwest that has been known in many years there is a prospect that there will be plenty of new crop spring wheat left to fill contracts in September, even if the winter wheat crop should for any reason fail or be delayed beyond July.

Corn—Prices have been on the down grade all week with only small fractional recoveries due mostly to profit taking by the local professional element who have been arrayed on the bear side for the past sixty days. Trade at no time has been very large and in the absence of any cash demand what looked like small receipts have been a burden on the market and stocks are piling up again. Local sentiment is bearish to a man, but with navigation open April 1 it is to be expected that a good deal of corn will be shipped out of Chicago via the Lake route and a big decrease in local stocks will result which will give the bull a much firmer foundation to work on.

Cotton—The situation in the cotton market remains as perplexing as ever. Despairing of learning anything regarding the intentions of the big bulls in connection with the old crop, the outside public has largely withdrawn from the market, and the new crop just at present does not seem to be very interesting to either professionals or outsiders. There is a great deal of talk of much higher prices before the season ends, but our conviction is only so in regard to the old crop. We believe in a higher average level for cotton in the next few years. We believe that the staple is going to come into its own and will be placed on a permanently higher average basis, compared with the average of recent years. Such readjustment must however be gradual and result from economic rather than highly speculative or manipulative conditions. Meantime we think it will take some fresh influence, such as prospective scarcity for another year, to afford a legitimate basis for a new bull campaign. There seems to be no question of doubt but that a huge acreage has been planted and that this new crop under ordinary conditions will more than meet all requirements.

Copper—There has been little change in the copper metal situation. Consumers continue to follow a waiting policy and purchases of the metal for domestic accounts have been moderate. Exports for the last two months up to date have been comparatively small, but this fact is looked upon favorably in the trade, as it will, it is believed, be reflected in a firmer statistical position on the metal abroad. Producers show no disposition to press the metal for sale and the easier tendency noted at the close of last week was due largely to speculative selling in London which had a sympathetic effect on the local market here. The statement of the Copper Producers Association, issued last week, was not as favorable as was generally predicted. It was expected that a slight decrease in stocks would be shown as a result of a smaller output of the metal. The production however was comparatively large. The daily average output was 4,025,046 pounds, as compared with a daily production of 4,053,945 pounds, the average of last November which showed the largest daily output on record. An encouraging feature however was the heavy deliveries to domestic consumers. These showed a daily average of 2,340,000 pounds which compared favorably with those made in last January which were the largest on record. It must be remembered that the best months for the consumption of the year are yet to come and with this increase in consumption a better price for the metal must ensue and with this a greater demand for the stocks of the standard copper producing mines. We expect to see such stocks as Nevada Consolidated, Greene Cananea, Butte Coalition, Arizona Commercial, Cactus, Miami,

Local Securities—There has been nothing of real importance in the local stock and bond market for the past week or so, outside of a decided display of strength throughout the general list. The chief dealings continue in Spring Valley, Associated Oil and Alaska Packers. Spring Valley Water, selling ex-dividend of 50 cents per share, has suffered a slight decline recently but not enough to point to any new developments in the company's affairs. Associated Oil has been active at times, fluctuating between $49 and $50, and Alaska Packers has had more trading of late with a slight upward movement. As to the balance of the stock list and also the bond list, attention has been well distributed along the line with but few changes. It is thought that the period of inactivity that the local securities are now passing through will continue for a while yet, but it is felt that as the summer approaches, the general list will have a livelier trade with another upward swing in the higher class issues.

ABELARD AND HELOISE

Abelard and Heloise—
Ne'er were lovers like to these:
Flying in the face of fate,
Ground beneath the heel of hate,
Constant to the latest breath,
With a faith defying death,
Deeper than unsounded seas—
Abelard and Heloise.

Abelard and Heloise
Drained Love's chalice to the lees,
Joyed and sorrowed, laughed and wept,
Tempest-torn, and passion-swept;
Now they dream away the days,
In the peaceful Pere la Chaise,
Sleeping there beneath the trees—
Abelard and Heloise.

—Robert Lovemann.

In an interview S. G. Chapman declared himself satisfied that the early sunshine is opening up the most prosperous automobile season that the west has yet experienced. In part, he said: "Basing my statements on my experience in placing both Oaklands and Hupmobiles so far this season I am ready to assert that prospects for the automobile industry were never quite so bright out here in California, as they are right now, The activity, understand, is not limited to San Francisco by any means. Already this season we have shipped cars, Hupmobiles in particular, to practically every county in the State and to some of the most remote counties we shave shipped numbers. The Eastern factories are admitting as they never admitted before that the supply of Western demand is one of their chief problems, and they are increasing their output accordingly. Last week we unloaded fourteen machines. At present we have fifty enroute and we have advance sales for many more. People in outlying territory are just beginning to realize the wonderful future of the auto business out here as is shown by the multitudinous applications we are now receiving for agencies.

PURITY ESSENTIAL

In no other form of food is Purity so absolutely essential as in milk products. Richness is also necessary, as without richness, milk is of little value as a food. Purity and richness are the embodiment of Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. As a food for infants or for general household purposes it has no equal.

Social Prattle

By TANTALUS

Glad Lent is Over

From my inquiries among the very best people—best from the social viewpoint, naturally—I feel justified in saying that the ending of Lent is hailed with almost universal joy. I doubt if there is a single member of our most select circles who does not feel that the holy season has been a severe strain the relaxation of which is to be gladly acclaimed. I do not mean to insinuate that our worthy and esteemed exclusives are suffering physically from the contact of coarse sackcloth with their tenderly nurtured flesh or that the ashes of repentance have so stained their brows that they long for the rosewater of the post-Lentent season. Not at all. Sackcloth and ashes are far from fashionable in society. Any form of penance which disturbs the luxurious contentment of the body is frowned down in the best families. It is only among certain old-fashioned families which flout or pretend to flout the paramount importance of social leadership that the religious regulations imposed by the church for the Lenten period are rigidly observed. It is the more or less mental strain of Lent which society is glad to have relaxed. Hostesses, during the season of penitence, feel the necessity for conducting their bridge parties with an affectation of secrecy, of withholding the news of their jolly theatre excursions and their merry dances from the society reporters—in other words of maintaining what the vulgar who do not understand the mental processes of our exclusives would call an hypocritical attitude toward religion. This is a strain that recurs every year and that leads to particular embarrassment when one has a clergyman or two in the list of one's friends. Some of the clergy really think that society's doings should be subordinated to Lenten observance and I have known several who have had the hardihood to say so. Is it any wonder we are all glad Lent is over?

Mrs. Vanderbilt, Mahatma

A perusal of the Examiner has produced the impression that Mrs. Vanderbilt is a Mahatma. A Mahatma is a person capable of projecting his astral body to any selected spot. According to the Examiner Mrs. Vanderbilt spent last Saturday afternoon selling tags in the Crocker building and at the same time witnessed the polo game at Coronado, having arrived there that morning in her private car. At Coronado her companions were Seward Webb of New York and Robin Grey of this city, while in her tour of the Crocker building she was accompanied by Mrs. Kellogg. On this occasion she wore a costume of black and white checked cloth. At Coronado she was "an interested spectator" of events on the field. During Saturday evening in this city Mrs. Vanderbilt joined a supper party at the St. Francis with Mrs. Frank Carolan and at the same hour she was entertaining dinner guests at the Hotel del Coronado. The two detailed reports of her movements on Saturday were printed on pages 41 and 70 of last Sunday's Examiner. It was confusing until the Mahatma theory occurred to me.

There Will Be No Divorce

People who have wondered if Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt's stay in California is for the purpose of securing a divorce may be interested in the assurance that it is not. Mrs. Vanderbilt like her popular sister of the Fair family, is opposed to divorce. Mrs. Herman Oelrichs was never divorced though she spent her married life in New York while Herman Oelrichs lived in this city. William K. Jr. is a likable young man with more business capabality than the other members of his clan of this generation. His mother, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, is a brilliant woman although addicted to suffrage campaigning. The former Virginia Fair is several years older than her husband but she is still girlish in appearance with the piquant prettiness that has always distinguished her.

Our Exclusive Taggers

There were countless unrecorded incidents of Tag Day when the prettiest girls in society sold bits of paste board on the highways. For ten cents any one might have the fair fingers of a Burlingame belle tie a tag in his button-hole and needless to say the Western equivalent of the Boulevardier seized his opportunity. The hotel corridors were crowded with specimens of the genus homo vulgarly known as "mashers." It was a shock to the vanity of some of them to find that their sole attraction lay in their dimes which when given up left them barren. I saw a prominent maid of the Burlingame set who was in a group directed by Mrs. Carolan cleverly dispose of one of these gentlemen. He was a fairly fine looking creature, well turned out, and he sauntered up to the prettiest girl in sight with a "see what's coming" manner. She sold him a tag and he requested that she tie it to the button of his coat. This she did, graciously. Then he gave her a dollar and she counted out the change from her silver chain bag. In the process of receiving it he carefully spilled it and there was time for a remark or two while gathering up the pieces. Elaborately he handed them back to the vendor as a donation and received her smiling thanks. Vastly encouraged he essayed further conversation, but the pretty girl had turned to speak to a companion. The "masher" executed a flank movement and once more was in her line of vision. Another bit of airy persiflage was tried. This time the Burlingame maid bestowed a preoccupied, unsmiling glance that went under and over him and entirely through him and left retreat his only course. Mrs. Carolan was conspicuous at the hotels and theatres where the taggers were stationed, in a smart black velvet walking suit. The coat was tight fitting and the skirt short enough to disclose patent leather shoes with deep tan uppers. She wore a huge black hat turned up on one side and carried an umbrella scarcely large enough to cover it. This was an extra touch, however, as Mrs. Carolan made the rounds in her limousine.

A Rumored Scandal

There is rumor of an impending domestic tragedy in our very highest social circles. It would be unnecessarily cruel to reveal the names of the two families involved, for there is always the possibility that a reconciliation may be effected and publicity avoided. The skeleton may be hidden away in the closet and the door carefully locked and in that event it is nobody's business what the facts of the tragedy are. But the rumors flying about persist in whispering into listening ears that the time for peaceful settlement has gone by and that there is to be at least one separation. I am sceptical about this. There are many reasons why no separation should be sought in this particular case and they will probably outweigh outraged feminine feelings.

Spokane's High Society

From a weekly paper published in Spokane I learn with considerable interest that the town on the northern inlet is aping the ways of real simon-pure blown-in-the-bottle metropolitan society. This is inspiring. May we look forward to the time when Spokane will vie with Newport in setting the pace for giddy gaiety? Perhaps that is going too quickly but certainly the story told by the weekly paper indicates that Spokane may boast a society worthy to be spelled with a big S. It seems that a certain young matron of Spokane was anxious to break into what the weekly calls the "coveted cult" of the smart set. So she sent out invitations to a dinner party. "The list," I read, "included a few young married people and several of the prominent young men and maids who usually grace our exclusive social functions." The dinner proved to be principally a liquid function. There was "punch of herculean brew" and so many varieties of liquor on the dining room buffet that the guests referred to it as the bar. "The affair," says the chronicler, "took on the attributes of a bacchanalian revel, with more or less diffidence on the part of the girls, but every hospitable encouragement on the part of the hostess." Well, one young man fell down stairs, several others were put "out-of the running" and the girls were afraid to go home in the dark, as the married men were incapacitated for escort duty. So a few survivors took the ladies home by relays. The social arbiters of Spokane have decided that this method of breaking into their "coveeted cult" is not to be countenanced and perhaps they are right. But if the inland town wants to make good its title to a place on the social map and its right to spell its society with a big S, the members of its "coveted cult" will have to learn to carry their liquor more decorously. To fall down stairs is not only unconventional but decidedly bad form. Until Spokane has passed the experimental stage in social activity its dinner parties should be held on the ground floor.

Ernest Wiltsee in Town

Ernest Wiltsee spent several days at the St. Francis last week on his way to Bakersfield where he has oil interests. No one seemed to do anything about it, not even the daily chroniclers of social matters who once delighted to do him honor. Yet Mr. Wiltsee is now as prominent in New York and American Paris as he once was in San Francisco. His wife who did not accompany him to California is also known here where she spent her girlhood. She was Miss Emily Lorillard Taylor, daughter of the late Colonel Stuart Taylor who was a prominent figure in local club life. Mrs. Taylor was a Lorillard of New York. They lived here a number of years, finally going to Paris, where the present Mrs. Wiltsee had a brilliant social career under the chaperonage of her aunt. Everyone remembers handsome Wiltsee in his bachelor days and his friend Mr. Williams of South Africa. Mr. Williams whose other name I cannot recall, was a social rocket. He flared brightly for a while, and at the height was on the point of leading a prominent San Francisco belle to the altar. Just before this consummation occurred the slump caused by exposure of the fact that Mr. Williams had greatly overestimated his own fortune. Total social extinguishment and a broken engagement followed. To do Mr. Wiltsee justice he was as sadly shocked as anyone at the finale.

Society at Coronado

The Coronado polo tournament has been the magnet of social attraction during the week. The Hotel del Coronado has been the scenes of gayety not at all suggestive of the closing Lenten season and San Diego has swarmed with our fashionables. One of the earliest arrivals was Ned Greenway without whom a formal gathering of the exclusive clans would be a very dismal function. Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Clark went from San Mateo in their private car, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Raoul-Duval, Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Driscoll, Miss Eleanor Sears, Harry Simkins and R. M. Tobin. Another private car party was that of Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott who brought with them Mrs. William Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Irwin, and Miss Helen Irwin. Then Miss Jennie Crocker was there with Templeton Crocker; Mrs. John McMullin with her niece Miss Anna Weller; Duane Hopkins, Buckley Wells, Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton; the Carolans; Mr. and Mrs. Joheph S. Tobin and M. H. De Young.

Mrs. Astor's Innovation

I wonder how long it will be before our dancing hostesses will serve breakfast after their parties? This is an innovation introduced in London society by Mrs. Astor and enthusiastically welcomed by the hungry waltzers of the exclusive Mayfair set. After a recent dance Mrs. Astor regaled her guests at three in the morning with deviled kidneys and lager beer and the onslaught upon these solid refreshments was voracious in the extreme. As a result all the hostesses have taken to serving "a last refresher" before their weary guests depart and the West End caterers are devising all sorts of tempting menus for these occasions. Down in Burlingame where our aristocrats are blessed with healthy appetites and where the zest for good things to eat is never concealed beneath a pseudo-fashionable daintiness, as in less forthright circles, the "last refresher" is sure of a tumultuous welcome. Some of our dainty belles and beaux might be cursed with nightmare if they went to bed after a repast of deviled kidneys and beer, but not so the sturdy Blingumites. Most of them would rather eat than dance any time. Blessings on the ingenuity of Mrs. Astor!

Mrs. Richard Hartje, Miss Hartje and Miss M. E. McQuiston of Pittsburg are among the recent arrivals at the Potter.

In the Social Spotlight

Mrs. Harold Sewell, Mrs. Norman MacLean and Miss Elizabeth Ashe, three of San Francisco's prominent society members, are at the Potter for a few weeks' visit.

Mrs. William C. Irwin and her daughter Helene of San Francisco are expected at the Potter shortly for an extended stay. They have just returned from a tour in Mexico with the Miss Jennie Crocker party.

Mrs. Morris, of the Hotel Victoria in this city, will conduct Castle Crag during the coming summer season. Among those who have already made reservations there are Mrs. Eugene Lent, Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. R. G. Hooker and Mrs. William Redding and family.

Mr. and Mrs. Peter F. Dunne arrived from New York during the week on a visit to their children. They will return to the metropolis on May 1 as Mr. Dunne has important law cases there which requires his presence.

Mrs. James C. Jordon, Miss Adelaide Kenny and Miss Jane Kenny of San Francisco, motored down to the Hotel Vendome, San Jose, in their car for the week end.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. C. Pardee with Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Weelbye of Oakland, motored from Oakland to the Hotel Vendome.

Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Bracken, Mrs. C. M. Day and Miss A. M. Bancroft of Hopedale, Mass., are visiting San Jose for a few weeks' stay.

Mrs. James A. Robinson, Miss Elena and Porter Robinson have taken a cottage in Santa Barbara for the summer months. In the fall Mrs. Robinson and family will go abroad where they will pass the winter.

Mrs. Daniel MacMasters has issued invitations for a bridge party on March 28 at her home, 2020 Washington street.

Mrs. H. H. McGowan of Paraiso Hot Springs has returned home after a week-end visit with Mrs. L. Terkelsen of Clayton street.

Mr. and Mrs. Ivan Treadwell and daughter, accompanied by Mrs. T. O'Hara and friends, have been at Paraiso Hot Springs for a week's stay. They made excellent time in their Cadillac car from San Jose.

Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, who was Miss Virginia Fair, arrived at Del Monte Sunday with her children, has taken an elaborate suite of rooms, and is planning to remain for the entire summer season.

Mr. E. W. Barron, a well-known club man of San Francisco, motored down last week for a week at Del Monte.

Among the many week-end parties of San Francisco people at Del Monte last week were Dr. and Mrs. Lawrence Draper, who had with them Mrs. A. W. Foster and A. W. Foster Jr. of San Rafael; and Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Wilson, Miss Berenice Wilson, well known socially in the bay cities.

Miss Amy Brewer, one of the most charming girls of the San Mateo smart set, has been for several days the guest of Miss Genevieve Harvey at Del Monte. Miss Harvey and her guest are both expert golfers, and are to be seen on the links every fine day.

Dr. and Mrs. Alexander, who have been wintering at the Hotel Victoria, have returned to their home in San Rafael for the spring and summer.

Mrs. R. D. Sargent is a recent arrival from Seattle. She is registered at the Hotel Victoria.

William Donovan Jr. of Aberdeen, Wash., is a guest at the Hotel Victoria.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. L. McPherson of Portland are the guests of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. McPherson at the Hotel Victoria.

A number of dinner parties have made the past week a busy one at the Hotel Victoria. Among those who entertained were Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Thoyer, Dr. and Mrs. Alexander, Mrs. C. M. Vance, Miss Laura Tervis and Miss Celia O'Connor.

Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Smith had a series of small dinner parties during the week, a half dozen guests sharing their hospitality on each occasion.

Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt Jr. of New York who was a luncheon hostess at the Palace on Tag Day, joined in the fun and also sold tags. It is reported that she and some friends went through the Crocker building opposite the Palace and sold tags in every office.

H. H. Hunnewell and family of Boston have arrived at the Palace and are making a lengthy stay. Mr. Hunnewell is a millionaire and makes the trip to California each winter in his private car, stopping en route as his fancy dictates. He is the president of the National Kennel Club of America and during his visit to San Francisco the annual meeting of the association was held at the Palace.

George Barr McCutcheon of Indiana, author of "Brewster's Millions," "Graustark" and other fiction, has been the guest of the Palace for the past few days. Mr. McCutcheon is accompanied by Mrs. McCutcheon and is en route home to Chicago after a lengthy visit in the southern part of California.

H. C. Denson of the United States geological survey has been the guest of the Palace awaiting his steamer which will take him to new fields of labor in the Philippines. This is his second trip to the islands.

Among the well known men of science who recently stopped at the Fairmont was Professor Ferdinand Ellerman of the Carnegie Solar Observatory on Mt. Wilson. He is on his way to the Hawaiian Islands where he purposes taking a series of photographs of the Halley comet and making a careful observation of its progress during his stay of nearly two months. Professor Ellerman was accompanied by Mrs. Ellerman and Miss Ellerman who will make the journey with him.

The Fairmont Hotel is in receipt of a cable from London asking for the reservation of one hundred rooms during the week of July Fourth when the great pugilistic encounter is to take place. One hundred of the well known men about town of London have decided to visit California for the event and have made their reservations thus far in advance.

Mrs. Charles G. Hickox of Cleveland, Ohio, one of the most prominent society matrons of that city, is in San Francisco for a month's visit. Mrs. Hickox is a guest at the Hotel Victoria, where she will spend her time during her stay in town.

When Rome Was Young

---so history records---her nobility and indeed all her citizens of wealth and culture found their greatest pleasures in the building and ornamentation of villas which embowered in gardens, looked down from the hillslopes on the Roman Campagna, or upon the bay of Naples. In this Californian climate, so like Italy's, it is no wonder that history repeats itself and that to-day people of wealth and culture seek the hills for their home. Only now the villa homes---those of the Crocker Tract, for example---look down upon both bay and plain, and electric transportation puts each man's vine-covered, rose-encircled residence within easy reach of office and shop. Why not live the life of the villa home---the ideal life from Roman times down to our own?

WICKHAM HAVENS INCORPORATED, 1212 Broadway, Oakland, California

Professor Henry Fairfield Osborn, accompanied by Mrs. Osborn, was a recent arrival at the Fairmont. He is a professor of zoology at the Columbia University of New York and is also associated with the American Museum of Natural History of the same city. He has been making a tour of investigation of the ancient cliff dwellings in Arizona and the fossil beds of Southern California. While in this part of the State he made a visit to the Yosemite in company with John Muir who came in from the valley to meet him.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included A. K. Brewer, J. B. Hyde-Smith, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. McKee, Mrs. John McMullin, Miss Anna Weller, Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Bauer, George W. Harrison, W. F. Hargaard, E. V. Clark, Mr. and Mrs. G. S. Wright, H. J. Flynn, J. B. McCarger, E. Preston, Thomas F. Graves, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Burnham and Dr. and Mrs. George K. Frink.

Dr. J. Auburn Wiborn and Mrs. Wiborn have returned to their apartments at the Hotel Victoria, after an absence of six weeks or more in the East.

Mrs. John Russ and Mrs. Charles D. Pierce have also reestablished themselves at the Hotel Victoria, after several months in the South. They were guests for a part of the winter at the Hotel del Coronado.

The "Service Set" at the Fairmont lost a goodly number of its members when the Pacific Squadron went to target practice at Santa Barbara, many of the "Navy widows" following the ships to the Southland, but the number was increased again by the arrival of other officers from the Orient or from the East en route to their stations in the islands. Among the latest arrivals were Paymaster and Mrs. R. Nicholson, Lieutenant Commander and Mrs. Chester Wells, Captain and Mrs. E. B. Underwood, J. B. Olding and Mrs. Olding, U. S. N.

Mr. and Mrs. Dwight A. Jones, Mrs. Frederick Remsen Hutton, wife of Professor Hutton who occupies the chair of mechanical engineering at Columbia University and is an author of note, Miss Isabel E. Foote and Miss Gladys Dwight Jones comprise a party from New York who have arrived in Santa Barbara in their private car and are guests at the Potter.

Mr. and Mrs. George Scofield of Tacoma are spending a few days at the Potter. Mr. Scofield is a member of the firm and manager of Savage, Scofield & Co., wholesale dealers in building material.

Mr. Lew Guernsey, a former newspaper man of Santa Barbara and later of the Los Angeles Record, arrived at the Potter during the week with E. G. Vail of New York City.

Among the motor parties of Del Monte last week were Mr. and Mrs. L. J. Holton and Miss Holton, who motored down from the city and will be at Del Monte for several days; Mr. and Mrs. A. G. Wishon, Miss Wishon, Miss Ethel Shaver of Fresno, who will also be here for some time: Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Green, who are touring the State and will remain long enough to "do" the peninsula very thoroughly; Mr. and Mrs. N. L. Dalton, Miss Snyder, Edgar Nelson and Miss Wollenbach, who motored over from Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. Frederick J. Southerland entertained at dinner recently Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stuart Fonda, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. P. Hill, Mrs. Sue Merriman and Captain Creary, U. S. A.

The Palace is the favored rendezvous of the travelers from British Columbia and prominent among those registered from there recently were Mr. and Mrs. W. McNeill, Miss McNeill and Master McNeill of Vancouver, B. C., and Mrs. E. J. McFeeley of the same city. From Victoria came Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Gillispie, A. E. Todd, Mrs. J. H. Todd, W. H. Trewarth-James, Mrs. E. V. Bodwell and Miss Carolyn Bodwell.

B. L. Smith of Chicago, president of the Western Banking Company and a director in a number of railroad enterprises, has been at the Palace recently. Mr. Smith is accompanied by Mrs. Smith and family and came to the coast over the Santa Fe in President Ripley's private car. Mr. Smith and family saled for the Orient for an extended visit.

Capt. Chas. B. Hinde, president of the Spreckels Bros. Commercial Company of San Diego, has been at the Palace during his stay in San Francisco. He is accompanied by J. B. Alexander of Los Angeles.

Mrs. John P. Jones and her daughter, Miss Georgiana Jones, have arrived in Paris where they intend to remain until after the wedding of Miss Alice Jones and Artist McMonnies which will take place within a few weeks.

Mrs. Wakefield Baker, Mrs. Eugene Lent, Mrs. Osgood Hooker, Mrs. George Shreve and a number of others have taken cottages for the summer season at Castle Crag.

The resort is to be managed this summer by Mrs. W. F. Morris of the Hotel Victoria, and the announcement that she will assume charge of it is one of the most interesting bits of resort news. Mrs. Morris has had extensive experience in similar work, and under her management the Castle Crag resort will claim a generous patronage from the society folk of this and other bay cities.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY PETITION FOR SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE GRANTED

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California—No. 7806, Dept. 9, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of SARAH S. NORTON, Deceased.

EDWARD S. NORTON, administrator of the estate of Sarah S. Norton, also known as Sarah Saxe Norton, having presented to this Court and filed herein his duly verified petition praying for an order of this Court authorizing and directing the said administrator to sell, at private sale, an undivided one-quarter interest in certain real property situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Southwesterly line of Spear Street, distant thereon two hundred and twenty-nine (229) feet and two (2) inches Southeasterly from the corner formed by the point of intersection of the Southeasterly line of Howard Street with the Southwesterly line of Spear Street, running thence Southeasterly and along said Southwesterly line of Spear Street forty-five (45) feet and ten (10) inches; thence at a right angle Southwesterly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches; thence at a right angle Northwesterly forty-five (45) feet and ten (10) inches, and thence at a right angle Northeasterly one hundred and thirty-seven (137) feet and six (6) inches to the point of commencement. Being Beach and Water Lot No. 752.

And good cause appearing therefor,

It is hereby ordered that all persons interested in said estate show cause, if any they have, before this Court on Monday, the 25th day of April, 1910, at the hour of ten (10) o'clock a. m. at the Courtroom of this Court, Department 9 thereof, in the Grant Building at the corner of Market and Seventh Streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, why the said petition should not be granted.

And it is further ordered that notice of the time and place of the hearing of said petition be given by publishing a copy of this order in "Town Talk," a newspaper of general circulation published in this City and County, for four successive weeks next before the hearing of said petition.

Dated, San Francisco, California, March 23rd, 1910.

The Vanishing Seal Herd

From a gentleman who has just returned from Alaska I learn that the seal herd is in danger of annihilation and that what was once an important industry may soon be no more. So rapidly are the seals being killed that unless something is done their practical extinction will be the work of but a few years. By direction of Congress an official survey was made in 1874. The herd was then reported as numbering 4,700,000. Another official survey, made in 1891, reported the number as then reduced to 1,000,000. In 1900 the United States Fish Commission reported a further reduction to 360,000. In 1906 there were about 180,000, and W. T. Hornaday estimates the present number at not more than 30,000. This rapid diminution of the herd has gone on in spite of the fact that during the last twenty years the Government has spent nearly $5,500,000 for its protection. The Bering Sea tribunal, which sat in Paris in 1893, established a close season and provided other regulations assumed to be reasonably effective. A law passed by Congress in December, 1897, prohibited American citizens and vessels from pelagic sealing in Bering Sea or in the Pacific Ocean north of the 35th parallel of north latitude. The Paris decision of 1893 limited the activities of Canadian sealers, but the matter has been a cause of frequent and serious friction. The operations of American citizens have been kept fairly well within legal limits, but the laws of this country do not equally bind the Canadians and do not at all bind the Japanese, who were not party to the Paris treaty of 1893 and who recognize no law outside the generally established three mile limit. The Japanese have been active in their operations in Bering Sea since 1901, and it is largely to the wasteful, unscientific and even brutal methods of Japanese hunters in the open sea that the swift destruction of the herd is properly attributable. It is in the open sea that most of the evil work is done. The islands of St. Paul and St. George are now the principal breeding grounds, and on them the right of killing is held under lease from the Government by the North American Commercial Company of this city. The company operates under officially prescribed regulations and pays to the Government a royalty on all skins taken and shipped. The lease, made in 1890, will expire next spring.

—The Naturalist.

Piedmont, March 22, 1910

Dearest Bess:—

I suppose it's very much needed, this rain of the last week, but it has not made me any too amiable for I have not been able to spend ten seconds in my adorable garden.

Yesterday, however, it was semi-clear long enough for me to make the rounds, almost repeating the behavior of the small child, pulling the plants up to see if they were growing in my eagerness to see my garden in full bloom.

Oh, these hills, these hills—one lovely carpet of green with vivid patches of orange and yellow! Spring is really here underfoot, but not so much overhead. The Crocker Tract I cannot help but tell you of every time I write, for it grows more beautiful daily—the Boston Ivy is just uncurling its beautiful glossy leaves over the houses making them look as gloriously fresh and springlike as the hills themselves, and the larks are fairly outdoing themselves in their morning carols.

We are deep in plans. The Spanish hacienda type for mine, and it's just the thing for our lot which is a small crest, sloping gently into an oak-filled canyon. I'm crazy, absolutely crazy, to get at it, and we only now wait the stopping of the rains to begin. In the meantime, however, the garden goes merrily on, and will be a beautiful setting for the house which will be there as soon as human skill can accomplish it.

I'll expect you as soon as a sunny day temps you forth.

Yours,

—Claire.

Maclyn Arbuckle in "The Round-up"

By Edward F. O'Day

Not since William Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes" extracted the charge from Moriarity's revolver by an imperceptible movement have we seen so interesting a gun play as that of Maclyn Arbuckle in the character of "Slim" Hoover, the sheriff of Pinal County. It is a thrilling situation. "Buck" McKee, a thoroughly bad sort of bad landsman, has the drop on the sheriff and reminds him that he is very quick on the draw. The sheriff drawlingly acknowledges McKee's cleverness in that sinister particular and slowly, good-naturedly, as becomes a fat man, lifts up his hands. For all intents and purposes his hands are still in the air when he takes out of the upper pocket of his blouse a sack of durham. Now here is a situation which takes "Buck" McKee off his guard. "Buck" has not drawn his weapon; his hand is at the holster, but he is watching the sheriff alertly. As the sheriff's hands are really in the air why should "Buck" object to his rolling a cigarette? Having opened the little sack it is quite natural that he should reach for a paper and presto! with a mighty roar the sheriff has one big revolver trained on "Buck" and another covering "Buck's" gang of bad men. It is a great trick and the eye is not quick enough to see just where those big guns come from. Hidden somewhere on his capacious breast they have been awaiting the proper moment and then they leap to the sheriff's hands for the humiliation of "Buck" McKee. Those who delighted in Gillette's dexterity in unloading Moriarity's pistol never could show patience with those who insisted that the cigar trick in the great gas chamber scene was a better bit of work. That was one of those arguments which could never be settled, like a religious or political dispute. I remember having espoused the cause of the pistol trick with incredible warmth. Similarly there is bound to be a dispute between those who insist that Arbuckle's greatest scene in "The Round-Up" is that which I have just described and those who aver with equal positiveness that it is that in which he rolls a cigarette with one hand while striking a match with the other. Now I never thought there was much room for argument in the Gillette controversy; I was too much of a partisan for that. But I do see where both sides to the Arbuckle dispute have good roomy ground to stand on. The rolling of that cigarette is wonderful; it is a work of art, inasmuch as it is a thing of beauty and a joy forever. Of course it is not new; we have seen Arbuckle do it before, just as we have heard him utter that piteous lament about the lovelessness of fat men. That lament, by the way, is one of the most egregiously false statements I have ever heard on the stage. Fat men are invariably loved; it is the thin fellows whom the women neglect, as every thin man will testify with his attenuated arm lifted solemnly to high heaven. Although the remark which the sheriff makes is false, the cigarette which he rolls is a good one and the rolling of it is an action of which we will never tire. Still I must say that I prefer the gun play which cows the exultant spirit of bad "Buck" McKee. The gun play and the rolling of the cigarette are the two best things in "The Round-Up," of course; but there are other tidbits of an entrancing deliciousness. The fight with the Indians in the third act gave me one of the sweetest sensations that I have had since I ceased reading Harry Castleman and Fennimore Cooper. I would like to have seen the combat more evenly balanced, but that is a small matter. The Indians never have much of a chance in melodrama and in this instance I believe they only succeed in bowling over one white man. By great good chance that white man was a disturbing factor in the play and his death came in the nick of time to save the plot from a miserable ending. As it is the play ends happily, even "Buck" McKee manifesting a native chivalry which softens the hearts of the audience and brings a pang of regret when he staggers off to die of a stab. I have my own ideas about the ingenue accepting that hangdog fellow "Bud" Lane. It may be very well for the purpose of the play to show the sheriff as an unsuccessful suitor, but I am convinced that nothing of the sort happened. Ingenues are not supposed to be partial to fat men on the stage; they always marry handsome and ridiculous boys; but in real life it is very different. Everybody, including ingenues, loves a fat man and Maclyn Arbuckle is a peculiarly lovable compound of sinew and good nature, of humor and adipose.

Here is the kindly fashion in which Mr. Walkley of the London Times receives "The Climax" which made such a deep impression in New York: "The play serves up just that kind of homely, obvious humor, saccharine sentiment and cheap science which you find in so many American plays and in every popular American magazine. Incidentally it dwells on the contrast between some half-baked, unsophisticated, puritanical Azalea, Ohio, and the esthetic-intellectual emancipation of New York—which is not perhaps quite so far ahead of Azalea as it fondly supposes."

The Maud Allan Dances

With the assistance of a magnificent symphony orchestra of forty-five of our leading musicians under Paul Steindorff and personally organized by Will Greenbaum, Miss Maud Allan will interpret for us such works as Grieg's "Peer Gynt Suite," Schumann's "Papillons," Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice," Chopin's "Funeral March," Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" and works by Bach, Mozart, Tschaikowsky and of course her wonderful creation, "The Vision of Salome" inspired by the music of Richard Strauss. The performances will be given under the joint direction of Martin Beck and Will Greenbaum at the Garrick Theatre on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday nights, April 5, 7 and 8, and on Sunday afternoon, April 10. The sale of seats will open next Thursday morning, March 31, at Sherman, Clay & Co's and mail orders will receive careful attention if addressed to Will L. Greenbaum with check or money order enclosed. Manager Bishop of Ye Liberty Playhouse has been induced to lay off his entire stock production on Wednesday night, April 6, in order that the people of Alameda County may have the opportunity of witnessing the beautiful work of Miss Allan and her grand symphony orchestra. Seats for the Oakland performance will be on sale at Ye Liberty box office next Thursday and mail orders should be addressed to H. W. Bishop.

"The Round-Up" Again Next Week

The Columbia Theatre will offer Klaw and Erlanger's big production of "The Round-Up" for a second and last week commencing with Monday night, March 28. The performance has attracted big audiences during the past week. Otis Skinner, direct from New York, will be the next attraction at the Columbia Theatre, offering his latest comedy success entitled "Your Humble Servant." The new play will probably prove to the star's many local admirers a decided departure from the previous lines of characterization which he has recently essayed here. Izetta Jewell, who is quite a favorite here, plays the leading feminine role in the production.

"As the Sun Went Down" at the Savoy

The last performances of "The Red Mill" will be given at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening, and at the matinee Sunday, "As the Sun Went Down" will begin an engagement limited to one week. "As the Sun Went Down," which will be seen for the first time in this city, is a new play from the pen of George D. Baker and it should receive more than usual attention for the reason that it will be produced under the personal direction of Arthur C. Aiston, a manager who has given to the public excellent plays like "Tennessee's Pardner," "At the Old Cross Roads" and "Pretty Peggy." "As the Sun Went Down" has received praise in every city where it has been played. The story is one of California in the early days and is full of the Bret Harte atmosphere. The company is one of merit headed by Estha Williams, a Californian. In her support are Edwin Walter, W. A. Whitecar, Victory Bateman, Arthur E. Chatterton, Arthur W. Bentley, Flora Byam, R. F. Sullivan, Margaret Millar, W. A. Cleveland, William D. Taylor and others. The usual bargain matinee will be given on Thursday.

The Maud Powell Concerts

Maud Powell, an American woman who stands in the foremost ranks of the world's great musicians and who is considered by such men as Ysaye, Kreisler, Caesar Thomson and Kubelik as a "brother artist," will give her first concert at the Garrick Theatre this Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p. m., offering a program of quite a different style and calibre from any heard here since Ysaye played at the old Baldwin with Lachaume. Her pianist, Waldemar Liachowsky, toured several seasons in Europe with Mischa Elman and in addition to his abilities as an accompanist is celebrated as an ensemble player. On Thursday night another great program will be given. A great farewell program is promised for Sunday afternoon, April 3. Complete programs and tickets for all the concerts are to be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co's. Next Friday afternoon, April 1, Maud Powell will play in Oakland at Ye Liberty Playhouse, repeating the great program of Thursday night. On Tuesday night this artist and Mary Le Grand Reed, a dramatic soprano, will furnish the program at the fifth concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

Double Bill at Benefit Matinee

Mr. Paul Gerson and his associate players in Shakespeare's comedy "The Taming of the Shrew" and the one act drama "The Old Guard" are to be seen at the charity performance for the Bush Street Synagogue arranged to take place at the Van Ness Theatre, Sunday afternoon, April 3. Mr. Gerson has not been seen on the stage in eight years. Petruchio is the character he will essay in the Shakespearean comedy, while in "The Old Guard" he is cast for the role of old Havresack. A large supporting cast will be seen including many who have made friends by their acting on numerous occasions in this city. Mr. Charles David of the Columbia Theatre is taking great interest in this affair. It was at his suggestion that the benefit was planned and to judge from present indications, it will be very successful.

John Ince Returns

"Salvation Nell" and the reappearance of John Ince as the leading man are the magnets which the Alcazar will offer during the coming week, commencing Monday evening. The play is well known in San Francisco as Mrs. Fiske's latest success, and those who are acquainted with Mr. Ince's acting need not be told that as Jim Platt, the Bowery "tough," he will be extremely effective. Evelyn Vaughan will have the title role, and the other speaking parts, fifty-eight in number, will be distributed among the regular members of the stock company and as many extra people as are necessary. For several weeks the Alcazar's artists and mechanics have been constructing the scenic accessories of the play, and they are most realistic. This will be the first presentation of "Salvation Nell" by a stock company, and the Alcazar management has spared neither money nor pains to make it a memorable event.

The Travelogue Season

The Burton Holmes Travelogue season will open at the Garrick Theatre on Monday night, April 11, and three courses will be given, so that subscribers can attend all the subjects without going more than twice a week. A matinee course will be given on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons after school hours. Season tickets will be ready at Sherman, Clay & Co's April 4 and single seats the following Thursday. A complete course will be given on Tuesday and Friday afternoons at 3:30 at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, commencing Tuesday, April 11.

Good Bill at the Orpheum

"La Petite Gosse" which is to be presented for the first time in this city at the Orpheum next week is the newest form of character pantomimic dance, taking the place of the famous Apache dance which was the rage of Europe for several years. It is given in two scenes; the first an exterior in the Latin Quarter and the second the interior of a drinking place. The characters belong to the "under-world" of Paris and their pantomime illustrates a story of love, hatred and conspiracy. The principal role of "Ma Gosse" is performed by Mlle. M. Corio who danced the Apache dance in Paris, London and New York. Stelling and Revell are horizontal bar experts. "Max Witt's Girls from Melody Lane" who are also new to us are a quartette of attractive song birds. Ada Adair, the leading soprano, has been associated with many of the big concerts given by famous conductors; Eleanor Elliot, the mezzo, has distinguished herself in comic opera; Anna Hathaway, the alto, has found fame in grand opera; Nina Barbour, the contralto, is the possessor of a remarkably deep voice which has made her a favorite in the East. Nonette is the nom de theatre of a sweet young musician who was formerly the special feature with "The Vassar Girls." She will introduce selections on the violin and vocal numbers. "His Last Appearance," an original dramatic sketch, will be presented for the first time here by Walter McCullough, Ralph Evans Smith and Grenville James. Next week will terminate the engagements of Berg's Six Merry Girls, Avery and Hart and Madame Morichini.

"Cameo Kirby" at Ye Liberty

The Bishop players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, have an attraction of rare promise for Easter Week in "Cameo Kirby," the piece in which Dustin Farnum, McKee Rankin, May Buckley and a notable cast were seen last season. "Cameo Kirby" is a four-act comedy-drama by Booth Tarkington and Harry Leon Wilson with scenes laid in New Orleans about eighty years ago. It can readily be imagined that much has been made of that interesting time and place. Sydney Ayres will appear in the title role of Eugene Kirby, an adventurous

Mississippi river gambler, and Elizabeth Stewart has the leading feminine role of the planter's daughter with whom he falls in love. The usual sumptuous scenic surroundings will be shown.

Harry Lauder's Generosity

Some of the stories which are told of Harry Lauder's "nearness" are already regarded as classics, but the canny little Scot, it seems, goes right on making contributions to the anecdotage of stinginess. It is worth while embalming the very latest here. Not long before he sailed home the little Scot became acquainted with a young woman who did him sundry good turns and numerous favors. The day before he departed Harry addressed the young woman politely: "I hae been much beholden tae ye," said Mr. Lauder. "Ye hae done much for baith Mrs. Lauder an' mesel', and I canna' forget it. Tomorrow ye shall receive a bonny present, Miss; a bonny present that shall make ye remember Harry Lauder aye an' ever!" Naturally the young woman expected a locket set in diamonds, or a bracelet or some other bit of jewelry. When she met Mr. Lauder about an hour before he sailed she was delighted with the friendliness that beamed from his expressive Caledonian eyes. With much impressiveness Harry drew forth the present and handed it to her with this accompanying remark: "It is na often, lassie, that I gie yin o' these tae anybody, but ye hae been richt guid tae me an' tae Mrs. Lauder forbye, sae ye shall hae it, lassie, ye shall hae it!" The present? Mr. Lauder's photo, with his autograph written large across the back.

Auto Items

Wallace Bros. of San Jose have just been delivered two more Hupmobiles. They report that the Hups are immensely popular throughout the Santa Clara Valley, and that the demand is increasing every day.

Mr. Alvan Macauley has resigned as general manager of the Burroughs Adding Machine Company to become general manager of the Packard Motor Car Company of Detroit, succeeding Mr. S. D. Waldon, who has been elected vice-president of the Packard Company. This addition to the administrative staff of the Packard Company is the natural result of the steady and remarkable growth of that company, and the increased need of assistance for President H. B. Joy and Mr. Waldon in the conduct of the company's business. The selection of Mr. Macauley to occupy this position is particularly fitting, owing to the fact that he has been instrumental in building up a business which is almost parallel to that of the Packard Company in its growth during the last several years. Mr. Macauley has been general manager of the Burroughs Adding Machine Company for eight and one-half years and was one of the men associated with Mr. Joseph Boyer, directly responsible for bringing the Burroughs plant to Detroit. Under his management the Burroughs business multiplied six times in volume.

The Editor in His Anecdotage

The Lady and the Bird

"The story from the State Agricultural College at Ithaca about feeding dyestuff to hens and producing red, green or blue chickens at will reminds me of the woman who purchased a white crested touraco here," said a bird dealer.

"The touraco is imported from South Africa and is a fine bird as a house ornament. It is about twice the size of our bluejay, is green on the head and breast, deep blue on the tail and rump and has bright red feathers under the wings. This coloring is remarkable, because it is the only known instance in which metallic copper enters into the color scheme of birds. You can get an 8 per cent copper solution from the touraco's red feathers. When caught in a rain the red color is washed away and the feathers become gray.

"This woman left the bird out in the rain one day and when she noticed the effect she came to me and said: 'What kind of dye do you put on your birds? If you are going to cheat your customers by painting the birds I should think you would use fast colors and not have the fraud disclosed by the first rain.'

"She was mad all right, but I explained that the red color would come back in a short time and she afterward came in to apologize."

Justice Brewer's Story

Justice Brewer once told a friend of mine a story of an Indiana Justice of the Peace, who owned a farm. One line of his fence formed the boundary of the States of Indiana and Ohio. Like others in rural districts who hold that office, he had an abnormal appreciation of the responsibility of the office, and never lost an opportunity to exercise his prerogative of demanding that the peace be preserved. One day his son and his hired man got to fighting on a stretch of the farm near the boundary fence, and the Justice of the Peace rushed out and mounted the fence. Then, with head cocked high and the air of one who has but to command, he shouted: "In the name of the State of Indiana I demand the preservation of the peace!" Just then the fence gave way under his weight, and and as he went down with the fence toppling over to the Ohio side, he shouted to his son: "Give him the mischief, Jim; I've lost my jurisdiction!"

Music Hath Charms

Music is the inspiration of the battle-field, of the church, of the lover, and of the solitary student. When Luther was fatigued by prolonged studies, he would take his flute or guitar, and play a lively piece in his garden, and find his mind refreshed. "Music," said Luther, "is the art of the prophets; it is the only thing which, like theology, can calm the troubled soul and put the devil to flight." This happy influence of music makes it a most important though greatly neglected therapeutic agent; for that which powerfully affects the soul necessarily affects the body in a similar manner. His biographer says that David, the famous musical composer, when on earth, cured a man of fever with the pianoforte, and when the fever was disposed to return, he readily drove it away in the same manner. In a hospital in Havana a soldier named Martin was under treatment for catalepsy, but absolutely in vain, for fifteen months; but one day the doctors ordered a bagpipe played near his bed, and he recovered almost immediately. The medical profession has neglected this powerful agent.

SUMMONS TO ESTABLISH TITLE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco. Action No. 20,653

MARY E. NORMAN, Plaintiff, vs
All Persons Claiming any Interest in, or Lien Upon, the Real Property Herein Described or any Part Thereof, Defendants.

The People of the State of California: To all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, defendants, greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of MARY E. NORMAN, plaintiff, filed with the clerk of the above entitled Court and City and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, particularly described as follows:

FIRST PARCEL. Commencing at a point on the Southerly line of Twenty-fourth Street, distant thereon seventy-five (75) feet Easterly from the Easterly line of Sanchez Street, thence running Easterly and along said Southerly line of Twenty-fourth Street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Southerly ninety (90) feet; thence at a right angle Westerly twenty-five (25) feet; thence at a right angle Northerly ninety (90) feet to the point of commencement. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block No. 88.

SECOND PARCEL.—Commencing at the point of the intersection of the lines of the Southeast corner of Twenty-fourth and Vicksburg Streets, thence running along the South side of Twenty-fourth Street in an Easterly direction fifty (50) feet; thence at right angles in a Southerly direction parallel with Vicksburg Street ninety (90) feet; thence at right angles in a Westerly direction running parallel with Twenty-fourth Street fifty (50) feet; thence along Vicksburg Street Northerly ninety (90) feet to the point of commencement.

THIRD PARCEL.—Commencing at a point on the Easterly line of Vicksburg Street, distant thereon ninety (90) feet Southerly from the Southeast corner of Twenty-fourth and Vicksburg Streets, and running thence Southerly along the said Easterly line of Vicksburg Street Twenty-four (24) feet; thence at right angles Easterly and parallel with Twenty-fourth Street seventy-five (75) feet; thence at right angles Northerly and parallel with Vicksburg Street twenty-four (24) feet; and thence at right angles Westerly and parallel with Twenty-fourth Street seventy-five (75) feet to the Easterly line of Vicksburg Street and the point of commencement. Being a portion of Horner's Addition Block No. 88.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: That it be adjudged that the plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that the title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court this 17th day of March, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

MEMORANDUM

The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 26th day of March, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: None.

The Last Days of Oscar Wilde

meant Patrie. And when he got the newspaper he was overjoyed to see the picture of Kruger in a fur coat. He mispronounces certain words now. It is very hard to tend him, and he refuses to obey the doctors' orders. He said that I should have become a physician, for I always wanted people to do that which they didn't want to do. I had asked him to take nourishment and to leave off smoking, as the physicians had forbidden him to smoke. Then he suddenly remarked: 'The Jews have no profound philosophy of life, but they are sympathetic.' Perhaps he thought of me at the time or of Strangman. I shall sleep here tonight in this hotel so that I may be up at 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning and give him the necessary medicines." On November 28 he wrote: "Please inform me at once who should be notified when Oscar dies. Also be prepared to send out the telegrams. I have lost my mind. Tucker has telegraphed to me saying that I should inform Oscar's family about his condition; he told me that he might die at any moment, and that he had already lost consciousness. When I came over to Oscar I found him feeling better, clear-minded, and able to speak, but he spoke with difficulty, and his look was disquieting. * * * I shall sleep tonight at the Hotel d'Alsace and shall do so as long as his condition remains dangerous. * * * You should write to the guardian of his children if you know his address. The physicians are very nervous, for they fear that they may be taken to account. In this country the physicians bear a great responsibility, but I told Tucker that he need have no fear. He wants to write a report about the consultation, seal it, and submit it to you. * * * When Oscar dies Harris will have to give some money to you or some other responsible person, so that the people who have been so kind to Oscar and who have advanced him money may be repaid. It is very hard to treat him; he creates scenes and does not allow anybody to put the mustard plasters on his feet. His head lies in ice all the time. He takes hardly any nourishment. * * * Oscar has not asked for any one, and I believe he does not realize that he is in a dangerous condition; he is too ill and his head is too weak. Sometimes he is talking about books. Shall he have a priest or a Protestant minister if his condition grows worse? Tucker wants him to have one by all means. My opinion is that he should not have any if he does not ask for one. But I should rather have your decision in this matter. I should like to know: 1. The necessary addresses; 2. Whether a priest be called in case Oscar is dying; 3. In the event of death, general instructions. If necessary, I will telegraph to you. If the end should approach, will you come to Paris?" In a second letter, dated November 28, Mr. Turner wrote: "I am afraid it is all over with Oscar. He has been in a delirium for two or three days, and he is growing worse. This morning a consultation of the physicians, after which I telegraphed to you. Tomorrow another consultation. If he will not improve within three or four days he will be dead. I sat with him this morning until half-past five. He talked nonsense all the time, now English, now French. * * * From my telegram you will have seen that if it is possible for you to come to Paris, you have no time to lose. Just at this moment Oscar seems to feel somewhat relieved. After I had kept an ice-bag on his head for three-quarters of an hour he said to me: 'You dear little Jew, don't you think that I have had enough of it now.'"

I decided to take my mother on the following Friday to Mentone and then go to Paris on Saturday, but on Wednesday evening, November 28, at half-past five, I received a telegram from Reggie saying: "Almost hopeless." I caught the express train for Paris and arrived there on November 29 at 10:40 in the morning. Dr. Tucker and Dr. Kleiss, a specialist, were there. They informed me that Oscar could live but two days more. His appearance was very painful, he was emaciated, and he breathed with difficulty. I made an effort to speak. He was conscious that people were in the room, and he raised his hand high when I asked him whether he understood what we were saying. He shook our hands. I then went out in quest of a priest, and after considerable difficulty I found Father Cuthbert Dunn. He came immediately and performed the baptism and the extreme unction—but Oscar was unable to partake of the Lord's Supper. * * * I sent telegrams to Frank Harris, to Holman, (that he may put himself in touch with Adrian Hope), and to Douglas. Dr. Tucker came later again and said that Oscar may last for a few days longer. A garde-malade was engaged, for the attendant was exhausted. Reggie and I slept that night in a room above at the Hotel d'Alsace. We were called twice by the attendant, who believed that Oscar was already dead. At about half-past five in the morning a complete change set in; the features of Oscar's face assumed a different expression, and that which is known as the death-rattle commenced. I had never heard anything like it. * * * Exactly at ten minutes of two o'clock in the afternoon of November 30 he passed away.

Dupoirier, the hotel keeper, kind-natured though he was, complicated the funeral arrangements by making a secret of Oscar's name, for he was registered at the hotel under the name of Melmoth. I had to see the police commissioner several times that day. Then I went to the funeral director for the English Embassy, to whom Father Cuthbert had sent me. After that I started out looking for a few nuns to watch over Oscar's body. It was only after the greatest efforts that I found two Franciscans. Gesling, the undertaker, notified me in the evening that owing to the fact that Oscar had used as assumed name, and since his identity would have to be established, the authorities may insist upon transferring Oscar's body to the morgue. I was, of course, shocked at this. It seemed, indeed, to be the climax of all horrors. After the physician had examined the body and cross-examined each and every one at the hotel, and after a series of drinks and inappropriate jokes and a fair-sized tip he signed the death certificate. In the meantime several other officials came in and wanted to know how many collars Oscar had, and what the price of his umbrella was. This is absolutely true, without the slightest exaggeration. Then different poets and authors sent in their cards: Raymond de la Tailhade, Tardieu, Charles Sibleigh, Jehan Rictus, Robert d'Humieres, Georges Sinclair, and a number of Englishmen who gave fictitious names. Also two veiled ladies. They all had to register their names before seeing the body. Gesling, the funeral director, told me that in the interest of the hotel keeper there should be no secrecy, so that no impression should be made as though something was to be concealed. I am glad to be able to say that dear Oscar looked calm and dignified, just as he looked at the time he had left the prison. * * * About his neck lay a wreath of roses given to me, and on his breast a memorial coin which a Franciscan woman had given to me. There were also a few flowers, which I placed upon him, and some flowers brought by an anonymous friend in the name of the children, although the children could not have known yet that their father was dead. * * * At my request Maurice Gilbert photographed Oscar, but the photograph turned out unsuccessful. Henri Davray came in just at the time the cover was being placed on the coffin; he was kind and friendly. On the following day—it was Sunday—Alfred Douglas arrived, and a number of people I did not know came in to make inquiries, presumably they were journalists. On Monday, December 3, at 9 o'clock in the morning, the funeral procession started from the hotel. We all walked behind the bier to the church of St. Germain-des-Pres; Alfred Douglas, Reggie Turner, I. Dupoirier, (the hotel keeper), Henri, (the attendant), Jules, (the servant), Hennion, and Maurice Gilbert, with two others whom I did not know. After a quiet mass at the altar by the vicar, Father Cuthbert Dunn completed the funeral ceremony. The porter said that fifty-six people were present at the funeral, among them five women in deep mourning: Mme. Stuart Merrill, Countess de Bremont, her maid, an old servant girl of Oscar Wilde's wife, and another woman, whose name I do not know. I had ordered three carriages. Twenty-four wreaths were sent, several of them anonymously. The hotel keeper sent one with the inscription: "A mon locataire," another one came from "La service de l'Hotel." There were wreaths there from Alfred Douglas, More Adey, Reginald Turner, Miss Schuster, Arthur Clifton, Mercure de France, Louis Wilkinson, Harold Mellor, Teixeira de Mattos and wife, Maurice Gilbert and Dr. Tucker. At the head of the coffin I placed a wreath with the following inscription: "A tribute to his literary achievements and distinction." Upon the wreath I inscribed the following names of the people who showed a friendly attitude to Wilde during his imprisonment and after: Arthur Humphreys, Dal Young, Mrs. Leverson, More Adey, Alfred Douglas, Reginald Turner, Frank Harris, Louis Wilkinson, Mellor, Miss Schuster, Roland Strong, and "C. B." upon the special request of a friend who wished to be so mentioned. I can hardly praise enough the magnanimity, kind-heartedness, and charitableness of Jean Dupoirier, the owner of the Hotel d'Alsace. * * * Reggie Turner had to undergo the worst hardships of all in many respects. Those who liked Oscar will recall with a sense of ease that during his last days he had such a man as Reggie near him as long as he was conscious.

Ilya and the Nightingale cursed Tatar hordes and the lofty mountains, and the wide uncrossable river, Smorodina, in the midst of bog and forest. There too is the Robber Nightingale, with nine fierce sons and his witch daughter Elena."

"If I may answer thee truly, Fair Red Sun Vladimir, Prince of Royal Kiev," retorted young Ilya, "by just that very way I came. And at this moment Robber Nightingale sits bound fast by his iron beak to my staunch good Clouddrop's stirrup in the courtyard." When the Prince and his courtiers and generals heard this marvel they outran each other to the courtyard, stumbling in their haste. Surely there he brooded. Nightingale the Robber, wicked and wise, with one eye on Kiev, and the other on Chernigov.

"Now whistle and hiss, evil bird, that we may know thee," cried Vladimir. "Yes, whistle and hiss," commanded Ilya the hero, "but see that thou doest it gently, gently, that no harm be done in Royal Kiev this glad Eastertide."

Nightingale opened his iron beak. To be gentle he knew not how; and why forsooth should he spare Royal Kiev? So he whistled and hissed with his whole full force. At his cry those who died were too many to number; the city trembled and tottered, and although Ilya had shielded Vladimir under his arm, yet the Fair Red Sun Prince lay as if dead for hours.

"For thee can be no holy pardon; this I tell thee plainly, evil, evil bird," roared strong young Ilya of Murom. Then Clouddrop galloped gallantly with his brave rider far out into the open steppe, with Nightingale at his stirrup; and there it was that Ilya shot the burning, fiery dart from his bow sharp into the robber's breast. It must be told too that before Ilya rode further he chopped the Wizard Bird's beak to atoms, and in his anger he scattered his bones in powder on the steppe, where it spread like a dust of poppy seeds. From much evil, though, can come much good, else the world must have died long ago; and from those seeds of darkness and night, strangely enough, so say our peasant fathers—whether it be true or no, who of us can tell?—behold there came forth that summer time a myriad of those gentle little nightingales who fill our southern Russian land with their full-voiced song, neither sad nor glad, but sweet, sweet beyond all compare.

Auto Notes

The announcement on the part of the White Company that none of their cars would be entered in this year's hill climb on Nineteenth avenue, came as a surprise to the local automobile public. In the past the White has competed, and always with success, in similar contests. When approached for reasons H. E. Doty, Pacific Coast manager of The White Company, said, "Yes it is true that we have always been represented in this sort of thing formerly. Only last year in this identical contest we carried off the honors of the day, making faster time than any competing car; but we realize that the day for all such races, hill climbs and similar competitions is past. The public fully realizes now that any number of factories turn out a few cars each year designed only for this sort of business and carefully reserved for it. The achievements of these cars furnish absolutely no index to the real worth of the general stock cars put out by the same factories. It is ridiculous nowadays to display a line of racing cups to a prospective purchaser if you assume that he has even the slightest idea of automobile affairs. It takes a salesman of either little experience or monumental courage to attempt such a thing with any hopes of success. What the buyer wants to know is what the cars are doing and what the identical car he is buying can do. Demonstrations made with that car count. Show him its hill climbing capabilities, have him along when you make the tests, then you are showing him something that tells the tale of maximum service at a minimum cost. That is what your buyer is after and it's on that that we intend to concentrate our future endeavors."

"In inviting the school children to visit our salesroom and hear a lecture by an expert on automobile construction and see the Chalmers exhibit which has been attracting so much attention, we do not expect to derive any monetary benefit," says Calvin C. Eib of the Pioneer Automobile Co., local dealers in Chalmers cars. "It is our belief, however, and the belief of the Chalmers Motor Co., that the public should have a more general knowledge of automobile construction and operation. The automobile is the most wonderful piece of machinery in the world. Already the principal colleges of the country have taken up its study in their engineering departments. The time is not far distant when the principles of the automobile will be studied in the high and technical schools just as the principles of the locomotive, the telegraph instrument and the electric battery are now studied."

W. R. Spalding, president of the W. R. Spalding Lumber Co. of Visalia, is a strong favorer of Diamond Tires. He writes that one of the tires on his car has given 12,237 miles while another has covered some 9,000 miles, these two tires outlasting four of other makes.

Dr. George F. Reinhardt of Berkeley, who was until recently president of the board of health in the transbay city, and the official physician for the University of California, is now in Europe. Dr. Reinhardt was the first automobilist on the coast to receive delivery of a White Gasoline Car. He is now using the machine in touring the Old World. Just before leaving for Europe the doctor was married and his bride is now accompanying him on his European tour which is in the nature of a honeymoon. Their many friends located about the bay receive frequent letters from the couple in which they voice the high satisfaction they are experiencing with their car. Writing from a little village in France, the doctor declares that he is scorching the best roads in the world with a car that can have no better. "I am enjoying this auto tour," he writes, "to its fullest extent."

S. G. Chapman did a record business the past week and incidently had his record day so far this season. He received seven orders in the one day for Oakland and Hupmobiles cars. The orders came from all sections of the State by long distance wire. Chapman has, also, just unloaded another carload of Hupmobiles all of which will soon go out on delivery. Business in this make of car is particularly brisk this season, and especially so in the mountainious sections of the State.

So insistent has become the demand for Hudson cars and so urgent are the requests for early delivery, that the management has been compelled to lease two additional Detroit factories in their effort to more nearly meet the demand and care for the spring trade. The two factories will give double the present floor space. This arrangement is only temporary, as the Hudson Company has already completed plans for the new $500,000 Hudson factory to be built in Fairview, and the building of which will commence this month. The Hudson people will expect to be occupying their new factory by midsummer. The present Hudson output is now 400 cars a month. The additional floor space afforded by these two factories will practically double production.

There is a certain real satisfaction which comes through the possession of an article which is, in every respect, thoroughly up to date. In fact, almost all "shopping" consists of a search for the goods of latest pattern and embodying the latest ideas. In purchasing a motor car, it is particularly important to secure the latest design, because the art has been advancing so rapidly that those cars, the design of which dates back two or three years, do not possess many of the desirable features which the present state of the art makes possible.

The owner of a White gasoline car has the satisfaction of knowing that the design of his car is at least one year in advance of any other American machine and that he will see the features which he now has in his car adopted by other makers next year and the year after. Among these up-to-date features are the "long-stroke" engine, the casting of the four cylinder en bloc with only about one-fourth the usual amount of piping, the four-speed transmission, etc.

The owner of a White gasoline car can be even more proud of its QUALITY than of its up-to-date design. There is no part of the car which could be made of any better material or could be constructed with more care, even if the selling price of the car were one thousand dollars greater.

THE WHITE STEAMER STILL STANDS PRE-EMINENT IN "A CLASS BY ITSELF." IT IS THE IDEAL CAR FOR A LADY TO DRIVE, THE IDEAL CAR FOR COMFORT. NO CRANKING, NO GEAR SHIFTING, NO NOISE, NO VIBRATION.

Letters

"The Beauty" by Mrs. Woodrow Wilson

"The Beauty" of whom Mrs. Woodrow Wilson writes was a Southern girl of good family with the usual bringing up of her class. Thrown on her own resources she went to New York confidently assured that her little parlor accomplishments would win her both fame and fortune, but she discovered, as many another has and will that earning a living—bare bread and butter and shelter—is no such easy matter, especially without training. Perdita Cary had one relative, a somewhat distant cousin whom she had known all her life, now a painter with some reputation. Eugene Gresham was an ideal lover, always ready with pretty compliments and witty speeches, but he stopped right there. Despite his air and attitude he said nothing definite, committed himself to nothing, but seemingly assumed that it was a case of he would and she wouldn't, that it was Perdita who had not accepted him, not he who had made her no definite proposition of marriage. Gresham went abroad and Perdita accepted a wealthy suitor, Creswell Hepworth. Hepworth had no relatives and one would naturally assume that the pair once married, would be left to work out their own destiny, but in lieu of relatives the middle aged Hepworth had a coterie of old acquaintances of both sexes who were not at all pleased by his marriage and who proceeded to work the mischief usually left for blood kin. They were sure that the matrimonial craft would come to wreck, some of them even going so far as to make wagers on the subject, and one may be sure they took no steps to prevent a catastrophe. Perdita Cary thought she was in love with Gresham. She knew she was not in love with her husband, and when Gresham returned she was already bored with wealth and the spending of it and took to flirting mildly with the artist, with the result that after a fit of bad temper Hepworth entered into a very modern agreement with his beautiful wife. It was, briefly, that they should separate and after a year's deliberation, if Perdita were still in love with her cousin, a divorce should follow, with a rearrangement of family ties. Perdita expected to dominate the situation and work it all out in her own way but Hepworth took the reins in his own hands and before she had time to formulate plans he left, ostensibly on a business trip of several months but really to domicile himself in Southern California, where, unexpectedly, he met an old friend who asked him to act as temporary guardian for "my little girl" who, as usual, proved to be a little girl only in the eyes of her admiring parent. Perdita, left alone in New York, suddenly develops a state of high mindedness which forbade her to live on an income provided by her husband. She really has artistic talent of a high order though she made such a dire failure of painting lamp shades and cotillion favors, and in partnership with a woman whom she has aided with her ideas, she sets up an establishment, not that of a fashionable modiste, but an adviser and designer of costumes for those rich enough to pay her prices. Meanwhile there is an abundance of gossip. Though unexpectedly discreet, the coterie of friends still keeps an eye on Perdita and Gresham and gossips and tattles as idle folks will. At the other end of the continent there is another stage setting and a new set of actors. Creswell Hepworth has taken a decided interest in Fuchsia Fleming, the daughter of his old friend. Fuchsia is an actress, a real one who, however, lacks the backing which she needs to place her prominently, and Hepworth has virtually promised to see her on Broadway, though in the sequel it proves that his assistance will not be needed since one of Fleming's own projects proves to be a gold mine. Newspaper enterprise ferrets out the intimacy and an automobile accident gives the yellows their opportunity to exploit it. Perdita really has some sense underneath her femininity. Of course she has long ago discovered that now the adorable Gresham is within reach she is by no means sure she wants him, while Hepworth proving elusive is really worth while, so, on the arrival of Fuchsia in New York she makes the first move and instead of showing up as the jealous wife or the termagant beauty, she calls with a proposition to design all the stage gowns, and the two women read each other's minds and become friends instead of enemies. Hepworth also returns intending to make but a brief stay and then go on to Europe. One of his fads has been the collecting of amulets and one of Perdita's few possessions is a curious bit of crystal, an heirloom credited with miraculous powers. It can never be sold nor bartered but if given with love all sorts of good fortune will accompany the gift. In addition the recipient will sooner or later disclose his own character. Gresham has had an almost superstitious confidence in the power of this family charm and has frequently begged it of Perdita who, however, has always refused the gift. It was his appropriation of the toy and evasion of its return which really

Transportation Evolution

From Red Man's Express to the "Electric" Victoria or Coupe.

The earliest mode of transportation in this country was that which the Pilgrim Fathers found the Indians using when the ponies of the latter dragged two long poles upon which were tied the red man's tepees and provisions.

From this down through the periods of the ox-cart, the two-wheeled chaise, of which the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes sings so eloquently, to the Brewster buggy and the automobile, seems but a hurried step in the great process of transportation evolution.

In this procession of marvelous development some one car must necessarily blaze the way, and it is not speaking disparagingly of the others to refer to them as "trailers."

As the records of electric car performances plainly point, the "Babcock" is the car which has led the van from every standpoint of efficiency, safety, luxury and economy. It combines the grace, elegance and luxury of this type of vehicle with the comfort and wear-resisting qualities which warrant the purchaser in pinning his faith to this particular make of "electric."

The purchaser should not be asked to buy "claims," but be offered only results accomplished by a car of standard equipment and stock battery.

In some instances, there have been foisted upon the public results gained by the use of specially prepared batteries and freak cars, and manufacturers were not honest enough to tell this fact. It is in this, perhaps, that the "Babcock" has won its meed of confidence at the hands of the public, for almost every record-making test has been accomplished by just the same kind of a car you would purchase if you choose from the Pioneer Automobile Company.

Send for the Artistic 1910 Babcock Catalogue, written by Elbert Hubbard, of special Roycroft Design, and printed at the Roycroft Trinterie.

led to the scene between Hepworth and Perdita and all this time it has remained in his possession, with the good fortune it was supposed to influence showered upon him. Now, on Hepworth's return Perdita makes a final demand for it and Gresham brings it to her, apparently departing by one door as Hepworth enters by another, but really secreting himself in a small apartment where he listens to the conference between husband and wife on the subject of divorce settlement and hears Perdita refuse to accept alimony on the ground that she is making her own fortune and has no need of it even if there were any other reason why she should be dowered. After Hepworth leaves the house Gresham steps in to remonstrate with Perdita. He has been absolutely sure all the time that at the end of the year she would be only too greatly rejoiced to unite herself with him, and now he tells her quite plainly that they will need Hepworth's money since he, the Painter Prince, despite the big income he makes, needs every cent for himself and her business, though it pays such large dividends now, is only a passing fad for the plutocrats, who will desert her when something more novel presents itself. It is now that the second property of the amulet asserts itself, for, Perdita, idly toying with the charm while consulting with Hepworth, both seated with their backs to the portiere which concealed the hiding place of Gresham, had caught the reflection of his face in the crystal, revealing his disappointed greed. Like all handsome women Pordita had an idea that her beauty was the least of her endowments and she resented the idea that Hepworth had treated her like a beauty and not like a woman of profound business abilities. She was probably as much disappointed as pleased when, at their supposedly last meeting, he casually remarked that the world was full of beauties, many more beautiful than herself, and discussed his business affairs man-fashion with her. Most likely she would have been bored or resentful had he taken such an attitude in the early days of their marriage, but she was one of the rare few who succeeded in having her cake and eating it, being both bond and free at the same time, permitted to open her hand or close it at will, her bird never flitting to the bush. It is a pretty theory that beautiful women condemn beauty and crave brains but it is a certainty that there isn't one of them who will not do ten times more to preserve even an imaginary physical charm than she would to retain the brains of Minerva herself. Once in a way it may do for a Perdita to send her millionaire lord out into the highways and byways to gratify some theoretical whim but the other ninety and nine the chances are that he will not need to go far before he finds a comfortable lodge in the wilderness, and her charms, ungilded, will not bring her a high price in a new market. The story is readable and interesting and in its way a novelty, since there is really no intrigue, nothing vicious or unclean to be condoned or excused. Except for Fleming's "little girl," whom Hepworth was within an ace of providing with a doll, there isn't a child amongst all the characters. Possibly, if they had some domestic occupation besides that of pouring tea and fretting themselves over accumulating avoidupois they would have had less time, men and women, for watching their friends' affairs and gently, possibly inadvertently, blowing the coals just a little. From the Bobbs Merrill Co.

ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE WHY ORDER OF SALE OF REAL ESTATE SHOULD NOT BE MADE

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—Depart No. 10, Probate.

In the Matter of the Estate of OTTO FERRENBACH, Deceased.

Emily R. Ferrenbach, the Administratrix of the Estate of OTTO FERRENBACH, deceased, having filed her petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all the real estate of said decedent for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased appear before the said Superior Court on Monday, the 11th day of April, 1910, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Courtroom of Department No. 10, Probate—of said Superior Court, in the city and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administratrix to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, OTTO FERRENBACH, as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks in "Town Talk," a newspaper printed and published in said City and County. THOS. F. GRAHAM, Judge.

Dated, March 1st, 1910.

Endorsed: Filed March 1, 1910. H. I. Mulcrevy, Clerk. By H. G. Benedict, Deputy Clerk.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco—No. 26,821.

HARDA ZOIE, Plaintiff, vs.
NICHOLAS ZOIE, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City of and County of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in the office of the County Clerk of said City and County.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to Nicholas Zoie, defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this City and County; or if served elsewhere within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, on the ground of defendant's wilful desertion and abandonment of the plaintiff without any sufficient cause or reason and on the further ground of defendant's wilful failure and neglect to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life while having the ability so to do; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any moneys or damages demanded in the Complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the Complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 6th day of December, A. D. 1909.

The People of the State of California, to all persons claiming any interest in, or lien upon, the real property herein described or any part thereof, Defendants, Greeting:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of HELEN M. BONNET, Plaintiff, filed with the Clerk of the above entitled Court and County, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in or upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the Westerly line of Sixth Avenue, distant thereon Three Hundred and Seventy-five (375) feet Northerly from the Northerly line of Lake Street, and running thence Northerly along said Westerly line of Sixth Avenue Twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles Westerly one Hundred and Twenty (120) feet; thence at right angles Southerly Twenty-five (25) feet; and thence at right angles Easterly One Hundred and Twenty (120) feet to the point of commencement. Being part of Outside Land Block "B."

You are hereby notified that, unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit: that it be adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of said property in fee simple absolute; that her title to said property be established and quieted; that the Court ascertain and determine all estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, and whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description; that plaintiff recover her costs herein and have such other and further relief as may be meet in the premises.

Witness my hand and the seal of said Court, this 3rd day of March, A. D. 1910. H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
(Seal) By M. P. BRUTON, Deputy Clerk.

The first publication of this summons was made in "Town Talk" newspaper on the 12th day of March, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in, or lien upon, said property adverse to plaintiff: Name, None; Addresses, None.

A Lady Chapel

An interesting and novel feature in the Liverpool Cathedral is the new "Lady Chapel," in which commemoration is to be made of the noble qualities of women. The older forms of womanly distinction are to have their place, from Deborah, the leader in war, onwards; but far more interesting, because quite original, are the windows in the vestibule and staircase that commemorate the women of modern days. Mention is made of Queen Victoria and "all noble queens": Angela Burdett-Coutts, and "all almoners of the King of Heaven"; Grace Darling, and "all courageous maidens"; Mary Somerville, and "all earnest students"; Elizabeth Fry, and "all pitiful women"; Catherine Gladstone, and "all wives"; Christina Rossetti, and "all sweet singers"; Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and "all who have seen the infinite in things"; Mary Rogers (the self-sacrificing stewardess, who went down with the ship Stella), and "all faithful servants"; and some others. The idea is a charming one.

About Mme. Curie

Mme. Curie, the discoverer of that most wonderful substance, radium, has added a fresh leaf to her scientific laurels by isolating another new element, of the same nature, but immensely more powerful even than radium, to which, in honor of her native land, Poland, the scientist has given the name of "Polonium." When Mme. Curie discovered radium, she was the wife—she is now the widow—of Professor Curie. The newspapers are wont to attribute the discovery of radium to Mme. Curie and her late husband jointly, and probably the opportunity of talking over her experiments with her husband was of much value to her; but the discovery of that marvelous element, so full of possibilities to the world, was in reality the result solely of Mme. Curie's studies and experiments; and the late Professor Curie was so high-minded as to be anxious for this to be understood and admitted, and refused the Legion of Honor offered to him for the discovery, stating that it was Mme. Curie to whom the epoch-making discovery was due. The incident was pleasing, as evidence of the perfect sympathy and appreciation between the husband and wife. So the greatest discovery of this century, so far, was made by a woman, who was at one and the same time a scientific worker and a happy wife and a mother. May this be an augury for the future?

Take Off the Fat Where It Shows

Most women suffer much humiliation because of great quantities of fat, so located that, no matter how they dress, everybody sees that they are abnormal. This is the day of the slender figure, and fat women are simply not tolerated either in business or social affairs. Women may not know it, but men when they see a fat woman pass them on the street or in public places make all manner of sympathetic remarks about her. They do not mean to be unkind or to seem unmanly, but it is natural for a man to dislike fat on a woman. Where fat shows the most there is where it must be removed, and as quickly as possible. This season's dresses seem to be made for the fat woman's misery and the slender woman's delight. They expose all the charms of woman and her ugliness as well. Exercise and diet will not remove fat. This has been proved. The famous Marmola prescription which has met with such phenomenal success and has so many of our society women as its sponsors, is now being sold in tablet form to meet the demand of the public for this style of treatment. These little tablets go into your system just like food. They stop the stomach and digestive apparatus from producing fat and reduce the fat upon the body at the rate of from 12 to 15 ounces a day. They are harmless and can be carried in your purse and taken even after you have indulged in a hearty meal away from home. They are sold at all drug stores at 75 cents a case, or if you prefer you may write the Marmola Company, 1220 Farmer Building, Detroit, Mich.

$3.50 Recipe Cures Weak Kidneys, FREE

Relieves Urinary and Kidney Troubles, Backache, Straining, Swelling, etc. Stops Pain in the Bladder, Kidneys and Back.

Wouldn't it be nice within a week or so to begin to say goodbye forever to the scalding, dribbling, straining, or too frequent passage of urine; the forehead and the back-of-the-head aches; the stitches and pains in the back; the growing muscle weakness; spots before the eyes; yellow skin; sluggish bowels; swollen eyelids or ankles; leg cramps; unnatural short breath; sleeplessness and the despondency?

I have a recipe for these troubles that you can depend on, and if you want to make a quick recovery, you ought to write and get a copy of it. Many a doctor would charge you $3.50 just for writing this prescription, but I have it and will be glad to send it to you entirely free. Just drop me a line like this: Dr. A. E. Robinson, K 601 Luck Building, Detroit, Mich., and I will send it by return mail in a plain envelope. As you will see when you get it, this recipe contains only pure, harmless remedies, but it has great healing and pain-conquering power.

It will quickly show its power once you use it, so I think you had better see what it is without delay. I will send you a copy free—you can use it and cure yourself at home.
